PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 15, 1924.

(Legislative day of Friday, March 14, 1924.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fess	Ladd	Robinson
Ball	Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard
Bayard	Frazier	McKellar	Shields
Borah	George	McKinley	Shipstead
Brandegee	Gerry	McNary	Shortridge
Broussard	Glass	Mayfield	Simmons
Bursum	Gooding	Neely	Smith
Cameron	Hale	Norris	Smoot
Capper	Harrell	Oddie	Spencer
Caraway	Harris	Overman	Stanfield
Colt	Harrison	Owen	Stephens
Couzens	Howell	Phipps	Trammell
Curtis	Johnson, Minn.	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Dale	Jones, N. Mex.	Ralston	Warren
Dill	Kendrick	Ransdell	Weller
Ernst	Keyes	Reed, Mo.	Willis
Ferris	King	Reed, Pa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are engaged in a committee hearing. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit a conference report on House bill 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not desire to take it up for consideration at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. If it leads to any lengthy discussion I shall not press it unduly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say that a Senator who can not be on the floor just at this moment asked that it be not taken up in his absence. I refer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] who will be here in a few minutes. He is now engaged on the business of the Senate outside the Chamber in a committee hearing. The report can be submitted and lie upon the table to be taken up later.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw my request for the present and submit the report later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah withdraws his request.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation pertaining to the legislative establishment, fiscal year 1924, contingent expenses, United States Senate, for payment of expenses incurred by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate on account of attendance of Senators at the funeral of the late President, Warren G. Harding, $5,000; for purchase of furniture, $5,000, in total amount $10,000, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed. (S. Doc. No. 65.)

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation pertaining to the legislative establishment, fiscal year 1924, maintenance, Senate Office Building, for an extension of a freight elevator to the attic story of the Senate Office Building, including a new pent house, wiring, and new concrete floor in the entire attic story of this building, also one new revolving door on the ground floor at the southwest corner of the building, $23,558, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed. (S. Doc. No. 66.)

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a telegram in the nature of a petition of the Lions Club of Rawlins, Wyo., praying for the passage of the so-called Capper truth in fabric bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of members of the Milton Women's Club, of Milton, Fla., praying for the passage of legislation creating a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILLIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Columbus, Ohio, praying an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of members of Pride of Columbus Council, No. 207, Daughters of America, of Columbus, Ohio., praying for the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the lodges of the S. N. P. J. (fraternal organization of Yugoslav people), of Cleveland and Neff, Ohio, protesting against the passage of selective immigration legislation, and especially against the proposal to register, photograph, and finger-print immigrants, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CAPPER presented the petition of the Board of County Commissioners of Crawford County, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain materials, machinery, and equipment to the Department of Agriculture for road building purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Newton, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation creating a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Newton, Kans., remonstrating against the participation of the United States in the League of Nations or the Permanent Court of International Justice, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Saffordville and Newton, in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of L. C. Weeks, as local secretary of the Federated Shop Crafts and of the Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America, of Osawatomie, Kans., praying for a repeal of the so-called Esch-Cummins transportation act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry employees of the Kansas City Southern Railway Co., of Pittsburg, Kans., remonstrating against amendment of the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FESS presented a resolution adopted by the Ohio Horticultural Society, at Columbus, Ohio, favoring the passage of the so-called Purnell bill, relative to more complete endowment of agricultural experiment stations, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution of the Springfield (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the passage of the so-called Lucretia Mott amendment to the Constitution, providing that men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and all territory subject to its jurisdiction, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Orrville, Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Brookhart-Hull bill, requiring that all strictly military supplies be manufactured in Government-owned navy yards and arsenals, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the Trades and Labor Council of Lima and of teachers of the public schools of Delphos, both in the State of Ohio, favoring the restriction of the traffic in narcotics, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the Akron (Ohio) Bar Association, favoring the passage of legislation exempting from taxation $5,000 of personal income, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2146) to amend section 84 of the Penal Code of the United States (Rept. No. 256);

A bill (S. 2147) to complete the construction of the Willow Creek ranger station, Montana (Rept. No. 257);

A bill (S. 2148) to empower certain officers, agents, or employees of the Department of Agriculture to administer and take oaths, affirmations, and affidavits in certain cases (Rept. No. 258);

A bill (S. 2149) to facilitate and simplify the work of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture, and to promote reforestation (Rept. No. 259);

A bill (S. 2150) to authorize arrests by officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture in certain cases and to amend section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States" (Rept. No. 260);

A bill (S. 2151) to increase the subsistence and per diem allowances of certain officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture (Rept. No. 261);

A bill (S. 2164) to repeal that part of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912," approved March 4, 1911, relating to the admission of tick-infested cattle from Mexico into Texas (Rept. No. 262);

A bill (S. 2316) to allow credit in the accounts of A. W. Smith (Rept. No. 263); and

A bill (S. 2711) for the relief of the Pitt River Power Co. (Rept. No. 264).

Mr. HARRELD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1174) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine claims of certain members of the Sioux Nation of Indians for damages occasioned by the destruction of their horses (Rept. No. 265); and

A bill (H. R. 4161) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to acquire necessary rights of way across private lands, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, needed in constructing a spillway and drainage ditch to lower and maintain the level of Lake Andes, in South Dakota (Rept. No. 266).

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 655) to provide for a tax on motor-vehicle fuels sold within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 267) thereon.

Mr. DILL, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 64) to change the name of "Mount Rainier" to "Mount Tacoma," and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 268) thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on yesterday they presented to the President the enrolled bill (S. 684) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the commencement on June 18, 1923, of the work of carving on Stone Mountain, in the State of Georgia, a monument to the valor of the soldiers of the South, which was the inspiration of their sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters in the Spanish-American and World Wars, and in memory of Warren G. Harding, President of the United States of America, in whose administration the work was begun.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRELD:

A bill (S. 2838) to provide for expenditure of tribal funds of Indians for construction, repair, and rental of agency buildings, and related purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2839) for the relief of George Turner; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2840) for the relief of C. C. Carson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2841) for the relief of Wesley Mathis; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2842) to provide for compulsory school attendance, for the taking of a school census in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 2843) to enable persons in the United States to engage in cooperative purchasing, for importation into the United States, of raw commodities which are produced principally in foreign countries; to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6426. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 6941. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 7449. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7783. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 7816. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7039) to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved January 12, 1895, relative to the allotment of public documents.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following joint resolution and act:

On March 12, 1924:

S. J. Res. 57. Joint Resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the District of Columbia of a statue by Jose Clara personifying "Serenity."

On March 14, 1924:

S. 2014. An act to authorize the Park-Wood Lumber Co. to construct two bridges across the United States Canal which connects Apalachicola River and St. Andrews Bay, Fla.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 7449. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

H. R. 6426. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 6941. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 7783. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 7816. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia by striking out in line 3 the word "six" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "four," so that the amendment as amended would read:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years; and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection.

I desire to say just a word on the amendment. I have been impressed by the arguments that have been made, particularly by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], to the effect that six years is too long a time for which to elect an Executive, particularly if it should develop that a serious mistake had been made by the people in that choice. It seems to me that four years is a sufficiently long term.

I have also been impressed by arguments that have been urged by various Senators that it is a misfortune to the country that the Executive of any party is bound inevitably by the exigencies of party politics to give more or less of his attention during his first term to the matter of his reelection. I believe in the long run the country would get better service if we should make the President ineligible for a second term and confine his term to four years. It seems to me that is a sufficiently long time to enable a Chief Executive fairly to work out the policies which he has promised to work out, and if it develops that the people were not satisfied with those policies they ought to have the right to change at the end of four years rather than at the end of a longer period such as six years. By adopting the amendment which I suggest to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia we would get the advantage of having an Executive chosen for a definite term with definite knowledge beforehand that he could not be a candidate for reelection. He must then know that whatever record he makes he must make within the four years.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, of course, there is much which can be said both in favor of and against the proposal to limit public officers to one term, but what is the distinction, in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, proper to be made between the terms of executive officers and the terms of legislative officers? If executive officers should be denied the privilege of being reelected, if they should be limited to a single term, why should not the same principle be applied to members of the legislative branch of the Government?

I take it that the principal purpose of denying an executive officer the right to succeed himself is to remove him from the temptation of acting in the performance of his duty in a way to incur public favor. If it is right and proper that an executive officer should be removed from influences which tend to make him conform toward public sentiment in the performance of his duties, why is not the same principle applicable, for instance, to Members of Congress, to those who serve in the legislative department? Is not the argument which can legitimately be advanced in favor of single terms for executive officers quite as strong, if not stronger, in favor of single terms for legislative officers?

When the whole argument has been summed up, is it desirable that either executive or legislative officers should be placed above or below the reasonable influences which are exerted on both executive and legislative servants of the people naturally arising from what they believe to be the state of public opinion as it relates to the performance of their respective duties? In a Government such as ours, where all authority rests finally upon mature public opinion, do we desire to say that the public officers shall be placed in a position where indifference to public sentiment shall be premIALIZED? I think it worth while to remember that it might be subversive of the public interest to place either legislative or executive officers in a position where they would naturally be indifferent to the influences which gave them power.

I know there has been in progress throughout the country during recent months a campaign of education or propaganda—you may name it whichever you please—in favor of a single term of six years for the President. So far as my information goes, it is based solely on the theory that the Chief Executive, out of a desire to succeed himself in office, might render decisions and take action which would be subversive of the public interest, and that if we should remove him from that motive there would naturally result a temperament and a disposition which would make the Executive always conform to his convictions of the public interest, uninfluenced by his own ambitions. Every Executive, however, in the natural course, becomes surrounded by powerful and designing influences. I do not need to recall to the Senate instances where the Chief Executive has been regarded as subject to unofficial influences of men in private life. When the argument is summed up, I believe it will be found that the condition is better under the present system than it would be under the proposed system, where either Executive or legislative officers would be independent of the influences that gave them their power and position.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the observations of the Senator from Arkansas are pertinent and proper, and, as his observations always are, they are well worthy of most careful consideration. It seems to me, however, that the argument which the Senator has so ingeniously and ably made is directed at the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] rather than to the amendment to the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is entirely true.

Mr. WILLIS. I think, however, the Senator's questions are perfectly proper and fair, and I wish to answer them as best I can.

In the first place, I think there is a vast difference between the execution and administration of laws on the one hand and the enactment of laws on the other hand.

I think I can see several very good reasons why it might be desirable to limit the term of the Executive that would not be applicable at all to the case of a Representative in Congress or a Senator. I think the President occupies a relationship to the people, and ought to occupy a relationship to the people, quite different from that which obtains between a Representative or a Senator on the one hand and the people on the other. The people generally look to the Chief Executive as the personification of national sovereignty. It will be remembered by those familiar with the great classic of the history of government, Guizot's History of Civilization, that he points out that the Executive is in a sense the personification of the sovereignty of the people, and that is why all of us, no matter what the stress of party contest or bitterness may be, have a respect for the office entirely separate and apart from the personality of the individual who temporarily happens to occupy it. Because that is true, because the Executive is the personification, in a sense, of the sovereignty of the Nation, I believe that in the long run the people will get better service and the Executive himself will be in a position to have his service better understood if it is known beforehand that he can not be a candidate for reelection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator, it seems to me, is answered by recurring to two or three particular crises in American history when it would have been almost disastrous if the people had not been permitted to reelect such men as Washington and Lincoln. That is particularly true with reference to Lincoln. It is said, and I imagine it is true, that some friends of Lincoln came to Washington from Springfield, Ill., prior to the commencement of the campaign in 1864 and went to a Member of the House and asked him to introduce them to Lincoln friends in the House and the Senate; that they were naturally anxious about his political future, and were desirous of getting in touch with them. The gentleman to whom they spoke took them over and introduced them to a Representative from Illinois, and said that if Lincoln had any other friends in the House he did not know who they were. It is a notorious fact that what we might call the "organization," or the leaders of the party, were practically unanimous against Lincoln's renomination; but the people thought otherwise and, as usual, they were ahead of their leaders. I think it would have been a disaster if he had not been reelected. It was almost a disaster when he was assassinated, and it would have been worse if he had not been reelected.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho is quite correct in the observation that it would have been an unspeakable calamity if President Lincoln had not been reelected, but, on the other hand, if we should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Georgia without the amendment which I am now proposing it would have been an equally unspeakable calamity, speaking with great respect to the then Chief Executive—it would have been a calamity indescribable if the predecessor of Mr. Lincoln had had two more years in which to serve. That, to me, is the answer, or an answer to the argument in favor of a six-year term. I quite agree that it would have been a tremendous misfortune if President Lincoln had not been reelected or if President Washington had not been reelected, and yet I can easily conceive of circumstances in which it might be a calamity if a President were reelected. We have to work out those things according to the doctrine of chance.

Mr. BORAH. That is true, but I think there is a difference between denying the people the right to exercise their judgment and relying upon that judgment when they do exercise it. I do not think there is a great deal of danger after a President has been in office for four years if he submits himself again to the electorate and the electorate approves of him. There is not a great deal of danger in that reelection. Does the Senator think there is?

Mr. WILLIS. No. Frankly, I say I do not think there is a great deal of danger in that respect; I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. BORAH. If we believe in representative government, it is fundamental that the ultimate judgment of the people must be the basis of our faith. There is just one feature of the situation which is disturbing to me, and if I knew how to control it I should be glad to do so. I do think that Presidents ordinarily devote too much time during the first four years to the effort to be reelected for a second term.

Mr. WILLIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRELD. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho this question: Suppose that after Mr. Lincoln had been renominated the will of the leaders to whom the Senator referred as being opposed to him had prevailed and Mr. Lincoln had been defeated, can the Senator not conceive that there might have been complications arising from that which would have been avoided if it had been known from the beginning that he would not succeed himself, thereby affording an opportunity to provide against that contingency?

Mr. BORAH. Well, no; I think the disaster which would have resulted would have been the same whether the leaders had prevailed or whether the Constitution had made it impossible. We would have been deprived of Lincoln in either case, and it would have been a disaster.

Mr. HARRELD. I think that is true.

Mr. BORAH. But there is one thing about the leaders in American politics—that after they find out what the people really want, they generally accede to it.

Mr. HARRELD. That is true.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest one other thing for the consideration of the able Senator from Idaho, and that is this: The adoption of this amendment, in my judgment, would make out of the Presidency an office that is more directly the servant of the people and very much less an office that is devoted to political leadership. As long as you have it in the Constitution so provided that the President is eligible for reelection it is absolutely inevitable that he will be looked upon as, and to some extent he will be, a leader of his party. Political considerations are going to have large effect. On the other hand, if you provide in the fundamental law that the Chief Executive can not be reelected, you have very largely removed him from the influence of mere political considerations and have brought him face to face with the sense of his responsibility to the people. He knows that, politically, when he is elected to the Presidency his career is finished, and whatever he is to accomplish for the benefit of his country he must accomplish in the four years. I think it will place the Presidency upon a higher level and will bring to any man who is elevated to that great office a greater sense of his responsibility to the people.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly you would not want the President to cease playing politics and have the Senate playing politics; so we ought to limit the service of Senators to one term also.

Mr. WILLIS. That might be desirable, but I think it is unwise to undertake to doctor all the different departments of the Government at once.

Mr. BORAH. So we will begin with the other fellow's department.

Mr. WILLIS. We will begin with the proposition that is before us.

Here is another consideration: I submit this without any reference to the turbulent times through which we have recently passed in this body and perhaps in which we are. I am not thinking particularly about that, though it affords an illustration. I have never known of any President of the United States whose motives were very seriously misjudged.

Going back no further than the administration of President Wilson—and I can speak of that very freely, because I chance to belong to the opposite party—we could multiply illustrations where undoubtedly the motives of the President were misunderstood. It was said that he did thus and so because he was shaping affairs so that he and his party might win in the next election. Sensible and thoughtful men can give numerous illustrations of that sort of thing, and I have no doubt that that has been true of every President we have ever had. I think no doubt it is true in the instant case that the motives of the Chief Executive are misunderstood and misinterpreted. I do not complain about that. It is one of the things that is inevitable in politics, because we are looking all the time to the next election; but if there were a provision in the fundamental law that the Chief Executive should be elected for four years, and four years only, then he would be looked upon as he ought to be, as the representative of the sovereignty of the Nation and not as a political leader.

I therefore believe that the amendment I have suggested ought to be adopted, so that this proposed amendment will provide for a four-year term instead of a six years, and then that the President shall be ineligible for reelection.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator has finished his remarks on that phase of the matter; and if so, I desire to ask him a question.

The purpose of this amendment, as I take it, is to change the date of inauguration and the ending of the terms of Members of Congress, so that we will not have a "lame-duck" situation in the United States in the future.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]; yes.

Mr. DILL. That being the purpose, does the Senator think it is a wise thing to do to mix with that purpose the question of how long a President shall serve? In other words, waving aside the arguments for or against a single term, if the Senator is for the amendment as it now stands, does he not think it endangers the ratification of the amendment to put into it another proposition, and one that is entirely different, namely, the length of time that a man can be President?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think that is a very proper question, too; and if I had my way about it, I quite agree with the Senator from Washington that I should rather consider the propositions separately. We have to deal, however, with things as they come before us. Here is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], and the Senate is bound to vote upon it. Since it is before us, I can see no objection to acting upon the matter now, and therefore I have offered my amendment.

Mr. DILL. I want to say to the Senator that I shall vote against this amendment and the amendment of the Senator from Georgia also, because I do not want to mix the two propositions.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to withdraw his amendment, regardless of the merits of the amendment to it offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]; and it is immaterial, as I look at it, whether the latter amendment is agreed to or not. I should like to have the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia defeated, for the reasons that were so well stated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]. I am not sure but that upon full debate and discussion I should vote for the Senator's amendment. The Senator, however, ought to see now, immediately when it is suggested, what a controversy of opinion arises at once as to whether that ought to be put in the Constitution. If that amendment should be put on the one I have proposed, it would couple with a proposition that has but little or no opposition one that would lead to endless controversy, and might bring about the defeat of the whole thing.

I appeal to the Senator from Georgia, under the circumstances, to withdraw his amendment. If a vote is taken on it, his amendment will not get the support of many Senators who are in favor of it, so that it would be an injustice even to the amendment to make the record that we are about to make. I do not want to vote against it myself, but I should have to vote against it. I should plead with the Members of the Senate, the friends of the original joint resolution that has been reported from the committee and is before us now, if they want that idea enacted into law and want the legislatures to approve it, not to couple with it another proposition upon which probably the people are practically equally divided.

It seems to me, under the circumstances, that the Senator from Georgia ought to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think with some sympathy of the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], but it strikes me that this is a very important proposal. It is one about which I have thought for many years. This is the first time in my experience that it has ever come before a legislative body in a form where we can vote for or against it, and for that reason I should like to have just a moment to consider it, whatever may be the attitude of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] as to withdrawing it.

I have listened to the comment for and against the amendment. I am thoroughly convinced that this is not a matter that is impulsive, not a matter that has come without long consideration, that we ought to write into the organic law the ineligibility for reelection of the Chief Executive.

I fully appreciate the one outstanding objection that was raised a moment ago by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in which he referred to the possible danger of failure to reelect in the midst of war, speaking especially of the reelection of Lincoln in 1864. I admit that that is a contingency that might arise, but it is not very apt to embarrass us greatly. I admit that in the progress of a great conflict, where the entire policy has been under the direction of an Executive, the change of that Executive in the midst of it might present some danger. I also recognize the argument of Hamilton that was made in the Constitutional Convention, and later in his argument in the Federalist, that reeligibility is an invitation to do a real service and is a suggestion against doing anything that might meet with the disapproval of the public. All of those items I have thought of at other times, but I do not believe that they overbalance the value of writing the ineligibility for reelection into the Constitution.

In the first place, the President must be, in the nature of our institutions, the party leader. It does not mean that he wants to be; it means that he must inevitably be the party leader. I know, as other Members sitting here know, that our late President would not have turned over his hand for a reelection. Those of you who knew him as well as some of us did, who have talked over matters with him as we did, know that what he was compelled to do that appeared to be directed by considerations of party welfare was not so much of his choice as it was by reason of his being the head of the Nation and the head of a political party. In other words, this requirement of being a party leader is not necessarily from choice; it is from the stress of the situation. A man at the head of the Nation in a country like ours, which is party governed, could not, if he wanted to, free himself from the obligations of party leadership; and the President of the United States, under the stress of party leadership, is compelled to devote most of his time not so much to issues of statesmanship as to the party interests. I repeat that that grows out of our organization, and I am convinced that it is better for the country, and especially better for the incumbent, that the length of his service should be definitely fixed and that there should be an inhibition to his succeeding himself, not so much because his conduct would not warrant it but because it is not for the welfare of the Government that it should be done.

I think four years is too short a period, I would say to my colleague from Ohio. Six years would be too long for a bad man, as would four years be too long for a bad man. Under our system of government we are not apt to elect as the head of the Nation a man who would prove to be a detriment to the Nation; and if we assume that the length of time should be shorter, or even fixed, because of that danger, then four years would be just as objectionable, or in a degree it would be, as six. Four years is not time enough for an Executive to outline a well-defined, constructive policy. That is too short a time. Even at the present time, when a President standing for reelection is defeated, there is a period of time from the election until the end of his term which is absolutely useless so far as constructive legislation goes, for an Executive who is a candidate and is not elected to succeed himself is wholly without confidence and without spirit. That is a period of time that is almost an interregnum; that is without any force whatever. Ineligibility would correct this situation. It strikes me that four years is too short; six years will not be too long, and the provision as to ineligibility is of so great value to relieve the country from too much partisanship and at the same time relieve the President from the oppressive demands of party leaders which are so weighty that no man can bear up under the details which require him to devote most of his first term to looking after his election for a second term. All of these things strongly argue to me that we should make the President ineligible, but not limit the term to a shorter period than six years.

The provisions throughout many of the States limiting the governors to one term have not shown that such a practice is dangerous. The terms are not short where the governor is limited to one term. Where there is a provision for a succession of terms the terms will be short. In my own State the governor's term is for two years. One election is always suggestive of a second election, provided the governor can get the approval of the people. Therefore four years, as a rule, is the limit in Ohio, although we have had two cases where there were three terms instead of two. So in practice we have four years in two terms. I do not see that there would be any danger in making that four years in one term and making the incumbent ineligible to election to succeed himself.

The same is true in Pennsylvania and is true in a great many other States. I do not think any State which has a provision making the incumbent of the office ineligible, and limiting him to one term, has found that there is any inconvenience or danger connected with that practice, and for the same reason I think such a practice would be of value in our Federal Government.

As Senators know, it has been the practice for Presidents to stand for reelection, or renomination, for the Presidency. The first President of this Republic served two terms. While it is true that the second President had only one term, he was a candidate for election to a second term. Likewise the third, fourth, and fifth Presidents served for two terms. The sixth President served only one term. Jackson served two terms. Then for a long period the rule was only one term, but Senators will note that, beginning with the Civil War, the rule became two terms. Lincoln served two terms, and Grant two terms. True, Hayes served only one term, but in the campaign, in his letter of acceptance, Hayes announced that he would not stand for a second term and was against the practice of a President succeeding himself. But not so with other Presidents who were alive at the time the first term expired. In other words, since the Civil War the practice has been for a President to seek a second term. While not every one has been reelected, almost every President has stood as a candidate for a second term. In practice, therefore, we have eight years as the tenure of the presidential office. Eight years is not too much. But it involves the exigencies of reelection with all the confusion and liability incident to it. Six years would be better, especially if we limit it to one term. I am convinced that the better plan, judged by public welfare as well as integrity of leadership, argues strongly for one term of six years and ineligibility to a reelection.

So, Senators, whatever be the attitude of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] about withdrawing his amendment, I hope the time will come when the Congress will favorably consider making the term of the presidential office six years and making the President ineligible for reelection. I am for the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] proposing a constitutional amendment fixing the commencement of the term of President and the time of assembling Congress. I will vote for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to this joint resolution, and if it is not agreed to at this time I hope further consideration will be given to the subject at some time when we can have fuller consideration and secure a vote in the Senate upon it.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield, if the Senator wants to make a request.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address of ex-Secretary of the Navy Denby which was delivered at Detroit yesterday, and following it—

Mr. REED of Missouri. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. It has already been placed in the RECORD, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Mississippi yielded to me. I thank him.

Mr. HARRISON. I made no objection to the Senator's request.

Mr. SPENCER. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. HARRISON. I made the observation that I thought some one had already placed that speech in the RECORD.

Mr. SPENCER. The objection was made by my colleague. I will not trespass upon the Senator's time now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that "sometimes the Senate plays politics," and that when it does, "the President is justified in playing politics." I agree also with the proposition advanced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] that "sensible and thoughtful men everywhere know that Presidents give much time to efforts to secure their reelection." I want to substantiate that by a statement of some recent facts.

The other day we defeated the so-called Norbeck bill, which, it was alleged, sought to give some relief to the farmers in the wheat area. I noticed in the press this morning an article regarding the action of the Senate on that bill, in Ned McLean's paper, the official organ of the Republican Party, an inspired article, coming from the White House, because they seem to speak by the cards in this article. I shall not read it all, but only those lines that are pertinent to the issue. It is quite remarkable. The article reads:

President Coolidge was disappointed at the defeat of the Norbeck-Burness bill providing a fund of $50,000,000 to encourage diversification in farming, it was made known at the White House yesterday.

That fact was made known yesterday at the White House.

The President had thought the bill had a great deal of merit and that it would be helpful in the present distressing conditions in the agricultural regions. It was in harmony, it was said, with the President's recommendations in his message to Congress.

I do not think there is any doubt about that. That is the one and only farm-relief measure he has indorsed. The article continues:

The defeat of the Norbeck-Burness measure leaves only the McNary-Haugen bill before Congress to provide relief for the farmers of the wheat sections. This bill in no manner conflicted with the Norbeck-Burness bill, but is looked upon as a measure that would virtually fix prices and, it is understood, does not fully meet the views of Mr. Coolidge.

Of course, in his New York speech the President came out against the McNary bill, not in name, but in substance. He said he was against all price-fixing measures; but he was for the Norbeck bill. The article continues:

Among friends of the President defeat of the Norbeck-Burness bill is attributed largely to the absence from the Senate of its author, Senator NORBECK, who is campaigning in South Dakota for Senator HIRAM JOHNSON. Had he been present—

Says this inspired article—

they said yesterday, the bill might have been passed. Commissioner of Indian Affairs Burke—

Mr. Burke comes from South Dakota, I may say. He is an appointee of the present administration, a nice gentleman, with whom I served in the House—asserted that Senator NORBECK's presence was vital to the success of the bill, but that he chose rather to go campaigning in South Dakota in the hope of beating the President in the primary campaign. Senator NORBECK has been canvassing the State for several days, and will remain there probably until the election on March 25.

Confidence that President Coolidge will carry South Dakota, notwithstanding the vigorous campaign that is being waged for Senator JOHNSON, was expressed by the Coolidge managers yesterday. They realize that the contest is close, but all reports from there indicate that the President is holding his own.

So, Mr. President, in the list voting against the bill that was indorsed by the President, the so-called Norbeck bill, which even the gentlemen from the wheat areas said would not meet all of the situation—they voted for it only as a part of a general program—I find the names of some of the President's closest friends, men, may I say, to whom the President had only to whisper and they would have turned tumblersaults. Evidently the President did not take very much interest in the Norbeck bill. He just said he was for it and wanted it passed. But the leaders here, the men closest to him, voted against it. I find in this list BALL of Delaware. He can be said to be a pretty strong friend of the present administration and of President Coolidge.

BORAH! He has recently been a very great friend of the President, because the President has sought his advice on numerous occasions, but unfortunately has not accepted his advice. If he had, the President would be in a better fix than he now finds himself.

BRANDEGEE! A very close friend of the President, who wants to help him carry out all of his measures.

COUZENS! I had better pass that Senator's name, since he got into a controversy with the Secretary of the Treasury, who is the President's man Friday.

DALE! There is no closer friend of President Coolidge in this body than the new Senator from Vermont, Mr. DALE.

Mr. EDGE, who is seeking reelection, and who on all occasions, when he can stretch his conscience a little bit, votes with the President.

ERNST, of Kentucky! Always to be relied upon in administration matters.

GOODING! A recent convert. He showed a good deal of courage when he voted against the Norbeck measure the other day. He said he voted against it because he wanted a broader measure passed—one like the McNary bill. I believe, as he termed it. Some one suggests the Norbeck bill provided nothing about sheep. It only mentioned poultry.

LODGE! The President never had a better and closer friend and greater champion than the distinguished leader on the other side—Mr. LODGE. When some one criticizes the President, after he incubates it in his mind for two or three hours and hastens to the White House to find an explanation, he comes back and defends the President most eloquently. He is always on the watchtower to defend the President. He voted against the bill.

McLEAN! Another one who can be relied upon.

MOSES! The election had not been held in New Hampshire at the time MOSES voted on this proposition.

PEPPER! PEPPER! The President has no warmer friend here. He does not take his advice. He treats the senior Senator from Pennsylvania as he does my friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] at times, especially when the recommendation comes to demand the resignation of the Attorney General.

REED of Pennsylvania! Another who is the mouthpiece at times for the administration, especially when the Treasury Department is criticized.

SMOOT! He can always be relied upon, and he voted against the proposition.

WADSWORTH is another, and WATSON, "JIM" WATSON, may I be allowed to call him.

That is the crowd on the other side which voted against the measure, the President's closest and warmest political friends. Yet in this inspired article we read that the President is very much disturbed—hurt, may I say—because the Norbeck-Burness bill did not pass, and lays it to NORBECK's absence, because NORBECK was over in South Dakota pleading that the delegation from that State go instructed for HIRAM JOHNSON.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. It may be that these Senators in voting against the bill took the message of the President of December 6 last at its face value when the President said:

No complicated scheme of relief, * * * no resort to the Public Treasury will be of any permanent value in establishing agriculture. Simple and direct methods put into operation by the farmer himself are the only real sources for restoration.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely; but at that time perhaps he did not know that the vote in South Dakota and North Dakota, in the wheat area, was going to be so close. HIRAM JOHNSON at that time had not got busy out there. Although the President has come out against the McNary bill, as this inspired article supposes and as is generally understood, the pressure will be brought on him, especially as the Republican convention approaches, and he will turn around and indorse the McNary bill in the end.

There is another proof. Let me say that the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] did not defeat the bill. The Senator from South Dakota was paired on the measure. His vote was counted. He even went to the extent, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of arranging a pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], a Republican Senator. The bill would have been defeated whether its distinguished author was here or not. They are trying to prejudice his cause in South Dakota because he had taken up the cudgels of the opponent of the President of the United States.

Of course everyone knew when the President a few days ago, on last Saturday, in fact, raised the tariff on wheat 12 cents a bushel, from 30 cents to 42 cents a bushel, that he was playing politics, that he was trying to bring into his camp the great wheat areas of the country. He was attempting to deceive the farmers, as the Republican Party in the past had deceived them. But there have been some leaders in the ranks of the Republican Party that have not attempted to deceive them on the question of the tariff on wheat. I have before me here utterances by the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has studied the tariff question as few men have and who comes from the great Middle West. In a speech which he made in 1909, in discussing the question, this is what he said as to the tariff on wheat:

I want Senators to remember that I come from a State which probably puts more in value into the channels of trade every year than any other State in the Union in agricultural products. We will this year supply the people of the United States and the people of the world with products that will surpass the value of $700,000,000, and—

He said further—and this is the President of the Senate talking—

It is idle for even an enthusiast to assert that the price of those products is directly affected by the protective tariff.

Let me get closer to some of you. I want to read from another speech made by one who made a great reputation in this body, who came from the great Middle West and who is gone now, the late Senator Nelson, from Minnesota. Here is what that distinguished Senator said in speaking on the question of the tariff on wheat. This was in May, 1909, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was before the Senate:

I do not recall—

Said Senator Nelson—

the millions of bushels produced by the State of Minnesota, but I desire to tell the Senator that the tariff on wheat which is on the statute books has not done us a particle of good. It would be like a tariff on cotton, because up to this time we have been exporting from 150,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. The price of our wheat is fixed by the Liverpool price—the export price—and no duty up to this time has helped us.

I could read to you, Mr. President, from a report made by a commission composed of Republican and Democratic Senators some time ago. Upon that commission was the distinguished leader upon the Republican side, Mr. LODGE. The commission was appointed to look into the question of how the tariff on agricultural products affected the price. They said "the price of wheat was fixed in the world market and that the tariff had no effect."

But since this plea to the voters of the Middle West by the President raising the tariff on wheat from 30 to 42 cents a bushel, what are the results? How did it affect the price? Here are the facts. The increased duty was fixed on March 7, just a week ago. I read to you from a morning paper, the Washington Herald. Some of you might not want to accept that because it is not Ed McLean's paper, but it is a pretty reliable paper. The item is dated Chicago:

The farmer has been given more protection. The result is a drop in the price of wheat on the board of trade market of 8 cents a bushel. More than 7 cents slumped off yesterday and to-day. Soon after President Coolidge acted to protect the wheat farmer by raising the flexible tariff on Canadian wheat from 30 to 42 cents a bushel, the troubles of the wheat farmer began.

In less than a week's time wheat has gone down in price, as this paper said, 7 cents a bushel.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not intend to divert the discussion from the resolution that is pending here, and I should not say a word with reference to anything the Senator from Mississippi has said if I did not feel that in fairness to one of our colleagues, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], I ought to speak, because otherwise the criticism that was read from the newspaper, which I had not read myself, but which was read by the Senator from Mississippi, might be misunderstood.

As to how much time a Senator or a Member of the House should devote outside of the Congress to campaigns that are going on in his State is a question upon which men may very fairly and honestly disagree. I dislike very much to have come out from the White House what appears to have come in the way of criticism upon the Senator from South Dakota, and the statement made that if that Senator had been here the bill which bears his name would have passed.

I was not the author of the bill. As I have said before, when we began the hearings I was opposed to it myself, but I was there all the time. The Senator from South Dakota devoted more time to the consideration of the questions there involved than any other Member of this body, in my judgment. He was conscientious in regard to it. He worked early and late in regard to it. He felt as though it was his duty to go to his home State and participate in the campaign. He was careful to see before he went away that he was paired, so that his vote was not lost. He made a speech, a very able analysis of the bill, before he left the Senate.

It never has been my intention to say anything in regard to the matter. I have not participated, and would not have participated even if I could, in the contest that has come on in South Dakota, but the Senator from South Dakota had a right to participate in it. It happened to come at a time when his bill was coming on for a vote. He guarded himself and protected himself all the way through. There is not a Senator here but knows that I speak the absolute truth when I say that if the Senator from South Dakota had remained the bill would have been defeated just the same. I think it is very unjust for a statement of that kind to come out at this time in regard to the Senator from South Dakota, intended, I presume, to affect the result in South Dakota. It may be said that his colleague, the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], is also in South Dakota; and I mention that without any criticism of Senator STERLING. He has been there much longer than Senator NORBECK, participating in the contest.

Mr. ROBINSON. Which side of the campaign is he taking?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not authorized to speak for Senator STERLING, but I understand that he is for a delegation in South Dakota in favor of the renomination of Mr. Coolidge.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that be true it throws a very interesting light on the criticism that has been made of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK].

Mr. NORRIS. I have never been told that that is a fact, but that is my understanding. It does not seem to me that a statement of that kind comes with good grace from the White House. I dislike that it is necessary for me to mention it. I have not participated in the campaign and have not done a thing in the world, and could not if I wanted to, that would influence a single vote in South Dakota; but in the interest of absolute fairness it seemed to me that somebody was called upon to say as much as I have said, at least.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the discussion of the joint resolution which is pending. I simply want to say a word in response to what the Senator from Nebraska said when he was on his feet before, that he feared the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, if it shall be amended in the way I have suggested, would endanger his resolution. If I shared that opinion, I would vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia and against my own amendment, because, as the Senator from Nebraska knows, I am cordially and heartily in favor of his amendment. But I do not share that feeling. I think the Senator will find that there is a very strong sentiment in the country in favor of the limitation of the executive office to a single term. At all events, as my colleague has pointed out, the question is before us now. There is no probability that we shall have another opportunity to vote upon the question of the presidential term, and I therefore trust that the Senator from Georgia will not withdraw his amendment. There is no pride of opinion about this. I think we ought to have a yea-and-nay vote to take the sense of the Senate.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I want to say a few words touching the pending amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment, and also concerning the proposed amendment itself.

A few Senators, and only a few, remain in the Chamber and listen to these debates, and yet one would imagine that when we are asked to change the fundamental law of the land it would call for the presence of every Member of this body. On yesterday I counted, and I think there were but seven Members of the Senate present while the debate was going on. If we had a dispute here involving some slight political question we should speedily find these chairs filled. If there is no other reason why this joint resolution should be defeated, it is because it has not been considered by the Senate. It has been nominally before the Senate, but the Senate has been actually absent.

The old Constitution was written by some very wise men. It has served this country marvelously well. There has been no emergency in the life of the Nation or in the condition of the people which it has not been found adequate to meet. When we propose to change such a Constitution, it should be done only in the presence of some great and commanding reason.

I know this is the period of change, of alteration. The idea of progress seems to be that if you change a thing you have progressed, and hence to be progressive you must insist on change; but, Mr. President, putrefaction is change, but it is hardly progress in the right direction. It is the progress toward death and dissolution. If we were to amend the Constitution of the United States and destroy the Supreme Court, it would be a change, but it would be retrogression, not progression. If we were to change the Constitution of the United States and provide for the election of a king, it would be a change, but it would be a change that would destroy the Republic. So I beg to say in the inception of my remarks that those who confuse change with progress, and who believe that they can only occupy an exalted place in the forward march of progressivism by proposing changes frequently make the mistake of thinking that everything ought to be changed and confuse that with real progress.

There has been no system of government ever conceived in the brain of man that will not at times be found to fail to meet every possible exigency; and when some obstruction is met with there is in these modern days always some well-intentioned gentleman ready to come forward and propose a new system. He invariably proceeds in this wise: There are certain defects discovered in the present system; therefore it should be altered or destroyed, and there should be substituted for it a new system which its proponents solemnly assert will work perfectly; and yet when the new system is tried it almost invariably develops defects worse than those of the old and tried system. So we go on following this will-o'-the-wisp that is labeled "progress," and in many instances we find that instead of making progress we are making trouble.

The spirit of change broods over the land. If the Ten Commandments had not been written upon tables of stone the modern progressive gentlemen would have moved an amendment, and if any of them had existed in the days of Moses they would have insisted within 30 days on changing at least one-half of those immortal mandates.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fletcher	Ladd	Robinson
Ashurst	Frazier	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	George	McKellar	Shields
Bayard	Glass	McKinley	Shipstead
Borah	Gooding	McNary	Shortridge
Brandegee	Hale	Mayfield	Simmons
Broussard	Harrell	Neely	Smith
Bursum	Harris	Norris	Smoot
Cameron	Harrison	Oddie	Spencer
Capper	Howell	Overman	Stanfield
Caraway	Johnson, Minn.	Owen	Trammell
Couzens	Jones, N. Mex.	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Warren
Dale	Kendrick	Ralston	Wills
Ferris	Keyes	Reed, Mo.
Fess	King	Reed, Pa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield for me to present a conference report and ask for its consideration?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I submit the conference report on House bill 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill, and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah submits the conference report designated by him and asks for its immediate consideration. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I had better make a statement before the Senator from Arizona proceeds.

The item in the appropriation bill about which the Senator from Arizona desires to make statements is amendment numbered 47, known as the Bright Angel Trail appropriation. In the case of that amendment the House insisted upon its disagreement with an amendment, and at the proper time I shall move to agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47, as well as the amendment numbered 60. Amendment numbered 60 is the Howard University item, in which the appropriation for the medical building is eliminated.

Now, if the Senator from Arizona desires to speak upon amendment numbered 47, he may do so.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I will read for the benefit of the Senate the amendment as printed in the Record in a letter from me which was introduced yesterday:

On March 11 the House receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 47 and concurred therein with an amendment, as follows:

"In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert: 'For the construction of trails within the Grand Canyon National Park, $100,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended; Provided, That said sum may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase from the county of Coconino, Ariz., of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within said park, under such terms and conditions as he may deem proper; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct an approach road from the National Old Trails Highway to the south boundary of said park.'"

That is the question that I wish to take up in my remarks.

The amendment is objectionable on the following grounds:

1. Under the statutes of the State of Arizona the said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail can not be purchased by the Secretary of the Interior for the United States from the county of Coconino and any negotiations between the Secretary of the Interior and the county of Coconino would be futile.

2. A new trail from the rim to the bottom of the canyon is not necessary for the reason that there are three accessible trails from the rim to the bottom of the canyon at the present time, two of which are in use, of which one belongs to the National Park Service, and the third, belonging to the National Park Service, is available for use if necessary.

3. There is no paramount necessity for appropriating this sum for a duplication of a road or trail for public use which is being adequately served at the present time, and the capacity of the present road or trails will serve the public for many years to come.

The legal objections to the original item were clearly pointed out to the Secretary of the Interior in a letter addressed to him under date of July 16, 1923 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 11, 1924, p. 4063); but notwithstanding such objections the board of supervisors entered into such illegal contract "in accordance with the letter dictated by Government officials and others while in conference," and these facts were withheld by these Government officials from the Congress when the original item in the appropriation bill was presented.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior stated: "No part of this sum will be paid over to the county until a satisfactory deed has been executed and delivered, vesting full and complete title in the trail in the United States." This statement was clearly intended to convey the idea that the county of Coconino was to receive the $100,000 provided for in the bill, whereas as a matter of fact there was no intention on the part of the Government to pay the county of Coconino one cent, and the only thing the county was to receive was an indefinite promise that the Government would spend $100,000 on a road some time in the remote future.

The objections to the original item can be applied to the amendment, as above stated, and in addition thereto it is to be pointed out that the said item was not included in the Budget as recommended by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. President, this controversy has been up before Congress for some little time.

First, I want to state that under the existing laws of the State of Arizona the trail can not be purchased and can not be sold by the board of supervisors to the Government or anyone else unless the State legislature amends the present law governing toll roads and trails. There are already three trails in existence from the rim to the bottom of the canyon, serving all present needs, and they will serve all future needs for many years to come.

By the following evidence it will be seen that the county of Coconino, Ariz., does not desire to sell the Bright Angel Trail. On March 14, 1924, the board of supervisors of Coconino County, by unanimous vote, passed a resolution opposing the sale of the trail as provided under this item.

I have here a telegram from Williams, Ariz., which I wish to read into the RECORD.

WILLIAMS, ARIZ., March 15, 1924.

Senator RALPH H. CAMERON,

Washington, D. C.:

Board of supervisors in meeting March 10 unanimously declared themselves opposed to sale of Bright Angel Trail as outlined in Hayden bill.

W. C. RITTENHOUSE,

Chairman Board of Supervisors, Coconino County.

To make sure that they had been kept informed and knew of the new proposals, I will read a telegram received from Flagstaff, dated March 13, sent on March 12:

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ., March 13, 1924.

R. H. CAMERON,

127 Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Board of supervisors received the following message from HAYDEN:

"House has adopted the following provisions in place of Hayden amendment to which the board of supervisors objected:

"For the construction of trails within the Grand Canyon National Park, $100,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, provided that said sum may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase from the county of Coconino, Ariz., of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within said park under such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct an approach road from the National Old Trails Highway to the south boundary of said park."

Advise your action.

BURT.

This morning I received a telegram from the clerk of the board of supervisors of Flagstaff, dated Flagstaff, Ariz., Coconino County, March 14:

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ., March 14, 1924.

Hon. RALPH CAMERON,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

By resolution adopted this day the board of supervisors of Coconino County have declared themselves opposed to the sale of the Bright Angel Trail and Toll Road on the terms as outlined by the Hayden bill.

J. B. RICKEL, Clerk.

By the Hayden bill they mean the amendment that is now pending before the Senate.

The Senate, I believe, has been misled as to why this controversy came up. I read from a copy of a letter which I received from the Secretary of the Interior:

NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK,
Grand Canyon, Ariz., April 4, 1923.

The DIRECTOR NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is a brief report on my trip with the Appropriations Committee members, CRAMTON and CARTER, and Congressman HAYDEN, from Grand Canyon through the Navajo country to the Petrified Forest National Monument. Taking up this report where I ended my report of March 31, you will be interested to know that on the evening of the 31st the conference was held at El Tovar on the Grand Canyon road problem and particularly on the proposition of our taking over the road from Maine to the park and expending on that road money to be appropriated by Congress for the Bright Angel Trail. The following were present at the conference:

Congressmen: Hon. L. C. CRAMTON, Hon. C. D. CARTER, and Hon. CARL HAYDEN.

State officers: E. B. Goodman, State engineer.

County officers: Board of supervisors—R. E. Taylor and W. C. Rittenhouse (John Loy was absent); Frank Harrison, county attorney.

National Park Service officials: H. M. Albright, G. C. Bolton, and I. I. Harrison.

Fred Harvey Co.: R. Hunter Clarkson.

I will merely state the conclusions arrived at in this conference, giving you a full report later.

It was agreed finally by the board of supervisors that the county of Coconino would sell the trail for $100,000, this money to be expended by the Federal Government in the construction of a road from Maine to the south boundary of Grand Canyon National Park. It was recognized by all present that the figure of $100,000 represents a little more than the trail is worth, figuring the value on the basis of capitalizing an annual net return to the county of $4,000 or $5,000. We all agreed that inasmuch as Coconino County is the second largest county in the United States with an area of 18,623 square miles, only 11.1 per cent of which is in private hands and therefore taxable, the Federal Government should be very liberal in the matter of purchasing the trail. While, of course, the Members of Congress could not make any commitments for Congress, they feel that the park should take over the road from Maine to the park boundary and reconstruct it and maintain it just as we do the Cody and Jackson Hole projects to Yellowstone.

The first $100,000 appropriation will largely rebuild the very bad stretches of this road, particularly in Spring Valley, north of Maine. I believe that before we are through with the reconstruction of this road we will have to have a total of $250,000. County supervisors will very shortly answer Secretary Fall's letter of July 6, 1922, setting forth the proposal that Congress appropriate not less than $100,000, to be expended on the construction of the Maine road, and upon the appropriation of this sum the county will execute and deliver a deed to the Bright Angel Trail. All present at the conference expressed themselves as well pleased with the outcome thereof. An extra copy of this letter is inclosed for the records relating to the purchase of the Bright Angel Trail.

Cordially yours,

HORACE M. ALBRIGHT,

Field Assistant to the Director.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. President, that the park officials themselves admit secretly that it will take $250,000, but the Congress was led to believe $100,000 was ample. This is just another instance of the deception used in these negotiations. When the real facts came to light, as the result of the wrangle here in Congress, the board of supervisors officially decline to be bound.

I now read a telegram received from Williams, Ariz., March 5, directed to Senator RALPH H. CAMERON, Washington, D. C.:

WILLIAMS, ARIZ., March 5, 1924.

Senator RALPH H. CAMERON,

Washington, D. C.:

I attended meeting with Crumpton and others at Grand Canyon; tentative agreement was drawn there as a basis of which to work. I am opposed to sale of Bright Angel Trail under the terms of that agreement.

R. C. RITTENHOUSE,

Chairman Board of Supervisors, Coconino County.

It has been said here in Congress that there was a unanimous agreement of the board at that meeting, but, as stated in the message I have just read, one member of the board out of three was absent, was not there at all. Mr. Rittenhouse, chairman of the board, never subscribed to the agreement.

A report of Secretary of the Interior Work appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 25, 1924, at page 3053, and quoting from the statement, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] proceeds:

Mr. President, I have heretofore stated that the title of Coconino County in and to the trail has been recognized by the courts and by legislative construction. The county's title can not be disputed. The $100,000 proposed to be paid to Coconino County for the trail is to be expended in constructing, under the supervision of the National Park Service, a road from Maine, a village in Arizona, to the southern boundary of the Grand Canyon National Park, or to the upper or northern terminus of the trail. In other words, the $100,000 proposed to be appropriated is not to be paid into the treasury of the county to become cash at its of the county; the $100,000 will be expended, I repeat, under the supervision of the National Park Service for the construction of a road, some 62 or 63 miles in length, to the national park from the main artery of auto traffic, the Santa Fe Trail to the Grand Canyon.

I have a telegram, dated February 8 last, from Flagstaff, Ariz. Flagstaff is the county seat of the county of Coconino, the county in which is located the national park, and in which, of course, the trail is located and which is, of course, the same county in which the road proposed to be constructed from the Santa Fe Trail to the Grand Canyon is located.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CAMERON. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. Do I understand that the county authorities are opposed to this appropriation?

Mr. CAMERON. Absolutely. The board of supervisors, at a meeting on March 10, unanimously declared themselves opposed to the sale of the Bright Angel Trail, as outlined in the Hayden bill, as they called it, but they meant the first Hayden amendment, which we refused to accept, and which went back to the House, but in the place of which a new amendment has now been proposed, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. BURSUM. The county has title to this trail?

Mr. CAMERON. Absolutely.

Mr. BURSUM. Is there any need for another trail?

Mr. CAMERON. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator and the Senate, that there are now three trails going from the south rim to the bottom of the canyon. One is known as the Grand View Trail, one is known as the Bright Angel Trail, and one is known as Hermit Basin Trail—three wonderful trails. There are trails enough in the Grand Canyon National Park to take care of the needs for scores of years to come.

Mr. BURSUM. If that be the case, what would the effect of this appropriation be; to coerce and browbeat the county authorities into selling their rights in order to give title to the trail to the National Park Service or to the Federal Government?

Mr. CAMERON. That is just what this legislation will amount to.

Mr. BURSUM. And in that way deprive the county of Coconino of larger revenue?

Mr. CAMERON. Last year they received from the trail something between seven and eight thousand dollars, probably a net to the county of between four and five thousand dollars. I say that the county can not sell this trail; but suppose it can, which I deny, then if this amendment is passed it will be used as a club to coerce or browbeat the county into the sale, because everyone knows the park management will exert to the fullest the pressure this amendment provides through threats to build a parallel trail, with the design, of course, to purchase Bright Angel Trail. The park management, already a monopoly-controlled institution, knows that by such threats they can coerce the county, and that is the joker in this latest amendment, which is a substitute to the other effort on their part to consummate an illegal act.

Mr. BURSUM. What is the proportion of public land and forest reserves and national parks to the whole area of Coconino County?

Mr. CAMERON. More than 85 per cent of the area of Coconino County, one of the largest counties in the United States, has been withdrawn, either for a national park, a national monument, a forest reserve, a game preserve, or some other reserve.

I dislike to take up so much time of the Senate in the discussion of this matter, but I believe it is my duty to discuss it fully. For that reason I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate, and I want to quote the record, so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Under date of February 2 I called the Cameron case to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior, contained in the following letter, which appears on page 3497 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1924:

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: With reference to the rights asserted by RALPH CAMERON in certain lands within the Grand Canyon National Park, I have noted the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States affirming the decree in favor of the Government dispossessing CAMERON of certain lands claimed by him that are highly essential to the proper development of the Grand Canyon National Park.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, would it not be feasible to modify the appropriation and give authority to the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate for a lease from the county so as not to deprive the county of its revenue, if it is desirable that the road be under the supervision of the Government?

Mr. CAMERON. I think they have that power now. I continue reading from this letter:

Being under the impression that the matter of actual dispossession of CAMERON was pending in the Department of Justice, I addressed an inquiry under date of January 13 to the Attorney General asking what action had been taken by that department. In reply I have a letter under date of January 25 from the Attorney General in which he recites the status of the litigation and then states:

"Since the entry of these decrees no further action has been taken by this department, nor has any further request been received from the Interior Department for action by us. I presume that if any additional proceedings by this department are desired request therefor will be made by the Secretary of the Interior, under whose supervision the Grand Canyon Park is administered."

I want to say again to the Senate that a great many years ago I built the Bright Angel Trail and also blazed the wagon roads into what is now the Grand Canyon National Park and around the rim for mining purposes. I will further state that for 13 years my associates and I packed ore out of the Grand Canyon and hauled it from the south rim of the Grand Canyon to Flagstaff and shipped it to the nearest smelter at that time, at El Paso, something like a thousand miles away.

I did not go into the Grand Canyon for the purpose of exploring it for a tourist proposition. I went there to seek a fortune, which all prospectors expect to make. I put my hard-earned money into the canyon mines, developed the trails, developed the wagon roads, and helped promote what is now the only railroad there, which extends from Williams, Ariz., the main line of the Santa Fe, into the Grand Canyon National Park.

Mr. President, my motive has been questioned by a Member of the House of Representatives in leading the opposition to this proposed sale, and I want the people of the United States to know, and I want the Senate of the United States to know, that I never had a motive in my life that was not honorable and aboveboard. I stand here to-day and defy any man within the confines of the United States to say otherwise, and especially do I denounce the tactics, the innuendo, the desired implication and inferences made on the floor of the lower House as to my standing, my motives, my every act in connection with this matter.

I have done as much to develop the West, possibly, as any other individual. I was exploring the Grand Canyon and pioneering the West, preaching to the world its possibilities before some of these men, so vicious in their attacks on me, ever knew there was a Grand Canyon, and when any man will go out into the country, representing the Government, and go into a meeting on the south rim of the Grand Canyon and go into collusion to try to beat a county out of its just assets and then come down here to Washington and place the matter before Congress, putting it in the light of a great public policy, clothing it with a sugar coating, it is about time that we had another investigation, to find out what is going on, and I say here to-day that if this matter goes on any further I will offer a resolution in the Senate and have this fully investigated, and I will show up the methods behind this kind of legislative procedure. It is about time that some action was taken when such a thing is attempted toward a man who has been elected by the people of his State to represent them, a man who has lived in the State for 41 years. I had the privilege of representing my State in the Congress when the forty-eighth star was put in the American flag, as the distinguished Senator from Ohio (Mr. WILLIS), now presiding over the Senate, knows, since he was a Member of Congress at that time.

I have been elected by the people of my State to the United States Senate. I was not elected by Republicans, because there are not enough Republicans down in Arizona to elect a man to the United States Senate. I was elected by the people—Democrats, Republicans, Socialists, or whoever chose to vote for me. I am here, elected by the people of my State, and I reluctantly referred to the vicious attacks made on me and my motives in the other House, which was carried in glaring headlines in the press.

I say that my personal privilege permits me to denounce these attacks as wholly untrue and unwarranted. I helped create the county of Coconino, where I lived many years. I spent my hard-earned money and went to the legislature. I went down there as an honest citizen and had a bill passed creating the county of Coconino. The county seat was placed at Flagstaff, and I was appointed by the governor as the first sheriff of that county. Afterwards I was elected twice, and served that county, and after having served three times I was elected chairman of the board of supervisors for four years, and while I was still serving as a member of the board of supervisors I was elected on the Republican ticket as the last Delegate to Congress.

Yet when a man stands upon the floor of the Senate or the floor of the House and asks, "Who is RALPH CAMERON," with caustic gestures, desiring to have the country know me in the wrong light, I tell you it is going too far. I never intend to make a statement on the floor of the Senate that will hurt the name or character of any man or even make a suggestion that any Member of the other body of Congress is not entitled to his views or his own ideas about any piece of legislation and entitled to fair play; entitled to the treatment that they will get from me, which will always be on the square.

I am in earnest about this matter. This $100,000 item was knocked out, and now they come back with what I call a blanket amendment. It does not specify anything in particular. The only purpose in it is to put a club over the board of supervisors of Coconino County, in the State of Arizona. I ask every Senator, why do you want to throw away the people's money? We tried here the other day to help the farmers of the Northwest, but the bill was voted down. I am asking you to-day not to appropriate the people's money and throw it away in this manner. It is the first time, I believe, that a Senator ever had to stand on the floor of the Senate and beg the Senate not to appropriate money to be used in his own State, but I do it because the money is not needed. The money should not be appropriated, and every Member of the Senate before he votes for it I hope will give it the due consideration which I know it deserves.

I know what is behind this matter and an investigation of it would result in proving my contention, and the Senate and the people of the United States would then realize that I know whereof I speak to-day. I dislike very much to have to stand up here and make this kind of a statement to the Senate on a proposition that is so unjust. We are not legally or morally justified in appropriating one 10-cent piece of this money, and if it is appropriated and the item goes into the bill, and the bill becomes a law, I shall fight it in the courts as long as I live. I am right about this matter. The people of Arizona are behind me. The people of Coconino County are behind me. The people of the United States, when I get through, will say that I have done well; that I have done a good job. I am going to keep on fighting until I know that I am vindicated from these slurs and insinuations that have been heaped upon me without any justification whatsoever. Senators, read the Record of the 3d of March, pages 3489 and 3494, and you will see what a well-thought-out distortion of facts has done to my character and integrity. It had the desired effect, in fact, to color the issue. I am made out as a carpetbagger, an interloper, a meddling somebody trying to block a great Government policy just because I raised my voice in protest and said it shall not be done, because the proposition is illegal, unwarranted, unjustified, and I shall never subscribe to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report, which will be read.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator desire to have the report read?

Mr. SMOOT. The report merely carries those items on which there is an agreement.

Mr. ASHURST. It carries simply the items about which there is no dispute?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I ask that the motion be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 6, 10, 34, 40, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, and 59.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 37, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 48, 49, 50, 51, 61, and 62, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "$9,000: Provided, That the four inspectors shall not receive per diem in lieu of subsistence for a longer period than 30 days at any one time at the seat of government"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and each of said tribal attorneys: Provided further, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall dispense with the attorney for the Creek Tribe not later than September 1, 1924, and the commissioner shall dispense with any other tribal attorneys at any time their services are no longer needed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Provided, That except upon the individual order of the Secretary of the Interior, no part of this appropriation shall be used for the support or education at said school of any native pupil brought from Alaska who enters after January 1, 1925"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$160,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That no part of the money appropriated under this paragraph shall be expended for the development of electric power until the Secretary of the Interior shall have secured, subject to the needs of the Boise project, a contract with the Gem Irrigation district, providing for the purchase by that district, for a period to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of the electric power necessary for the irrigation of the lands of said district: And provided further, That the rates in such contract shall be sufficient to include interest at 5 per cent per annum on the cost of such power development plus a reasonable depreciation on the power plant, as found by the Secretary of the Interior, and that the contract shall provide that before delivery of power in any season the district shall furnish security satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior to insure payment to the Government of the power charges for such season, and that such contract shall be entered into only in the event that the holders of not less than 90 per cent of the face value of the bonded and warrant indebtedness of the district shall subordinate their claims to the obligations of the district to the Government under such contract: And provided further, That in the event power is furnished from the said power plant to more than one contractor, then the rates for power shall be fixed so that each such contractor, including said district, shall pay only its proper proportionate share of said interest and depreciation, as found by the Secretary of the Interior"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,706,482"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 1, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 36, 38, 39, 47, 58, and 60.

REED SMOOT,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. J. HARRIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
FRANK MURPHY,
C. D. CARTER,

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.

March 13, 1924.

Resolved, That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 36, and 58 to the bill H. R. 5078, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes," and concurs therein:

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 47, and concurs therein with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert: "For the construction of trails within the Grand Canyon

National Park, $100,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That said sum may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase from the county of Coconino, Ariz., of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within said park under such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct an approach road from the National Old Trails Highway to the south boundary of said park."

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 60, and concurs therein with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert: "$365,000."

That the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 38, and 39, and asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. CHAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. CARTER be the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is this matter going to be taken up in further detail at this time?

Mr. ASHURST. I shall only want a few minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to be discourteous to Senators, but I do not want to have the joint resolution laid aside for the day.

Mr. ASHURST. I think we can dispose of the item in 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Now the subject matter is before the Senate for discussion.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is, if I correctly apprehend it, that Senate amendment numbered 47 be agreed to as amended by the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. SMOOT. In order that the Senator may know the situation that has just developed I will state that there is one other Senator who desires to speak upon the subject. If the Senator from Arizona desires to conclude his remarks at this time, well and good, he may proceed, but when he gets through with his remarks I shall then have to ask that the conference report be laid aside so as to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. ASHURST. Is there another Senator who wants to speak on the same amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. So if the Senator from Arizona wants to proceed with his remarks now, there is no objection, but I shall have to ask that the conference report be laid aside at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. ASHURST. I assure the Senator that I shall be very brief. My remarks may be deep, but they will not be long.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent if the Senator will yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the conference report be temporarily laid aside. There are other Senators who desire to speak upon it, and I promised the Senator from Nebraska that I would not take a longer time than has already been consumed.

Mr. ASHURST. When will the able Senator from Utah bring up the conference report again?

Mr. SMOOT. At the very first opportunity.

Mr. ASHURST. Will that be this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I shall endeavor to call it up on Monday next.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not desire that the unfinished business shall be laid aside again this afternoon for the conference report. I will say to the Senator. If we can complete the consideration of the joint resolution to-day, then, of course, the conference report may come up; but I think we have already laid aside the unfinished business too long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the conference report will be temporarily laid aside, and the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President, and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is absent from the Chamber. I promised to protect him during his absence. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fess	McKinley	Shields
Ashurst	Fletcher	McNary	Shipstead
Ball	Frazier	Mayfield	Simmons
Bayard	George	Moses	Smith
Borah	Gerry	Neely	Smoot
Brandegee	Hale	Norris	Stephens
Brookhart	Harris	Oddie	Swanson
Broussard	Harrison	Overman	Trammell
Bursum	Howell	Owen	Underwood
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Phipps	Warren
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Weller
Caraway	Kendrick	Ralston	Wheeler
Couzens	King	Reed, Mo.	Willis
Curtis	Ladd	Reed, Pa.
Dill	Lodge	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, when I gave way to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to present the conference report I had remarked that not all change is progress, and that there is a good deal of confusion in the minds of legislators and in the minds of the country over that proposition.

Just as soon as somebody becomes a little bit dissatisfied because he finds that the weather, for instance, is not really congenial on the 4th of March, he starts an agitation to change the Constitution of the United States. Always there can be found somebody to second the motion. As it is a change, and as change seems to be the order of the day, we speedily find some ambitious gentleman in one or the other of the Houses who wants to be regarded as really progressive, and not only in advance of public opinion but a mile in advance of everybody else, rushing in with a proposition to change the Constitution. I undertake to say that about two-thirds of the agitation back of the proposition to change the time for the beginning of the presidential term has been occasioned by a few bad storms about the 4th day of March.

Now, we are asked to change to January. One good sleet storm in January on the day of inauguration and the cry will go forth again for another change. If we put the date over into the summer time, when the flowers are blooming and the air is balmy, if we happen to have a thunderstorm there will be another agitation for a change. And so the cry is for change, change, change.

Some man has a fight with his wife. He gets a divorce. Then somebody wants to change all the divorce laws of the country. Along comes another crowd of people who want to abolish the marital relation altogether. I have forgotten the name by which they call themselves, but they have some adherents in this country. Of course, there is an innumerable multitude of people who have always wanted to change the Bible. Now, we have some other gentlemen who want to change the rules or the discoveries of science. The old maxim that existed before Voltaire wrote one of his satires was that "everything that is right." We now have reversed that and have adopted, instead of it, "everything that is wrong."

Of course I agree, and everybody agrees, that if in the lapse of time and experience it has been found that there is some provision of the Constitution which seriously impedes the progress of the country, which constitutes an embargo upon the advancement of the country, after mature and serious consideration and an absolute determination that we are right as to our facts and that the new remedy does not carry within its womb greater evils than the provision we are about to change, then change, of course, is permissible. Here, however, is a proposition brought to us, and its nonutility and its mistake is well illustrated by the pending amendment to the proposition, which is that a President shall be elected for six years, and shall thereafter be ineligible for reelection.

What is the argument that is advanced? Let us weigh it for just a minute.

We are told that the President, when he takes his seat, becomes the head of a political party. The intimation is that he plays politics all through his first term in order that he may be elected a second time, and that this is a very bad and wicked thing; that there is something terrible about a President trying to conduct himself in the first term of his office so that the people may reelect him. Using the term "politics" in its offensive sense, and applying that to the acts of the President, they declare that we ought to have a man who, by virtue of the impossibility of his reelection, is lifted into that pure and exalted atmosphere where he will pay no attention whatever to politics.

Mr. President, if that were to be the result, if the premise is correct, then you could do nothing more undemocratic, more unrepulic, more opposed to human liberty than to carry out that particular scheme.

For my part, as long as I live in this country I want no man to hold a legislative or executive office who does not know that if he misbehaves himself he shall answer to the people by a defeat at the next election. If he has no further ambition for himself, I want him to know that he will defeat in the next election the party and the people who advanced him to power.

What are the evils springing from a President playing politics? Let us reduce the question to what it really is. It means that in the conduct of his office the President has so conducted himself as to commend himself and his administration and his party to the good will of the people of the United States. Take that incentive away from him, and you have set up a man who will or who may proceed without regard to the opinion of the people of the United States, without regard to the wishes of others. He will follow the bent of his own mind; will gratify, if you please, his own prejudices; will satisfy, if you please, his own peculiar ambitions. Knowing that he is at the end of his road anyway, he will then proceed to set up an executive department dominated by the will of one man and responsible to nobody. That is a distinct step back toward tyranny, and the only two things which relieve it from a condition of absolute tyranny are the shortness of the term and the fact that the power of impeachment rests in Congress.

But, sirs, if you would have this office entirely independent, so that nobody's opinion is to be considered except that of the particular individual who happens to be President, why not further amend the Constitution and take away the power of impeachment? Then you would have a man who could sit in that pure, white light of selfishness and self-interest, responsible to nobody, the pure, white light wherein you are beyond anybody's touch or responsibility to anybody. A proposition of that kind answers itself. It is a monstrous thing to contemplate.

Who are these Presidents we elect? Are they supermen, are they demigods, that they should work their will unchallenged, and be responsible to no one? For the most part—indeed, I may say as to all of them—they have been men who have, I think, tried to do their duty as God gave them the light. But they have only been men. Nothing is so much to be deplored in American life as the adoration of a man who happens to get to be President of the United States. I respect that great position; but I respect the position. I do not fall down and worship the individual. I do not subordinate my judgment to his because he happened to be elected President any more than I would subordinate my judgment to that of one of my colleagues here whose opinions I respect. It is mere slavishness for any man to do that. It is contrary to the spirit of our Government. It is utterly contemptible. It does not belong under the American flag.

Let us take two examples, and let us take them in as kindly a spirit as we ought to entertain for those whom we respect. President Harding was a Member of this body for four years. He was a man of good mind, good impulses, good purposes; but did any Member of this body, or any considerable number of the people of the United States, accept a proposition as a verity, or a philosophy as the embodiment of all wisdom, because Senator Harding happened to adhere to that particular view? On the contrary, we challenged his opinions, as we did the opinions of any other Member of this body. We did not find him invincible in debate, insurmountable in logic, unconquerable, or omnipotent. He passed in and out of this Chamber as unobserved as the other Members.

The day after his election to the Presidency, however, he was followed through the streets of the city as a Roman conqueror in his march of triumph. But he was the same man; good, amiable, honest, fair, but just a human being. The election had not changed him a bit. It had not added one cubit to his stature.

That was followed by a sentiment in this country in which the press joined, in which the pulpit sometimes joined, and in which the people joined, that the President had said this thing or taken certain positions, and it was a "Thus saith the Lord," and everybody was to accept it. But the President was just as likely to be mistaken as the Senator had been.

We had another amiable gentleman who presided over this body. We all liked him just about as we liked each other. We would not accept his ipse dixit on a point of order. We unhesitatingly challenged his rulings on points of order, and he was generally wrong. By the accident of death, a most unfortunate and deplorable accident, he became the President of the United States. Again he did not add one cubit to his stature.

What has this to do with the case? Everything. The man who happens to be President of the United States is just as selfish, just as circumscribed, just as human, just as dangerous, just as safe the day after he is elected as he was the day before, except that now he is given a very much greater power. The checks upon that power are threefold—the independence of Congress, which can always control in great emergencies; the right of appeal to the courts, and the power of impeachment. These checks in practical application do not half so well restrain the ambition or the prejudices of an Executive as the fact that there is a great and watchful constituency to whom at the end of his term of office he must report, and whose approval he must gain if he be reelected to office. If the principle now demanded as to the Executive be correct, it should be applied equally to Senators and Members of the House. The cry should go forth that these men should legislate without responsibility, because they would have no chance to continue in office by demeaning themselves in a manner suitable to the office.

So the argument would proceed, that you are playing politics constantly in the Senate, and therefore that incentive should be taken away from you, and when you are once elected here, you should be elected for a fixed term, and at the end of that term retire to private life, and thus you would be placed in a condition of independence. That argument has been made. It was urged that Senators should be elected for life, but that was defeated, for the wise framers of the Constitution knew that any body of men not responsible to a constituency might become a tyrannical body of men, and that any body of men responsible to a constituency would play politics—that is to say, they would try to so deport themselves that their people would approve of their conduct at the polls—and the wise fathers chose the latter alternative.

But if it be true that the President could be placed in a position of nonresponsibility to a constituency, if the fear of defeat or the hope of reward by a reelection should be taken away from him, and because of that condition he could rise at once to superior heights; if that be a sound argument as to the Executive, it is equally sound as to both branches of Congress. But we did not adopt that theory. We adopted the theory of direct responsibility, and, if you want to use the term, we adopted the theory that was intended to make every man who holds a public office, outside of the Federal judiciary, constantly play politics, play politics in the broad, the comprehensive, and the high sense of endeavoring to conduct himself so that he will meet the approval of his constituency at the oncoming election.

Moreover, if it be true that the President has played politics in the vile sense, not in the sense in which I just used the term, if he has in the composition of his nature that element which leads him to play cheap and vile politics in the great office to which he has been elevated—if there be such a man as that, unrestrained by the hope of reward, by the hope of reelection—he is exactly the kind of man who would abuse those powers the moment the restraint was taken off.

Mr. President, one ought not to have to talk a great while on a question of this kind. There is not much use of talking about it. The Senate is not considering it. I would say that the Senate was absent this afternoon largely because it does not want to hear me talk, but the Senate has been equally absent when other Senators have talked on the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Jones of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will have to keep in mind that there are four or five special investigations going on, I do not know but what we will have to provide for a special investigation in each of the four corners of the Senate Chamber and let them be conducted here, where we can have Senators close at hand.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I understand that is the reason; but we are not considering the pending question. There is no personal reflection upon myself. There is a better attendance now than we have had during the day. The same thing has occurred when other Senators have tried to discuss the matter, and I am not criticizing my fellow Senators for not being here. The fact is we are about to act upon a very important question, and when the bell rings and the roll call begins our fellow Members will come in and vote.

There is another proposition to which I desire very briefly to advert—that a man can not under any circumstances succeed himself. Now, think of that. It is easy enough to imagine a great war at its very flood height, the White House occupied by the wisest and greatest man of the day, whose hand is upon the helm of the ship, guiding her through the storms and the dangers, when the unanimous voice of the American people would demand his retention in office, when there is no one to take his place; in the face of that emergency the people would find their hands tied by this constitutional amendment.

Imagine, if you please, a condition similar to that which existed in revolutionary days. Suppose some reformer had put through a resolution that a man could only command the Continental Army for four years and should be ineligible to succeed himself, and suppose in the height of that struggle George Washington's term had expired? Nor does the six-year term lessen it, because a man might be in the last year of that term when the war occurred, and there might lie ahead five or six dark and bloody years when the one great mind, best capable, not alone capable, but best capable of meeting the emergency would be relegated out of office and some inferior man placed in his stead because the Senator from Georgia had some years before offered a resolution and it had been adopted as a part of the Constitution.

I am in favor of rotation in office, but I am not in favor of saying to any man who is President that accession to the Presidency is the end of his ambition, but to hold before him every possible reward which comes from good conduct, and the ignominy and disappointment of defeat as the penalty for failure to conduct himself as best suits the American people. That is the whole theory of our Government—that the American people are capable of self-government, that this is their Government, and that it is safe to refer every question back to them frequently, and so when it is proposed that a man in office shall not play politics, by which I mean conduct himself so that he will meet with the approval of the American people, it is proposed in the same breath to say that the American people are incapable of passing upon the conduct of their officers. If that be true, then democratic government is a failure. So, Mr. President, I hope the amendment to the resolution will be defeated.

I desire now to give a few moments attention to the resolution itself. In the first place, if it be any part of the reason for the introduction of the resolution, we get very little better weather in January than we do in March; and I do not mean to say that is the reason which impelled the author of the resolution, but that is the biggest reason for the agitation. Washington wants every four years a great gala week. It wants parades, large congregations of people from different parts of the Nation. It loves the sound of brass bands. The hotel keepers love the sound of the shekels that are piled down on their counters to pay the outrageous prices which they extort from the pilgrims who journey to the Capital of the Nation. The whole performance ought to be abolished. The President of the United States ought to walk into the Supreme Court as a private citizen and hold up his hand and take the oath of office and go back to the White House, and that ought to be the end of the business; or he might appear in this Chamber or in the House of Representatives or even take the oath in the White House itself.

We instinctively run to the old aristocratic and kingly form. They once had in the early days a procession of the President down to the Capitol. Washington wore his sword and carried his cocked hat. It was a cheap imitation of the courts of kings and the parade of monarchs that even Washington had not been able to get away from. But it had no business in a republic, and Jefferson abolished it. While the thing itself is trifling, the effect of example is often far-reaching; and I question whether Mr. Jefferson ever did any other thing—save the four or five mighty projects which came from his brain—that had a more beneficial effect than when he offered the example to the great democracy of this country of a simple private citizen taking his oath of office in a quiet and unostentatious manner and assuming the powers of that office as an officer of a republic and not as one possessed of some sort of kingly prerogative. He furnished an example, and it was adhered to until recent years. He sent his messages to the House and to the Senate in writing.

Did they lose any virility or force by virtue of that? Whose learning, whose wisdom, has been the better stamped upon the history of the country? That of the simple citizen who served his people and who retired from that service the same simple citizen.

But we have had all that changed. Now we must parade to the other end of this Capitol with form and ceremony. The two Houses of Congress must be called to order. Committees must be appointed to wait upon the great man who is about to appear. The gavel falls; a hush settles over the assembly; and a little fellow, with a piping voice, rushes up the aisle as excitedly as though he was about to announce the presence of a new god, and exclaims, "The President of the United States!"—an exact reproduction of the sickening performance that has taken place in every kingly court since medieval days and before. Then the great man appears—this ordinary man. He may be a wiser man than most people, but he is just a man. He reads his impressive document. Then the committee forms, solemnly escorts him into the corridors, where he vanishes from sight, and one would think the sun and all the stars had disappeared, and that hope for human beings had died out because the demigod had left us.

Mr. President, it may not be poetical, and it may be bad taste, to use the expression, but I want to remark, in the vernacular of old Missouri, that "it makes me tired," this tinsel and this fustian, this disposition to put on parades, to make displays, to try to elevate an ordinary man into a sort of imperial personage, whose little finger is thicker than other men's loins, whose spear is a hundredweight, when, as a matter of fact, he is just an ordinary man, and you could put him on the other side of a table from you in a lawsuit and call in any good ordinary country lawyer and test his metal to his discomfiture; or if he be a newspaper man you could call in a dozen penny-a-liners who could write as good an article; or if he be a student of the Constitution you could bring a thousand other men who could teach him the principles of our great fundamental law.

The business of a President is not to be continually interfering with legislation, is not to be buttonholing Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. It is to lay before these bodies his recommendations in a dignified and proper manner and then to concede that there may be some other men besides himself who are in earnest, and that these proper representatives of the people, having had suggested to them a line of thought or a course of conduct, will weigh the propositions wisely and without interference by the Executive. It is time to begin to understand these things. So I say I should like to see them all abolished. That is a long digression from the 4th of March and inaugural parades, but it is all part of the same thing.

Coming now to substantial objection to this proposition, under the present Constitution when an election is held there exists an organized Congress, a body that is functioning and which constitutes the legislative branch of the then existing Government. To that organized body is consigned the business of counting the electoral votes and of determining the result. When it has been determined and the 4th of March rolls round, the man who has been declared elected by that organized body—a body that has been in existence for two years—takes his seat.

What is the proposition contained in this measure? It is that the old Congress shall expire on the first Monday in January and that the President's office, in like manner, shall expire on the third Monday in January. The new Congress, which has met two weeks prior, may or may not be organized by the date fixed for the inauguration of the President. It is entirely conceivable that when this body gets together there will be an enormous number of Members whose seats are contested; that upon the face of the returns or by reason of chicanery a majority may be created which does not exist. At the same time it is conceivable that there may not be an election by the Electoral College, and this body unorganized, which is going to constitute the new Congress, is called upon to act with reference to the selection of an Executive. I am not saying that these things will occur; but they are within the possibilities.

Well organized as it was, the Republican majority in the House of Representatives at the beginning of the present session of Congress found great difficulty in getting its machinery in operation.

We found some difficulty here in the election of the chairman of a committee. Conceive the condition of the growth of a third party or of a fourth party until there is a wide diversity of political opinion; and it is entirely within the possibilities, aye, even the probabilities, that on the third Monday in January the House will be in a state of absolute disorder, with no organization then effected, and the term of the existing President expiring. All that is avoided by allowing the Constitution to remain as it is, for, as matters now stand, the old Congress, the organized body, the body which has been functioning for two years, and which is the Government at that time, in so far as the legislative branch is the Government, proceeds to the counting of the electoral votes, and we avoid the difficulties which I have just mentioned. So it seems to me the weight of the argument and the weight of the reasoning are against the change that is proposed.

Let me offer a further observation for the consideration of the Senate.

It is said, as the chief argument for this change of the term of the President and the Congress, that too long a time elapses between the election and the assembling of Congress; and I believe that to be the argument that has been most potential with Senators. Let us examine that.

In the first place, it is said that 13 months elapse before the will of the people, expressed at the polls, can find expression in legislation, and that that is too long a time, and therefore that we ought to change the Constitution so that the result of an election shall be immediately felt.

It is an utter fallacy to declare that it is necessary for the assembling of Congress to be postponed for 13 months. If I am not mistaken in my judgment, that is purely a matter of statute. Congress could by law provide for the assembling of Congress on the 4th day of March succeeding the election. Is not that the view of the Senator who introduces this measure?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President, if the Senator wants me to answer his question; it is true that Congress could fix any day.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. But I want to suggest to the Senator that if the time were fixed by statute on the 4th of March, it would mean that every Congress would miss the best part of the year, when the best work can be done, in the wintertime, and would always be in session during the hot season.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I thought we would get back to the weather report in some way or other.

Mr. NORRIS. We would get to it there. We could not escape it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not think there is anything in it, as I shall try to demonstrate in a minute. So, now, all we have to do to provide for a meeting on the 4th day of March is to pass a statute, and then, instead of having to wait these 13 months, we should only have to wait until the 4th day of March; and I presume, as has been suggested, that we could fix it just as well on the 1st day of January if we wanted to. Then we would have a President holding over until the 4th of March and a new Congress that had just been elected going in on the 1st of January.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In that case we would make the present short session still shorter, because every other Congress would expire on the 4th day of March on account of the expiration of the term, and instead of having from December until March we would only have until January.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Exactly; and we would start in on this glorious new session just exactly at the time the Senator says we ought to start.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but we would have to stop on the 4th of March.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Why?

Mr. NORRIS. We would still have a short session.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Why?

Mr. NORRIS. Because the term would expire.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The term of what? Oh, the term of Congressmen?

Mr. NORRIS. The term of one-third of the Senators and of all of the Members of the House. That is the reason why one of our sessions now is a short session, because of the expiration of the term.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. If we put the date of meeting one month later, and made it January instead of December, we would only shorten the short session by a month.

Mr. REED of Missouri. However, we are discussing a hypothetical matter. Let us discuss it as it is. Congress can fix the time of the meeting of the Congress succeeding the election as of the 4th day of March, and it is proposed in this joint resolution that the meeting shall be on the 1st day of January. Now, what is the actual difference of time? About 60 days, is it not—January and February? You make a change of 60 days in the time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption there, he must not forget that by fixing it as it is fixed in this amendment it is the new Congress and not the old Congress.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am coming to that. I am talking now about the proposition of the new Congress. The new Congress, under the Senator's joint resolution, would take its office on the 1st day of January, and certainly it could not be expected to do very much until after the President had been inaugurated, which would be the third Monday in January. Now, how much time do you actually save? If you change the present statute so that Congress meets on the 4th of March, the President being inaugurated on the 4th of March, the new Congress is really delayed in its action the difference between the third Monday in January and the 4th of March. That is to say, the net gain is about 38 to 40 days. That is not worth the effort of changing the Constitution. That is all you gain. If it is desired to have the new Congress meet on the 4th of March every other year, I shall be glad to vote for that sort of a statute. Figuring your entire scheme down, now, you are going to gain about 35 days of the winter months, which you say is the best time to legislate; so you get nothing substantial out of that. It seems to me, when you come to analyze that proposition down, that there is nothing in it.

Now, I want to offer the final observation that I have to make. I know there is a theory in the minds of many splendid men, many thoughtful men, that the voice of the people should be immediately heard and the mandate of an election instantly put into effect. Therefore, they say that we should hold an election to-day, swear in the officers to-morrow, and go to work the next day, and that anything short of that is a denial to the people of the right of control. That is a fascinating argument, but that is an argument quite contrary to the one that has to be advanced in support of a joint resolution that a President can be elected only once in order to keep him from playing politics—that is, asking the good will of the people. But the fathers of this Republic, the students of constitutions and of laws are of one opinion, as far as I know, upon the proposition I am about to state, and that is that the danger to a republic lies in hasty and improvident action; that while the utmost liberty of action must be allowed to the people in the expression of their will, nevertheless we must get entirely away from hasty and improvident action. That is the reason, sir, why it was written into the Constitution itself that it could not be changed until a joint resolution approved by two-thirds of both branches of the Congress had submitted the proposition and until it had been approved by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. That is the reason, or one of the reasons at least, why we have provided for two Houses of Congress—in order that a mistake that is made, an improvident action taken, may be checked in the other House and examined, and some possible mistake prevented.

It has been argued that the fixing of the 4th day of March was purely an accident.

I am of the opinion that it had a very much sounder reason—not the fixation of that particular day, but the fixation of a day somewhat later than the election. That reason is that there is a period of reflection, of discussion, of debate, of thoughtfulness, to intervene between the day of the election, with all of its excitement and its turmoil, and the period when those elected shall assume the duties of government. It is a brake upon the car, if you please. It is better to act a little slowly and to act wisely than it is to act hastily and improvidently. There is no man in this Chamber—and there are men here of many years of legislative experience—who can point to a single instance where the people have been deprived of any substantial right because the old Congress held over for 90 days or 120 days after the election. There have arisen no emergencies of such character that they could not await consideration after the 4th of March. There have failed to pass in these short sessions some laws that would have been passed if the session had been much longer, and to which the newly elected Congressmen were absolutely opposed, and which the new Congress would not have passed, and did not pass.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In that case the old Congress would never have a chance even to consider the matter.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, yes; the old Congress would have been in just that much longer, and would have done their work.

Mr. NORRIS. The old Congress would not have had that short session. The Senator has argued that some bad laws have failed in short sessions that would have done injury if the session had been longer and they had passed. My answer is that if this amendment is agreed to, and becomes part of the Constitution, there would be no such short session of Congress; there would be the new Congress.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; under the proposition of the Senator the Congress would enter upon its duties on the first Monday in January, and it would or might continue in session for an entire two years, with a mere formal adjournment to begin a new term. Under those circumstances the character of legislation of which I speak, which I say has been frequently defeated in the short session and was not taken up by the new Congress, would have simply been started earlier in the session, and would have gone through. Frequently in my judgment the short session has been a blessing, because something that I thought was very wrong was being attempted, and the lapse of time stopped it.

I do not understand the Senator when he says that this wipes out a short session, and, therefore, wipes out that evil. It is true it wipes out the short session, but it gives us two sessions of a year each, and all of the last one to complete the bad work I am discussing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will call the Senator's attention to an incident that happened just recently, and I do not know but that the Senator had it in mind. The Senator is saying that the short session, by reason of it being short, sometimes is responsible for the defeat of desirable legislation which would be enacted if the session were longer.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest to the Senator that if this were a part of the Constitution, the Congress, which now holds a short session after the election where it has been repudiated, if it is repudiated, would not have any short session; it would be the new Congress. Now let me call the Senator's attention to an incident—

Mr. REED of Missouri. Certainly what the Senator says is true, but the Senator must agree with me that it is not the mere matter of the election with which we have to deal. We have to deal with what the Congress may do.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but it is the election that takes place just before the short session in which the people speak, and I want to call the Senator's attention to an attempt that was made in the last short session—that is, the last session of the last Congress. There was an attempt made by the administration to pass the so-called ship subsidy bill, and I think the Senator and I will agree that if that had been a long session that measure might have been enacted into law, and it was defeated perhaps because it was a short session. At least, that is one of the reasons. But if this amendment had been part of the Constitution, there would not have been any short session of that old Congress. It would have been the new Congress, convened in January, who were opposed to a ship subsidy, and they would not have gotten to first base with it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is a strange style of reasoning. The Senator assumes that the ship subsidy bill was introduced after the election—

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; but there was no attempt made to pass it until after election, and the Senator knows that the people at the election repudiated the idea of a ship subsidy bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Exactly. Then we might just as well abolish all Congresses which meet after election and have no Congress meeting after an election.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator will agree with me that if the President had left the ship subsidy bill for the new Congress to consider and had not tried to get it through at the short session, he could not have gotten anywhere with it, and he could not have gotten anywhere just before election, because he knew Congress would have known the result that would follow.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not agree with that at all. If there had been no short session of the Congress, if the old Congress had expired with the election, of course, then, it would have been necessary to introduce the ship subsidy bill at some time prior to the election, some time between the two biennial elections. I think it would have been introduced, and I think it would have gotten substantially the same vote it did get. I do not know of any lame ducks who voted to help pass it, and, anyway, we beat it by virtue of the lapse of time, lame ducks or no lame ducks.

Of course, if you are going to act upon the theory that a Congress after election shall have so many defeated Members in it that they feel no sense of responsibility, and that they are utterly disregarding of the public interest, then you had better abolish Congress altogether. I again challenge any man in this body to tell me a single law that was passed at a short session that illustrates in any striking manner the evils of the short session, as we call it, or any Congress that held over after an election that, because it held over after an election, passed legislation directly opposed to the will of the people, as expressed at the election, and in such a manner that it could not be rectified at once by the new Congress.

The fact about the matter is that we have talked a great deal about those things, and there is not much in them. If it is a tariff bill which the old Congress enacts, the new Congress can change it. If it is anything in the line of legislation, it can be changed. This is an attempt to change the Constitution, and I think confusion is being produced instead of remedy.

I go back now to the one thing I was speaking of when I digressed, and then I shall cease taking the time of the Senate. I say that a time of deliberation and of repose is necessary after a great election.

In my brief experience I have frequently known of propositions advanced because of some apparent emergency, and Congress excited about them, ready to take some extreme or radical action, but in the course of 30 or 60 or 90 days, the whole problem would be solved by itself, and the country would be saved the curse of some improvident legislation.

The inauguration of a new President and the installation of a government ought to come long enough after every election so that there has been time for consideration, time for counsel, time for organization, time for deliberation. Any proposition that proposes to call together the newly elected Members of Congress at once has within it the great danger of too hasty and too inconsiderate action. The statement of that proposition ought to appeal to every man who is an experienced legislator.

One of the great fathers of this Republic urged that no law be passed until it had been pending for a year, and when it was replied that an emergency might exist demanding immediate action, he answered that the emergency could be met by providing that a law that was to be passed within a shorter period of time should have more than a majority vote.

Bear in mind that this country has run along now for nearly 150 years. We have suffered no serious difficulties on account of our Constitution, or because of the time of election. Why abandon the beaten path, the beaten road, and go into these bypaths of experimentation?

What great evil has arisen? No illustration has been given. The one illustration that was given was that of a bill for a ship subsidy, which was not brought up before an election, but was brought up after an election. It was defeated, and the shortness of time helped to defeat it.

I would rather have a Congress restrained during the last three or four months of its existence by the vote of an election which has already been held than to have a Congress that started out for two years and proceeded during the whole 24 months unrestrained by any intermediate expression of opinion of the people. I am not alarmed by the argument that men having been defeated will then proceed to do something after an election they would not do before. I know of no instance where that has been accomplished. I am not willing to ascribe such base motives to men who hold the position of legislators.

Take the two theories and put them side by side. One is to elect immediately and install in office, and keep in office for two years in almost constant session, this body of men, without any intermediate expression of opinion by the people. The other is to put that newly elected body into office on the 4th of March, and some 150 days before they shall go out of office there is an election. That election, let us say, is against the party in power. The influence is a restraining influence. The body of men whose policies have been repudiated will be less likely to carry them out than they would be if they had been sitting there acting before the election was held at all.

Generally, Mr. President, with the exception of providing a method for amending this Constitution which will give the people of the United States something to say about it, I am opposed to changes of the instrument. Under it we have proceeded from weakness to strength, from smallness to greatness, from a position in the column of nations far removed from the front to the very head of that column. We have seen our population increased from a little over 3,000,000 to over 110,000,000. Our wealth has expanded beyond the conception of the men of 50 years ago. We occupy a great and dominant place on the map of the world. Our good will is sought by every government of earth. Our people are prosperous and happy, save from those misfortunes which fall as the result of improvidence or of providence.

And yet we are not content. Like the children of Israel we must have a new god every day. We must change. We must tinker. There stands the old temple of liberty, its spires blazing in the sunlight of universal approbation, pillars strong, walls as steadfast as when they were cemented first in the blood of the revolution, but somebody has to change the architecture a little. Somebody every day must go in with a chisel and hammer and go to pecking at it. Somebody must do something. It is a wonder to me that this Congress does not adjourn and go out into Statuary Hall and proceed with chisel and mallet and with amateur hands to try to improve on the statuary. Somebody will think that Daniel Webster's nose is too short and be sticking a piece of putty on the end of it in order that it may conform to his own educated taste. I have no doubt there are plenty of men here. If we could imagine such a thing as a legislative Venus de Milo, who would immediately proceed to legislate arms and parts on that statue. Nothing is sacred. All must be changed. All that is is wrong.

Mark you, if you do not do something every day you are not progressive. If this Congress could conceive the thought that it is not the guardian of every human being in the country, that it has a limited scope of authority which it can properly exercise, that the people of the great States of the Union know quite as well what they need as we know what they need, that local self-government is not only a principle but that it will be a fact, that our business is to pass a few simple laws and provide the revenues for the Government; if we could conceive the fact that our wisdom is quite as finite as the wisdom of the folk at home, that at best we are obliged to guess with reference to many of our acts; if we could disband about two-thirds of the bureaus of Washington, if we could turn off three or four hundred thousand of the employees who eat up the substance of the people; if we could really visualize the old thought that freedom consists in the right of the individual to live his own life, conduct his own business, think his own thoughts without let or hindrance, save that he shall not so conduct himself as to circumscribe the rights of his fellow citizens to enjoy similar liberties; if we could understand that this Congress is not the doctor for all creation, that some things have been done wisely in the past by the founders of the Republic, and that half-baked experimentation is a thing intolerable in any Government; if we could remember, Senators, that those governments exist and continue to exist where changes are slow and are thoughtfully taken, that no people has ever established itself as a great people and maintained its dominance through the centuries unless it has had within it an element of conservatism and of care, we might do better.

I see my friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] smiling at me—I do not know whether with approval or disdain, but I hope not the latter. If he will permit a personal allusion, not intended to be uncomplimentary, he originally sprang from a country far to the north, where one of the sturdiest folk on earth ever built a civilization amidst the adversities of nature. They are not an excitable people who change every day. They build, and build securely, and when they make change it is in the nature of addition and not of destruction.

The thing that has made the British people the dominant force that they are in this world is the fact that they have clung through the centuries to one line of ideas. Slowly, cautiously, and determinedly they have proceeded on their course. When England has fixed a policy in her Government she adheres to it. If 200 years ago the British Government had concluded to acquire a certain point of land or a certain island, through the 200 years that intervened she never took her eye off that spot of earth and has continued to adhere to the policy of finally acquiring it. I make that statement merely by way of illustration of a great English characteristic, a characteristic that has made it possible for 38,000,000 Britishers to establish the dominance of the Empire over one-third of the earth's habitable surface, so that, as Webster said, her drumbeat not only followed the sun in its course around the earth but it could now be said that the English flag flutters from pole to pole and kisses alike the icy breezes of the Arctic and Antarctic and the warm winds of the Equator.

But we must change every day—whittle at the Constitution just a little. No disaster has fallen to us through the years because of the time that we meet and organize our Congress. No evil has been pointed out which has befallen us. Just let us have a change; that is all. Let us do something. Well, there are enough tasks, great tasks, that lie within the purview of our authority. We may not agree as to their solution, but it would be well to put our minds to them.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only for a few moments. The real point in this proposed constitutional amendment is that it will enable the representatives of the people of the United States to meet nearly one year earlier than they do under the present structure of our Constitution. Its real meaning is that the people of the United States, when they wish to change and do change their Government, shall have an opportunity through their representatives so changed at an election to have their will recorded through the legislative authorities of this Nation earlier than by the present method, under which the Congress elected in November meets in December a year thereafter.

I am in favor of giving the people of the United States a larger measure of opportunity to express their will through their representatives. In that respect the proposed change in the Constitution would be an improvement; in that respect it would be progressive, because the real meaning of a "progressive" in this country is one who desires to give constantly increasing power to the people. Both of the great parties profess that principle, the principle of desiring the people to rule, but both great parties are divided into those who are progressive and those who are conservative. Each one is entitled to his own opinion. I am in favor of giving a larger measure of power to the American people to enable them to express their opinion as speedily as possible. For that reason I approve this proposed amendment to the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I differ with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who alluded to the attitude of the people of this country toward those who occupy the presidential office. In my judgment there is not anything better for this country than the feeling we have for the men who occupy that high office.

Theodore Roosevelt, William McFinley, Warren G. Harding did not receive a majority of the votes of the people of my State, but every schoolboy in Georgia points with pride to, and is a better boy and will become a better man because of, the lives of the men who have occupied the presidential office and other offices of trust. Those boys never would have known what great men those Presidents were had they not occupied the presidential office and their lives are an inspiration to them.

Mr. President, I wish to say the way the people of this country feel toward Woodrow Wilson is a splendid thing for the whole United States, and every day that will be demonstrated more and more as they come to appreciate what his life and character were as exemplified by his career as President of the United States.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is regarded by both parties as being one of the ablest public men in this country. He has opposed the last two constitutional amendments which have been adopted. I wish to take only a moment of the time of the Senate to read what that Senator said about a six-year term of office for the President. I read from a pamphlet which is being distributed on behalf of Mr. UNDERWOOD for the Democratic nomination for President of the United States. It is entitled "Mr. UNDERWOOD'S Views on Living, Pertinent Issues." Mr. UNDERWOOD delivered a speech the other day in Ohio, and the entire speech was printed in the RECORD. In reference to the President's term, Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

Make the term six years or seven years, and make the Executive ineligible to reelection, and you will have removed all temptation to further personal ambition, you will have taken out of the sphere of partisanship the one man in the country who should stand above and beyond it, and you will have purified the very air of politics itself by giving it worthier motives and loftier ideals.

Mr. President, I have not criticized the men who have held the office of President of the United States. In my judgment no man can be elected President of the United States who is not a good man and an honest man. I have confidence in the people of the United States in their selection of a President, and I think more highly of the men selected by them than do some others. I am proud of that opinion. I am glad the country feels the way I have stated about the men who occupy the position of President and about the presidential office. I am not referring to any particular President; but I do not believe anyone can contradict the statement when I say that every President as soon as he gets into office must, because of the fight which is made upon him by politicians in this body as well as elsewhere in the country, put himself in an attitude of defense. Presidents, therefore, have to play politics. If they should be placed in a position where they did not consider their reelection and should be made ineligible for reelection, Senators and others would not be trying to destroy their prestige because of political differences. The President will not have to play so much politics if his political opponents know that he can not be reelected. They would think only of the merits of measures recommended by the President.

Consider the responsibility and the power which the President has. No king, no other man on earth, has such power as has the President of the United States. Any President can renominate himself with the power and patronage he has at his command, and most of them can almost reelect themselves with the patronage they have. I think that is a danger to the country. I believe that a President should spend all of his time thinking of the good of his country and his duties and not thinking of being reelected.

Mr. President, I recognize it is late, and I hope we may have a vote on the joint resolution this afternoon, so I am not going further to take the time of the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question with reference to his amendment, if I may. I find his amendment, as I read it, is intended to come in at the end of section 3 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

What I have difficulty in understanding is the application of the Senator's amendment at the point. The amendment seems to me to be complete. I suppose that my own view is in some way defective; but as the Senator's amendment reads, he repeats the language of the opening part of Article II of the Constitution in reference to "the executive power being vested in the President of the United States." Then his amendment provides that the President "shall hold his office during the term of six years," and shall be ineligible to reelection; then the Senator's amendment concludes with the language that—

The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

Nothing follows in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, except a short paragraph providing that—

This amendment shall take effect on the 15th day of December after its ratification.

It rather seems to me that the Senator's amendment does not fit into the place where I understand it to apply. There is in the original section of the Constitution to which the Senator's amendment evidently refers the provision as to the manner of election; but the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, as I understand, comes in as an independent and new amendment. Consequently, I do not see how the reference can be made back to the section of the Constitution which we really have in mind. I would appreciate it if the Senator would enlighten me if I am in error about it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I will state that one of the ablest lawyers in the Senate, a member of the Judiciary Committee, prepared this amendment at my request. I have tried for several years to get such a proposal before the Senate. When the late Senator Watson was my colleague he offered my measure and we tried to get the Judiciary Committee to approve it at that time. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], for whom I have high regard, was appointed about two months ago upon a subcommittee of three to consider the amendment proposed by me, along with his joint resolution, but that committee did not have time to consider my amendment. That is why I am forced, in order to get it before the Senate, to offer it as an amendment to the pending joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia has not quite comprehended the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado. If he will examine the language of his amendment and follow it out literally, as the Senator from Colorado suggests, there is great doubt whether it will fit at all where the Senator proposes that the amendment shall come in. I think if the Senator would examine it carefully he would want to change it.

Mr. HARRIS. I will examine it and consult with lawyers in the Senate in regard to it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that I think it is perfectly clear that he intends that his amendment shall take the place of paragraph 1 of section 1 of Article II of the Constitution. If he has the Manual before him he can see where evidently it is intended to come in.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, that might be a more appropriate connection, but as the Senator from Georgia has said he will examine the matter and present the question later, I do not care to say anything about it.

Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that we take a recess, or an adjournment, whichever is preferred, at this hour until Monday. I wish to speak upon the subject at some little length, and I do not care to do so this late in the afternoon. There are very few Senators present. Most of them, in all probability, have gone to their offices, many of them have gone to their residences, and it would be difficult and very inconvenient to Senators to call for a quorum in order to reach a final vote. As in all probability we can not complete the consideration of the joint resolution this afternoon, I think it would be well, and certainly it would be an accommodation to Senators, now to take a recess.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if he desires to discuss the pending amendment or the joint resolution proper?

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to discuss both.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, the Senator would not want the pending amendment voted on until he had an opportunity to debate it?

Mr. SHIELDS. I should prefer to discuss the entire proposition at one time. I will say to the Senator that I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute for the joint resolution, and, if it is agreed to take a recess, I shall offer it now. It would not be in order now, but, by consent, I may present it in order that it may be printed and be considered on Monday.

Mr. NORRIS. I should be very glad to have the Senator present the amendment now if he intends to offer it, and let it be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Out of order, Mr. President, I desire to present an amendment in the nature of a substitute which I shall read. I desire to have it appear in the Record in the form in which I shall read it, and to have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will appear in the Record if the Senator reads it.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is one reason why I shall read it.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Senator is about to offer a substitute for the main joint resolution?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President of the United States shall commence on the third Monday in January following the election of presidential and vice presidential electors.

SEC. 2. The presidential and vice presidential electors, composing the Electoral College, shall assemble in the States by which they are appointed and cast their votes for President and Vice President on the second Monday in December following their appointment, and the vote so cast, duly certified, shall be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January next thereafter, and the Congress shall meet in joint session on the second Monday in January following and open and count the same: Provided, That Congress may alter all the dates fixed in this section, in its discretion.

SEC. 3. The terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 4. There shall be held two regular sessions of Congress, convening on the first Monday of January each year.

SEC. 5. The terms of said officers who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment are hereby changed to conform herewith.

I ask that the proposed substitute be printed in the usual form for distribution and placed on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, referring to my suggestion that a recess be taken, I submit the matter to the Senator from Nebraska.

RECESS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is quite evident to me that we shall not be able to dispose of the joint resolution itself tonight, although I had hoped that we might vote on some of the amendments that are pending. Since the Senator from Tennessee wishes to discuss the amendment, however, and is not prepared to go on to-night, I move that the Senate now take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, March 17, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 15, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We would place ourselves in all reverence at Thy footstool, O Lord, and let Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done in all our hearts. We would have the sense of our personal relationship to Thee be very keen, and may it not grow less in our lives. Let our conduct, our service, and our influence be a direct reflection of the great Teacher of men. When reviled may we revile not, when we suffer may we threaten not, but commit ourselves unto Him who judgeth righteously. God bless our country and all the traditional institutions of the land. Increase the faith of all our citizens in the wisdom and character of our central Government, and may it always receive their support and unflinching loyalty to the glory of God and for the good of our fellow countrymen. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REMARKS ON THE LATE WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I insert the speech of Joseph P. Tumulty March 3, before the Iroquois Club, Chicago, on Woodrow Wilson, as follows:

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Iroquois Club, this is a most wholesome atmosphere; it radiates good nature and friendship for one who 11 years ago turned away from modest professional duties and directed his bark toward the Capital of the Nation to play an humble part in the constructive efforts of a man who, having made his impress upon a Nation and the world, triumphantly passed from the stage of life to play an immortal part in that last home where he now lives in peace and where sorrow no longer touches him.

It is heartening and fine to know that wherever one goes the heart of America seems to respond to the idealism of the great leader, Woodrow Wilson.

If one could have been present at the bedside of Woodrow Wilson as the last faint rays of his life flashed and fluttered, he could imagine that from those lips, now silent in death, these final impressive words of advice of Edmond Dantes came:

"So live, then, and be happy, beloved children of my heart, and never forget that until the day when God will deign to reveal the future to man all human wisdom is contained in these two words—'wait' and 'hope.'"

These two words, "wait" and "hope," sum up the philosophy which underlay the humane policies and broad, constructive statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson. "Waiting and hoping" were the lodestars of his life and his career. "Waiting and hoping" for the days of sweet reasonableness when the cause of world peace for which he engaged in a deathless struggle, gave the last full measure of devotion, would be vindicated—these were the pivots around which his thoughts and his dreams of peace turned. It is, indeed, too bad, my friends, that in this hurly-burly world in which we live—a world unfortunately torn and touched by the deep passions of hatred, the inevitable aftermath of the World War—that those little men who live from day to day, whose eyes seem never to sweep the great horizons of life, fail to steer their course by these two stars—"wait" and "hope."

The present, with its thrills, its adversity, its endless controversy, its expediences, is the tonic of the politician. The future, with its uncertainty, is the stimulant of the statesman. Our trouble is, gentlemen, that we think and assess the value of everything in terms of the present hour, its effect morally, socially, and economically upon the present day. We boastfully say that great events and careers are permanently settled by election returns. Thus we fear to go forward and blaze the way for future generations. And yet no one who reads history aright, whether it be that of America or the world, can find in its great lessons any solace or comfort to sustain a theory so foolish, so puerile, so evanescent. He who bases his action upon the atmosphere of the present day finds himself struggling with the forces of shifting sands. Events in our own Nation's life demonstrate that neither great careers nor grave public questions are ever permanently settled by election returns.

Does not the career of our own beloved Lincoln and the great unifying issue of slavery, which he sponsored with his mighty voice, prove the truth of this assertion? The adversity of elections did not permanently settle the slavery question, nor did the defeat of Lincoln by Douglas in 1856 determine the career of Lincoln. No my friends; Destiny works in a peculiar way its wonders to perform and discredits the present as a safe standard by which to guide our action. Time alone, the great solvent, in the last analysis, is the final determinator. You might as well declare that the solemn referendum of the motley crowd that met on the hill of Golgotha fixed the place in history of the lowly Nazarene, who came to advocate peace, to help the poor and the distressed, to raise the dead, to succor the miserable and the hungry. The politicians who gathered about the cross foolishly thought that that referendum of passion which decreed death to Him who came to help a distressed world was the end, the consummation, of their bitterness and scorn and hatred. But, my friends, the crucifixion of Christ was not the denouement of the tragedy. The resurrection was the vindication of the power and the majesty of the mightiest figure in the world.

Lincoln's friends thought that when, in his struggle with Douglas for the United States Senatorship in 1856, he declared that "a house divided against itself could not stand"; that "no nation could live half slave and half free"—that these declarations would result in his defeat; that this was the end of Lincoln. But Lincoln cynically smiled and said, "It is but the beginning. These declarations may defeat me for the Senatorship of Illinois, but the seed planted by these statements will inevitably elect me to the Presidency." It is a difficult thing in the world of the present, a world full of passion, emotion, and hatred, approximately to estimate or to interpret the career of a man like Woodrow Wilson. Destiny, that inscrutable nuncio of God, seems to laugh to scorn the appraisements of the present. By all the cold, logical standards of the present hour, in the cause of peace for which he struggled, fought, and died, Woodrow Wilson dared with solemnity to do a great, unselfish thing, but failed utterly, miserably. He sought to play the rôle of a Nation's interpreter and to direct the course of those who seemed to have forgotten the covenant of peace, and, like John of old, crying out in the wilderness, called the wandering flock to the right path. But, alas, he did not reach the promised land of peace—the land of his dreams and hopes. But he did not desert the cause of peace. With him peace was never a forlorn hope. He did not surrender and let die "a fire, a fire that is sacred not only now in this country but in all countries for all times."

A famous writer has said that "the prophet is the man who sees with a troubled heart, but with clear eyes, the evil which reigns to-day, the punishment which will come to-morrow, and the kingdom of happiness which will follow punishment and repentance. He speaks in the name of the mute, he is a hand for him who can not write, a defender for the people scattered and oppressed, an advocate for the poor, an avenger for the humble who cry out under the heel of the powerful. He is not on the side of those who tyrannize, but of those who are trodden underfoot. He does not seek out the satiated and the greedy, but the hungry and the wretched. He is a troublesome, importunate, and inopportune voice, hated by the great, out of favor with the crowd, not always understood, even by his disciples. Only the poor and the oppressed bless him. Like all loud truth-tellers, who disturb the slumbering majority, who unsettle the sordid peace of the masters, he is avoided like a leper, persecuted like an enemy. Kings can barely tolerate him; the rich detest him."

And so we are here to-day resolved that the dead shall not have died in vain and with burning hope in our hearts that the valorous cause of peace to which he ordained his life, fought, suffered and gave the last full measure of devotion, shall, in the providence of God working through the efforts of those he left behind, be brought closer to ultimate realization. No ideal like that of peace can be blotted out any more than the everlasting hills can be destroyed. God does not permit waste.

Yes, my friends, Woodrow Wilson is as great and as noble in death as he was in life. With the shroud drawn, partisan rancor, personal hatred, and the envy of little men are held at bay and forever silenced, and now with bared heads we stand in reverential awe before the tomb to honor him who gave his body, his mind, his soul—yes, his very all—for the sacred truths upon which our own Magna Charta was founded; and for the saving of a world from the cruel and blighting plague of war.

With Woodrow Wilson "right was more precious than peace." With him as our leader and inspiration we fought for the things we have always carried nearest our hearts, for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for an universal dominance of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

Woodrow Wilson, with a vision clear, saw the broad horizons of life and sought to interpret the feeling and aspiration of peace that came to him, hot and bloody, out of the trenches; that spirit that has cried down through the centuries for peace, for everlasting peace, the cry that he seemed to hear above the hiss of shrapnel and the roar of the cannonading. Who shall say that the seed of peace, planted by him, freshened by his sacrifices, vitalized by his sorrows, is not again to be renewed by his pains, his sufferings, his death, and will not in God's good time come to real fruition? His vision seemed to see the things that to us were unseen. With unflinching courage he trod the hard, stony way with the hope in his heart that in his deathless struggle for peace, humanity could be saved from a renewal of this barbarous, savage, bloody thing called war. Yes, he not only sought to save the world, but he died to preserve inviolate the landmarks of Christianity and civilization.

And now that this courageous figure has passed from its temporal stage, with charity in our hearts for those whose malice and perfidy conceived unjust attacks upon him, we recall that his enemies laughed his statesmanship to scorn; called it impotent, futile, and without result; said there was no use appealing to moral force in a world in which the forces of civilization were engaged in a veritable death grapple, and yet it requires neither the vision of a seer nor that of a philosopher to understand that the mightiest blows struck at German morale and prestige were those found in the immortal preachments of Woodrow Wilson—preachments that went like shot and shell to destroy what appeared to be the impregnable fortress of German power. Von Tirpitz, in his memoirs, stressed the effect of Wilson's submarine notes.

Ludendorff declared in his book that "the Wilson propaganda that found root in Berlin and finally grew there, eventually convinced the German people that it was not they, themselves, but the Government and militarism that the United States was warring against. This was the seed of dissension that ruined morale at home." Von Tirpitz further states that "only the transmitting to Germany of the threatening notes of President Wilson, when he inveighed against 'my submarine campaign' during the latter stages of the war, prevented Japan from coming to us in a great Germano-Japanese alliance, which would have ended the war at once." The persistent note writing of Woodrow Wilson, so often the subject of song and jest, was as mighty a force in winning the war as the consummate strategy of Joffre and Foch. You recall how the javelins of political slander were hurled at what was called the miserable, puerile policy of watchful waiting. The President's traducers said it was weak, vacillating, contemptible, and yet, my friends, when Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator, faced a crisis in Mexico similar to that which confronted Woodrow Wilson, his policy was essentially the same. This is proven by Government records recently brought to light by Prof. Walter L. Davis, of the history department of the College of Puget Sound. Lincoln, according to these records, watchfully waited and indicated his aversion to aggressive action by appointing as minister to Mexico the very man who had bitterly opposed American interference 15 years before. He also issued the following instructions to his new minister:

"For a few years past the condition of Mexico has been so unsettled as to raise the question on both sides of the Atlantic whether the time has not come when some foreign power ought, in the general interest of society, to intervene, to establish a protectorate or some other form of government in that country and guarantee its continuance there."

"You will not fail," continues Lincoln, "to assure the Government of Mexico that the President neither has, nor can ever have, any sympathy with such designs, in whatever quarter they may arise or whatever character they take on."

You will find in the public utterances of Woodrow Wilson on Mexico the same breadth of vision, the same human sympathy, the same magnanimity as are found in the utterances of Lincoln.

Let me read what Woodrow Wilson said on Mexico when a great crisis in that country confronted him:

"The situation in Mexico," he said, "must be given a little more time to work itself out in the new circumstances. I believe that only a little while will be necessary. . . . We must exercise the self-restraint of a really great Nation which realizes its own strength and scorns to misuse it. I am more interested in the fortunes of oppressed men, women, and children than in property rights whatever. . . . The people of Mexico are striving for the rights that are fundamental to their lives and happiness—15,000,000 oppressed men, overburdened women, and pitiful children in virtual bondage in their own home of fertile lands and inexhaustible treasure."

But in spite of this magnanimity of purpose, his enemies smugly shrugged their shoulders and . . . with disdain:

"Well, what's the use? What can you expect from a dreamer of dreams, a mere doctrinaire? Doesn't Wilson, the historian, know that force and force alone can bring that grisly old warrior, Huerta, to his senses?"

Ah, my friends, it was disheartening to find bitter criticism of this policy from the outside, and depressing to find the enemies of watchful waiting "boring from within" through certain of his cabinet officers.

"And one denies, and one forsakes, and still Unquestioning he goes, who has his lonely thoughts."

The critics of Woodrow Wilson's broad humanitarian policy in Mexico said that the only antidote for what was happening there was force and intervention, and they honorably urged this view upon the President, but without succeeding in bringing about the consummation so dear to their hearts. But little by little, the usurper, Huerta, was being isolated. By moral pressure every day his power and prestige were perceptibly crumbling. His collapse was not far away when the President declared, "We shall not, I believe, be obliged to alter our policy of watchful waiting."

And the campaign of Woodrow Wilson to force Huerta finally triumphed. On July 15, 1913, Huerta resigned and departed from Mexico. Wilson's humanity and broad statesmanship had won over the system of cruel oppression for which the "unspeakable Huerta" had stood.

When Woodrow Wilson advocated a League of Nations, people called him a dreamer, idealist, an altruist, "ahead of his time." But he was indifferent to criticism, and in one of his western speeches said:

"If I felt that I, personally, stood in the way of this settlement, I would be glad to die that it might be consummated."

In an admirable speech on the western trip, broken in health, but indomitable in spirit, calling upon God to strengthen his hand in the battle he was making for peace, Woodrow Wilson said:

"I believe in God. If I did not, I would go crazy. If I thought the direction of the disordered affairs of this world depended upon our finite intelligence, I should not know how to reason my way to sanity, and I do not believe there is any body of men, however they concert their power or their influence, that can defeat this great enterprise, which is the enterprise of Divine mercy and peace and good will."

Woodrow Wilson hated war and dreaded it in all the fibres of his soul—he hated it and dreaded it because he had an imagination and a heart; an imagination which showed his sensitive perception of the anguish and the dying which war entails, a heart which yearned and ached over every dying soldier and bled afresh with each new-made wound.

He understood better than his critics the basis of the Nation's impatience for war, but that in no way hurried him into rash or precipitate action. At a private dinner in Washington he took cognizance of this critical situation, and, addressing a group of Senators and Congressmen and high dignitaries of State, he spoke of the impatience of the country which then manifested itself, saying:

"I wish that whenever an impulse of impatience comes upon us, whenever an impulse to settle a thing some short way tempts us, we might close the door and take down some old stories of what American idealists and statesmen did in the past and not let any counsel in that does not sound in the authentic voice of American tradition. Then we shall be certain what the lines of the future are, because we shall know we are steering by the lines of the past. We shall know that no temporary convenience, no temporary expediency, will lead us either to be rash or to be cowardly. I would be just as much ashamed to be rash as I would to be a coward. Valor is self-respecting. Valor is circumspect. Valor strikes only when it is right to strike. Valor withholds itself from all small implications and entanglements and waits for the great opportunity when the sword will flash as if it carried the light of heaven upon its blade."

They said he was cold, that he was aloof. Yes, like Lincoln, "that brooding spirit had no real familiars." It never spoke out in complete self-revelation. "It was a very lonely spirit that comprehended men without fully communing with them, as if, in spite of all its genial efforts at comradeship, it dwelt apart, saw its visions of duty where no man looked on."

Yes, there was an aloofness and an aloneness about Woodrow Wilson, but it was the aloofness and the aloneness of the mountain peak, looking down upon the valleys and seeing humanity, not as a thing of shreds and patches, a thing divided into races, religions, clans and blocs, but seeing humanity as a big, pulsating whole, made up of struggling men, women, and children of all races and creeds. That great heart of Woodrow Wilson sought to comprehend the interests of these heterogeneous elements and to understand their lives and their tragedies, far away from those artificial lines that divide men.

Woodrow Wilson was not only great, but he was human. But his humanness was made out of too fine a fiber to be used for self-exploitation, nor would he ever permit himself to be so used. The trouble with his peculiar kind of humanness was this—it did not bubble, it did not effervesce, it did not sparkle; and so they called him cold when he was only shy; they called him austere when he was only gentle. But that kind of a man will live in the hearts and thoughts of men forever.

Your remembrance Lincoln's statement that God must have loved the poor because he made so many of them. I am reminded of the passionate devotion and love of the average man which seemed to set on fire every utterance Woodrow Wilson made. Many @ you will recall his address at the service held in memory of those who lost their lives at Vera Cruz, Mexico. On that occasion he said:

"When I look at you, I feel as if I also and we all were enlisted men. Not enlisted in your particular branch of the service, but enlisted to serve the country, no matter what may come, even though we may sacrifice our lives in the arduous endeavor. We are expected to put the utmost energy of every power that we have into the service of our fellowmen, never sparing ourselves, not condescending to think of what is going to happen to ourselves, but ready, if need be, to go to the utter length of complete self-sacrifice. As I stand and look at you to-day and think of those spirits that have gone from us, I know that the road is clearer for the future. Those boys have shown us the way, and it is easier to walk on it because they have gone before and shown us how. May God grant to all of us that vision of patriotic service which here in solemnity and grief is borne in upon our hearts and consciences."

"Life, gentlemen—the life of society, the life of the world—has constantly to be fed from the bottom. It has to be fed by those great sources of strength which are constantly arising in new generations. Red blood has to be pumped into it. New fiber has to be supplied. That is the reason I have always said that I believed in popular institutions. If you can guess beforehand whom your rulers are going to be, you can guess with a very great certainty that most of them will not be fit to rule. The beauty of popular institutions is that you do not know where the man is going to come from and you do not care so he is the right man. You do not know whether he will come from the avenue or from the alley. You do not know whether he will come from the city or the farm. You do not know whether you will ever have heard that name before or not. Therefore, you do not limit at any point your supply of new strength. You do not say it has got to come through the blood of a particular family or through the processes of a particular training, or by anything except the native impulse and genius of the man himself. The humblest hovel, therefore, may produce your greatest man. A very humble hovel did produce one of your greatest men. That is the process of life, this constant surging up of the new strength of unnamed, unrecognized, uncatalogued men who are just getting into the running, who are just coming up from the masses of the unrecognized multitude. You do not know when you will see above the level masses of the crowd some great statue lifted head and shoulders above the rest, shoddering its way, not violently but gently, to the front and saying: 'Here am I; follow me.' And his voice will be your voice, his thought will be your thought, and you will follow him as if you were following the best things in yourselves."

And so, my friends, who shall say that these struggles and efforts for peace of Woodrow Wilson are in vain? How beautifully and artistically does God manipulate the scenes of life and thus weave His immortal spell! Those who execrated Woodrow Wilson, those who knocked, knocked at the door of his sick room, spying upon a weary President, pursuing him like a deer set upon by snarling hounds, are now in the shadow of exile and disgrace, resting under the blight and stigma of a Nation's shame and reproach, while the great spirit of Woodrow Wilson takes flight. From his lofty eminence of fame and everlasting glory we seem to see him looking down upon us through wistful eyes and saying:

"We have begun a fight that, it may be, will take many a generation to complete, the fight against special privilege, but you know that men are not put into this world to go the path of peace. They are put into this world to go the path of pain and struggle. There are men who have fallen by the wayside; blood without stint has been shed; men have sacrificed everything in this sometimes blind, but always instinctive and constant struggle; America has undertaken to lead the way; America has undertaken to be the haven of hope, the opportunity for all men. Don't look forward too much. Don't look at the road ahead of you in dismay. Look at the road behind you. Don't you see how far up the hill we have come? Don't you see what those low and damp miasmatic levels were from which we have slowly led the way? Don't you see the rows of men come, not upon the lower level, but upon the upper, like the rays of the rising sun? Don't you see the light starting, and don't you see the light illuminating all nations? Don't you know that you are coming more and more into the beauty of its radiance? And then trust your guides, imperfect as they are, and some day, when we are dead, men will come and point at the distant upland with a great shout of joy and triumph and thank God that there were men who undertook to lead in the struggle. What difference does it make if we ourselves do not reach the uplands? We have given our lives to the enterprise. The world is made happier and humankind better because we have lived."

Woodrow Wilson's passing calls to mind the description by Bunyan in Pilgrim's Progress of Mr. Valiant-for-Truth:

"Then," said he, "I am going to my Father; and though with great difficulty I am got hither, yet now I do not repent me of all the trouble I have been at to arrive where I am. My sword I give to him that shall succeed me in my pilgrimage, and my courage and skill to him that can get it. My marks and scars I carry with me, to be a witness for me, that I have fought His battles who now will be my rewarder."

"When the day that he must go hence was come, many accompanied him to the riverside, into which as he went he said, 'Death, where is thy sting?' And as he went down deeper he said, 'Grave, where is thy victory?' So he passed over and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side."

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I am a friend of the ex-soldier. I am not one of those who befriends the soldiers when he wants their votes and forgets him when a measure like this is before the House. I do not wish or intend to cast any reflections upon any of my colleagues; I would be friends with them all; but I say to you that now is the time for every true friend of the soldier to show his colors. If an adjusted compensation act worthy of the name is to be passed by this Congress it will be necessary for every friend of the ex-soldier to vote "no" when a suspension of the rules is asked for on Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker, it is only when a friend of the soldier can no longer remain silent and be their friend that I utter these remarks. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, when Congress first convened in December the two most prominent pieces of legislation under discussion for immediate consideration by the House was the tax or revenue bill and the adjusted compensation act. There was much discussion among Members, and evidently some among the leaders in Congress, as to whether the adjusted compensation should be taken up first or the revenue or tax bill.

Friends of the soldiers felt then, and I believe still feel, that the soldiers' wage bill should have been settled first that this important feature of the country's finances might be taken into consideration when adjusting the Treasury as to the income necessary to carry on the Government. But apparently Mr. Mellon had his way, and the tax bill was given precedence. For 40 days and 40 nights we wallowed in schedules, brackets, estimates, and office propaganda. Now we are to be given, for the purpose of consideration of the second most important act to be passed by Congress, just 40 minutes for debate, without right to offer amendments.

Secretary Mellon's antisoldier, prideful rich tax bill had one whole month and 10 days consideration by this House, with numerous amendments offered before and during final consideration of the bill. Gentlemen, it is well to bear in mind that the committee that has drawn and considered this bill is one and the same that recommended the Mellon tax bill to the House. Several of its members are the avowed opponents of soldiers' adjusted compensation, as shown by their past records. I do not question them this right, but friends of the soldier should bear it in mind when considering the committee's report on their bill itself. Now, the soldiers' insurance act is given to us on three days' notice, without an opportunity to offer a single amendment and only 40 minutes for debate. Why, gentlemen, this bill was not even printed when suspension of the rules was asked on the floor of the House in order that it might be rammed through Congress. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, such procedure is an outrage not only on the ex-soldiers of this country but upon their parents and relatives, who are the people of this country. Ever since the war closed and private property and civilians had their rights due to the war adjusted by this Government the soldiers have been told by newspapers, magazines, all public speakers, and nearly every candidate for public office, including Members of Congress, that the boys who served in the war would be given an adjustment of their pay. Six or seven hundred thousand of these human derelicts who had two years before been the "pride of America" slept on park benches and again entered the mess lines to eat, objects of public charity, while the railroads and the war contractors were each paid in cash an adjustment of their claims against the Government, double the amount necessary to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation. More than five years have passed since these men were promised an adjustment of their pay. Now it is proposed to give them a present of an insurance policy. It is no longer adjusted pay, but a present or bonus payable 20 years from now. Speaking as one ex-soldier, I am sure I voice the will of a great majority of these men when I say to you Members of Congress as soldiers we do not seek or want charity, public or private.

We do want an adjustment of our World War wages. We want Congress to pay us that which we believe is due as a matter of justice. We do not seek political bribes for our votes, but honest pay for the time we worked in Uncle Sam's uniform. That is the basis of the soldiers' claims before this Government. That is the question we want Congress to decide. If the majority of Congress find that these boys are entitled to an adjustment of their wage contracts with the Government in the World War, then it is the duty of Congress, in my humble opinion, to pay the men as all other employees of our Government have always been paid—in the coin of the realm, in cash or its equivalent. I personally am in favor of a provision to exclude all commissioned officers by the terms of the bill and will vote for such amendment should it be introduced. Such a provision would exclude any personal interest I might have in the passage of this act.

Gentlemen of Congress, to enact this gift of insurance with 40 minutes' debate and no opportunity for amendment is, in my opinion, a gross betrayal of the American doughboy by the American Congress.

For the majority party, to which I belong, to sponsor this insurance gift to the soldiers in lieu of an adjustment of their World War wage contracts is to commit political chicanery, betray its best friends, and die under the stigma of having committed political suicide.

For 50 years following the Civil War the Republican Party was known to the people of this country as the soldiers' party, because it advocated that which was just, generous, and fair to its defenders. Now, under a gag rule, in lieu of the compensation due them it is proposed to ram down the soldiers' throats an insurance gift that can be collected only when nearly half of these men will be dead and gone.

The Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the auxiliary, and every other soldier organization in the country worthy of the name has asked for adjustment of compensation, and now Congress, through the Committee on Ways and Means, proposes to give them an Andrew Mellon bonus in the form of an insurance policy due 20 years hence in full payment of their claim. I say such a proposal is to offer the boys a stingy Yankee trade that might better remain unborn. It is a recognition of the principle of a bonus and not that of adjusted compensation. It is a milk-and-water proposition—one-tenth milk and nine-tenths water. When Congress defeated the Mellon tax, which, with its nation-wide propaganda, was designed to kill the soldiers' adjusted compensation, the people felt the soldiers had won. They did win. Secretary Mellon, by his friends on the committee, realizing that he was beaten, proposes now by this bill to give the boys a sop in order to evade paying what they know to be due. The people of the United States want the boys to have their pay. An overwhelming majority of Congress wants the debt paid, but the Secretary of the Treasury, through his friends in Congress, in protection of the rich war profiteers, would, like a hard-faced deacon, quibble and fiddle around to see if he can not strike a better bargain.

Gentlemen, this proposal is not sound nor logical in any particular. It is typical Yankee trading stock, it is a jack-knife with a pearl handle and all the blades gone but the smallest one, and that broken off half way.

In the first instance it does not adjust the pay of those who need it. The man who is content to accept a 20-year endowment insurance policy in lieu of his wage claim against the Government is not suffering or in any great need. In my opinion not one-tenth the men who were in the service will be willing and satisfied to accept this tender.

Second. The only men who are recognized as being entitled to an actual adjustment of their compensation under the terms of this bill are the men who served for 60 days or less. Their claim is recognized in full and paid in cash. Between these two classes there lies nearly 2,000,000 fighting men that went to France. Thousands of these men are in need. They may not all of them be starving just now, but hundreds of thousands of them were a short time ago. These men want what is due them with which to purchase the necessities of life, to reestablish them in industry or business—in plain words to place them in as good a position before the world as they were when the country called them.

The information has been scattered about the House that 60 or 70 per cent of the members of the American Legion favor the proposal to give the soldiers a 20-year endowment policy in lieu of compensation. I do not believe it. But even if so, what does it signify? The Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars together have less than one-third of the soldiers of the World War in their membership. Neither organization has made a canvass or poll of their membership to find out how they stand on such a proposal as this.

I challenge every man who is using this statement to bolster up this nostrum that he have a canvass made in either one or both the veteran organizations mentioned and find out how the soldiers stand. This could have been done during January or February while we were considering the Mellon tax bill had anyone interested really wanted to know. It is claimed that National Commander Quinn and other Legion officials are in favor of this bill as the best thing that can be passed in the present Congress. My answer to this is that justice and what is right should not be compromised or sacrificed to expediency.

I well realize it is not sound or reasonable to criticize or oppose without proposing a remedy for the thing complained of; therefore, had I the opportunity to amend this bill, I would propose that Congress give to the soldiers at the rate of $1 per day for home service and $1.25 per day for foreign service, and that the amount due each man be paid by issuing him a Government bond due in 30 years, drawing 4½ per cent interest, and to be nontaxable only as to the income. Such bonds would, if issued, be immediately worth par and could be retained by the soldier or converted into cash as the necessity of the man's circumstances might govern him to decide.

Such bonds, when issued, could be retired by the creation of a sinking fund of eighty or ninety millions a year, and would cost the Government but little, if any, more than this insurance proposal, even should every man that was in the service elect to take a bond for the amount due him.

Give the men this option, gentlemen. If, as the contenders of this bill claim, 60 or 70 per cent of the ex-soldiers will be content to take the insurance, then the Government will issue that much less bonds.

If you are going to pay the men what is due them, then I say pay them in the form they want it paid. Do not try to inveigle them into accepting something that only a few want or will be satisfied to accept.

I well realize after what took place during our recent rules fight and again during the consideration of the Mellon tax plan that certain leaders on the Republican side will challenge those who keep faith with the soldiers with being insurgents, radicals, and demagogues; but, gentlemen, I would rather be called a traitor to my party than I would to have my ex-soldier supporters charge me with being disloyal to them.

Gentlemen, we have as leader on the Republican side of this House as distinguished, honorable, and able a man as it has ever been my pleasure to meet. He has several reputable and capable assistants, but I dare say to them, if they pass this bill as drawn, that in my opinion they are committing themselves and the Republican Party to absolute and certain ruin. I dare to predict to these gentlemen that if they persist in this course that a Democratic or third-party President and Congress will retrieve their error before we reach the time any loan money will ever be available to the soldiers under the terms of this bill.

Challenge my Republicanism if you will for making these statements, but let me say in my own defense that I was an American citizen before I ever joined the Republican Party. We in Wisconsin are Republicans as a matter of principle, not out of fear for party edict or lash. The district which I have the honor to represent is so overwhelmingly Republican that the opposing party has not had a candidate in the past 10 years. Our people in Wisconsin are Republicans for principle. They believe that human rights should be secured before property rights are considered. They contributed loyally and generously to the support of the war in both men and money. They want to be loyal and just now in support of the men who made the greater part of that sacrifice.

Let me call the attention of the gentleman on this side of the House that the Republican Party was born at Ripon, Wis.; that Wisconsin leadership has furnished more platform ideas that have been enacted into national law than any other Republican State in the Union; that if the Republican Party leaders had adhered to Wisconsin principles in legislation during the past two years their majority in the Sixty-seventh Congress would not have been reduced to less than 20 in the present House.

That Wisconsin republicanism is that kind of partyism that Lincoln would be found advocating, were he on earth to-day.

In closing, gentlemen, permit me to say that the proposal by the committee to give veterans of the World War an insurance policy in lieu of cash or something that can be easily and quickly converted into cash in lieu of payment of adjusted compensation is not republicanism. I dare say there is not a candidate here or a party to come that dares to seek an election on such a diluted pledge. Such republicanism could only find precedent in the days of Mark Hanna, Uncle Joe Cannon, or in the mind of our present illustrious Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon.

I am an optimist by nature. I have the utmost confidence in our country's safety and its future, but, gentlemen, let me impress upon you that when 2,000,000 men who paid $6 to $8 per month for Government insurance over there find that they are to be given another Government insurance policy instead of adjusted compensation, you are courting trouble. Such congressional action will to thousands of these men be received as salt rubbed in an open wound.

This bill is to come up under suspension of the rules on Tuesday. May every sincere friend of the soldier be here and vote "no" on that motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kankakee River at or near the State line between section 10, township 31 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian, in the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and section 1, township 31 north, range 10 west of the second principal meridian, in the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana;

H. R. 6420. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River in section 17, township 28 north, range 23 west of the fourth principal meridian in the State of Minnesota; and

H. R. 6925. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Chicago to construct a bridge across the Calumet River at or near One hundred and thirtieth Street in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 188.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. SAMUEL D. NICHOLSON, late a Senator from the State of Colorado.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Senate Resolution 187.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. KNUTE NELSON, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SESSION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS IN OKLAHOMA CITY.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I insert the following:

A bill (H. R. 2857) to establish a term of the United States circuit court of appeals at Oklahoma City, Okla.

Mr. HERSEY. Have you anything on H. R. 2875?

Mr. YATES. The report on H. R. 2857 reads as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C. February 16, 1924.

Hon. GEORGE S. GRAHAM,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 1 with regard to H. R. 2857, entitled "A bill to establish a term of the United States circuit court of appeals at Oklahoma City, Okla."

It would seem that the creation of another term of holding court would only further inconvenience the judges of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Judicial Circuit and result in greater congestion and loss of time. Furthermore, it would necessitate the establishment of an adequate library, and under existing appropriations the department is unable to even provide law books for the library for the circuit court of appeals at Denver, Colo.

I transmit herewith a photostat copy of a letter from Judge Walter H. Sanborn, senior circuit judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. This letter is self-explanatory.

Respectfully,

H. M. DAUGHERTY, Attorney General.

(Hon. Walter H. Sanborn, St. Paul, Minn.; Hon. Kimbrough Stone, Kansas City, Mo.; Hon. Robert E. Lewis, Denver, Colo.; Hon. William S. Kenyon, Fort Dodge, Iowa, circuit judges. Hon. Willis Van Devanter, circuit justice, Washington, D. C.)

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
St. Louis, Mo., February 9, 1924.

Hon. A. T. SEYMOUR,
Acting Attorney General,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SEYMOUR: In answer to your letter of February 5, 1924, requesting my views as to the advisability of the passage of the bill H. R. 2857, providing for a term of the circuit court of appeals annually at Oklahoma City, permit me to inform you that I have conferred with Circuit Judges Lewis and Kenyon, who are here, and they agree with me in the opinion that the passage of that bill would impair the efficiency, delay the work, and increase the expense of the court of appeals of this circuit.

This court is now required to sit annually at St. Paul, St. Louis, and Denver. The transfer of the court from one of these cities to another and back again practically deprives the court of a week's work. It requires a transfer of the clerks and the librarian and many of the records and briefs must be packed up and moved.

At St. Paul and at St. Louis the court has a law library in the Federal building; at Denver it has none, and the judges are compelled to postpone opinions in many of the cases argued there until they can get back to one of their libraries at either St. Paul or St. Louis. If they were required to hold an annual session of the court at Oklahoma City, they would labor under the same disadvantages there as they do at Denver.

Distances in this circuit are great. It requires days to go from Denver or St. Paul to Oklahoma City, and transportation expenses are heavy.

A stationary court is more efficient than an ambulatory one. If this court were to be required to sit annually at Oklahoma City there might be a like call and a like reason for an annual session of it at Salt Lake City, at Little Rock, and perhaps at other cities in the 13 States contained in the circuit.

Very respectfully,

WALTER H. SANBORN,
Senior Circuit Judge.

Mr. SWANE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on the 10th day of December, 1923, I introduced this bill and am glad to have an opportunity to appear before the Committee on the Judiciary and tell you some of the reasons why the bill should be reported favorably by the committee and enacted into law by this Congress. Courts are established among our citizens for the purpose of making it as convenient as possible to settle civil disputes where they can not be otherwise determined satisfactorily, to punish those who violate the law of our land, and for the protection of society. Litigants in court have a right to have their cases determined as speedily as possible and with the least expense. It is not right to put them to great expenses, cause them to travel hundreds of miles and spend a large amount of money in order to follow their cases on appeal. The poor citizen can not afford this unnecessary expense, even though he may have a just cause, and he is therefore deprived of an equal opportunity with the man of means. The humblest citizen and the highest have the right when in court to have their cases reviewed by our appellate courts when they think an injustice has been done. They should not be denied this right by reason of great expense on appeal. Courts should be established at easily accessible places, where disputes can be settled with as little expense as possible to the litigants, and also to the Government. The judges can better afford to travel some distance for the purpose of holding court than can the litigant or his attorney. The expenses of the judges are paid, and a part of this is paid by these very litigants who pay taxes for the expense of the Government.

Sufficient courts should be established that litigants may have their cases tried without any unnecessary delay, and criminal cases should not be permitted to drag. The law is better enforced and there is more respect for the law when the defendant in criminal cases is given his constitutional right to a speedy trial. In order to foster a proper respect for the law it must be speedily, economically, and impartially administered. Judges themselves, more than any other set of men, can cause this respect by a proper administration of the affairs of the office. Judges are human like the rest of us, and are the same men, animated by the same emotions, thinking with the same brain, feeling with the same heart as before he was elevated to the position of judge.

The law gives a person in court the right of appeal, and this should not be denied to any citizen by making it impossible to have a case reviewed on account of the additional expense. Appellate courts are instituted among us for the purpose of correcting mistakes of the lower courts on further deliberation. If a person is denied the right of appeal on account of expense, that person does not have the proper regard for the Government, for we are a people who believe in equal and exact justice to all.

I believe in administering the affairs of government with the least possible expense, and I further believe that officials should work a reasonable time the same as other employees. This bill will work no inconvenience on any judge, for it is his business to hold court and to go where it is most convenient with the least expense to our citizens. Courts should certainly be established as near as possible to the center of litigation—that is, where the greatest number of cases reach the court for that district or circuit, as the case may be.

There are 13 States in the eighth circuit and 17 districts. The States are: Arkansas, eastern and western districts; Colorado, Iowa, northern and southern districts; Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, eastern and western districts; Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, eastern and western districts; South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming. Court is held for the eighth circuit at the following places: St. Paul, Minn.; Denver, Colo.; Cheyenne, Wyo.; and St. Louis, Mo. Below is a statement from the Department of Justice concerning the condition of the docket in the eighth circuit June 30, 1923:

Number of cases pending at the close of June 30, 1923, in each of the judicial districts comprising the eighth judicial circuit.

Arkansas—Eastern	877
Western	647
Colorado	1,218
Iowa—Northern	1,600
Southern	936
Kansas	1,486
Minnesota	3,743
Missouri—Eastern	1,451
Western	2,140
Nebraska	1,870
New Mexico	344
North Dakota	802
Oklahoma—Eastern	2,615
Western	1,037
South Dakota	1,139
Utah	586
Wyoming	498

Number of cases decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

Fiscal year—	203
1921	231
1922	322
1923

A report from the Clerks of the United States District Court for the Eastern and Western Districts of Oklahoma show the following cases pending:

WESTERN DISTRICT.
Law and equity cases	307
Bankruptcy cases	530
Criminal cases	748
EASTERN DISTRICT.
Law and equity cases	564
Bankruptcy	965
Criminal	871

It will be seen from this statement that but one State has more cases pending before this court than Oklahoma. That State is Minnesota, and the circuit court holds sessions at St. Paul. Oklahoma litigants must travel even from Oklahoma City about 500 miles to the nearest court, at St. Louis, and hundreds of miles more from the southern and other portions of the State.

Oklahoma has made great strides since the advent to statehood, November 16, 1907, and, like any other new State, has much litigation. Oklahoma is essentially an agricultural State, ranking fourth in the production of cotton in 1923, and sixth in the production of winter wheat, and produces more broom corn than all the other States combined. In 1922 she produced 149,571,000 barrels of oil, more than any other State. This was one-fifth of the amount produced in the United States and about one-eighth of the total output of the whole world for that year. During that year Oklahoma was second among the States in the production of lead, and first in the production of zinc. In addition to this she has millions of tons of coal resting on seas of untouched oil. With her thousands of acres of rich oil land, her wealth of other minerals, and her Indian questions, there will necessarily be much litigation. Oklahoma is divided into two Federal court districts, with the old Indian Territory comprising the eastern district, and old Oklahoma Territory the western district.

Three tribal attorneys are employed by the Government, one each for the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Creeks, and eight probate attorneys in addition. It is the duty of these attorneys to look after the affairs of certain members of the tribes in the State and Federal courts. The committee can see the cause of so much litigation, and the necessity of having the circuit court hold sessions at some more convenient place.

Resolution of the Oklahoma State Bar Association.

"Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States H. R. 2857, a bill to establish a term of the United States circuit court of appeals at Oklahoma City, Okla.; and

"Whereas the State of Oklahoma furnishes more cases in the eighth circuit than any other State, and it is a great expense to Oklahoma litigants to be compelled to follow their cases to either St. Louis or St. Paul: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Oklahoma State Bar Association, assembled in Oklahoma City, That the Congress of the United States is hereby most respectfully memorialized to pass said law and make it possible for a term of the United States circuit court of appeals to be held at Oklahoma City, Okla.

"Adopted by the Oklahoma State Bar Association December 28, 1923.

"MONT F. HIGHLEY, Secretary."

Mr. Chairman, permit me here to say a few words concerning Oklahoma City, the place where the sessions of the circuit court is proposed to be held under this bill. I will not burden the record with an extended statement, for it would take too long to tell it all.

I saw this "wonder city" before the opening of the Territory to settlement, April 22, 1889, and have witnessed proudly its magic growth from a bald and barren prairie to its present greatness and grandeur. In less than 35 years it has grown to a beautiful city of 134,000 intelligent, law-abiding, liberty-loving, Christian citizens. In 1890 the population was 4,151.

The schools of Oklahoma City have attracted the attention of the Nation. The school-bond appropriations for the school year 1923-24 amounted to $1,900,000, and the regular budget for this school year amounts to the sum of $1,796,412. Forty-two school buildings have been used during the year, and in addition there are in course of construction and soon ready for occupancy two new junior high schools costing $450,000 each, two ward schools costing $35,000 each. One junior high school will be constructed into a central high school at a cost of $200,000, with additions to two other junior high schools costing $100,000 each. Additions to ward schools will cost an additional $347,280. The enrollment in all the schools of the city amounted to 26,202 during the year 1922-23, and will exceed 30,000 the present school year. This is ample proof that Oklahoma City is a school town. Building permits for 1923 amounted to $8,000,000. More than 320,000 head of cattle were received at the stockyards last year.

The value of her industrial products is estimated at $150,000,000 in 1923 and the number of industrial concerns in the city at about 385, which is an increase of 25 over the previous year. The city enjoys approximately 40 per cent of the entire manufacturing output of the State. The value of Oklahoma City's manufactured products for 1923 approximated the enormous sum of $425,000,000. The annual pay roll of these industries amounts to more than $12,000,000 to 6,750 employees. The packing industries of Oklahoma City do a business of $70,000,000 annually. The automobile assembling plants in the city in 1923 did a business of about $30,000,000, with about 700 employees.

Packing plants	$12,000,000
Flour and grist mills	12,500,000
Bakeries	8,500,000
Printing, publishing, etc.	4,675,000
Lumber and planing mills	1,300,000
Confectionery and ice cream	1,250,000
Foundry and machine shops	1,110,000

More than 1,200 new homes were built in Oklahoma City last year, and she has 2,300 acres of public park land, with more than $150,000 being spent annually in developing these parks. She is headquarters for more than 130 leading oil companies. Three million two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars were spent last year on municipal improvements. She has five trunk lines of steam railways, 70 miles of interurban lines, 75 miles of street railway, 279 miles of cement sidewalks, and more than 280 miles of paved streets. She has a great Masonic temple in course of construction, costing $1,250,000, a $450,000 Federal reserve bank building, 1 State and 8 national banks, 5 daily papers, 50 other publications, tourists' park conveniently located, finest hotels in the Southwest, a great public library with four branches, and State fairgrounds worth more than $625,000.

The great University of Oklahoma, with more than 5,000 students annually, is 18 miles south, at Norman, and the Central State Teachers' College at Edmond, 15 miles to the north, with more than 2,700 students. The Oklahoma City College of the Methodist Church is located here, with an enrollment of 1,463, and there are other numerous private schools and business colleges. She has 102 churches of all denominations, representing an investment of more than $3,500,000, whose ministers are men with national and international reputations. The Y. M. C. A. has a membership of 2,300 and a building worth more than $300,000. The Y. W. C. A. owns its building, worth more than $175,000, and has a membership of more than 1,000, with annual receipts of more than $224,000.

Other Oklahoma City figures for 1923.

Bank deposits, Dec. 31	$56,725,799.47
Bank clearings	1,165,341,605.77
Property value	117,000,000.00
Postal receipts	1,234,347.28

The two packing plants have property in the city worth more than $3,000,000, and to secure these two industries Oklahoma City raised $300,000 in less than one hour. The Oklahoma Livestock Exchange consists of 15 commission firms employing about 200 people, handling annually an average of $40,000,000, with an annual pay roll of $415,137.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the leading features of the city where sessions of this court are proposed to be held. It is centrally located for all the south, southeast, and southwest portions of the eighth circuit, and is easily accessible from all points.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I believe that it has been made clear that it would be a great convenience to a large number of people to have this court established, and that it will be no additional cost to the Government. I sincerely trust that this committee will report the bill favorably, and that Congress will enact it into law.

As stated before, there is but one State in the eighth circuit that has more cases before the circuit court of appeals than Oklahoma. Minnesota has 3,743 cases pending, or did have June 30, 1923, and Oklahoma has 3,652 cases pending.

Mr. YATES. In the circuit court of appeals?

Mr. SWANK. Yes, sir; on the 30th of last June. These litigants or their lawyers have to go all the distance to St. Louis or St. Paul to follow their cases on appeal. This is a great and unnecessary expense when you consider the business before this court from Oklahoma.

Mr. MAJOR. The witnesses and clients are not supposed to go to the court of appeals.

Mr. SWANK. No; but the lawyers have to go and this is expensive to the litigants.

Mr. MAJOR. The clients have to pay lawyers for additional expense?

Mr. SWANK. Yes, and that is quite an expense, too.

Mr. HERSEY. What do you have to say to the position one of the judges takes on this bill, that the court of appeals, if changed to the place mentioned in your bill, would not have an adequate library there for the judges of the court of appeals?

Mr. SWANK. The library in the Federal building at Oklahoma City seems to be sufficient for the district judge who holds court there. In addition to that library, there is a complete law library at the State capitol, near the Federal building, and many private law libraries in the city as well. I am sure that any law report can be found in Oklahoma City.

Mr. HERSEY. How is your practice in Oklahoma among lawyers? Do they charge clients up with fees for the length of the travel, or simply the expense of travel?

Mr. SWANK. The distance would not make any difference in the fees, but would make a difference in the expense.

I will state that Mr. DYER has a bill, which has been reported favorably by the committee, for the appointment of two new judges in the eighth circuit. Is that correct?

Mr. DYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SWANK. That bill has not been enacted, but it is on the calendar and is a good reason for a favorable report on this bill.

Mr. HERSEY. Another term of the court of appeals where there are two judges appointed?

Mr. SWANK. I do not say that this bill should be enacted just for the reason that the bill for two more judges has been reported favorably, but that report would be some indication of the volume of business.

Mr. HERSEY. They would sit with the other judges of the court of appeals.

Mr. SWANK. There is a statement about these judges traveling around so much. They can better afford to travel some than can the litigants be required to pay large extra expenses in traveling to the judges. It will not require much additional expense, if any, if this bill is enacted, but will be a great saving to lawyers and litigants.

Mr. HERSEY. That is, perhaps, an indication that the business is important enough to warrant your term of court in Oklahoma. I move that the letters be made a part of the record.

Mr. YATES. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SWANK. I thank you for the hearing.

HARDING MEMORIAL ADDRESS OF MR. HUGHES.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That there shall be compiled, printed with illustrations, and bound, as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, 25,000 copies of the oration delivered by the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes in the House of Representatives during the exercises held in memory of the late President Warren G. Harding on February 27, 1924, including all the proceedings and the program of exercises, of which 8,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 17,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS—NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6820) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and myself, without agreement as to time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the time of general debate be divided equally between himself and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6820.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6820, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6820, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, before attempting to undertake an analysis of the naval bill I wish to acknowledge for my own satisfaction the obligation that I owe to those gentlemen who have been detailed to cooperate with me in the hearings and in reporting the bill you have before you for consideration, all of them men of the greatest capacity, men who are indefatigable and industrious and who have a thorough comprehension of the problems of the Navy.

I am under deepest obligation to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the ranking Democratic member of the subcommittee, a man whose ability is known to all in this body and to our country—faithful, studious, and whose mind is as keen as a Damascus sword; [applause] to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], who, prior to his detail to the Committee on Appropriations, had seen several years of service upon the naval legislative committee, profound in his knowledge of the Navy, earnest student and scholar, and one who has contributed, in a manner which can not be measured, to the bill before you; to the new members of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], men of outstanding ability and men who have thrown that interest and enthusiasm into the work of shaping this bill which men ought to give to a great subject when they are charged with the responsibility of its consideration by this body.

Then there is another name I ought to mention to this House, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of the subcommittee. There are those in the employ of the House, and have been for years, whose names are not well known throughout the country and yet who, by reason of their great service to committees and to the Congress, contribute annually in the saving of millions of dollars and contribute to the orderly procedure of government.

Such a person was Mr. Courts, who for years was clerk to the Committee on Appropriations; such a person was Daniel Roper, who for years was clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means; such a person is Marc Shield, the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations to-day [applause]; such a person is Mrs. Donnelly, for years associated with our late colleague, Representative Mann, of Illinois, in the distinguished service which that Member rendered to this Congress and the country. I want to mention in connection with those names the name of John Pugh [applause], who has been assigned to the naval subcommittee, an efficient clerk who, like a bank account, works while you work and while you sleep. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask first to have the opportunity of proceeding with the bill without interruption, thinking that I can make a general statement that will probably cover most of the points in which gentlemen would be interested in a general way, with the thought that we shall be liberal in debate and with the thought that when we shall reach the bill under the five-minute rule we shall take the time necessary adequately to consider the different subjects contained in the measure.

The task that was assigned to your committee was the task of providing a naval bill which would carry an appropriation that would be adequate and at the same time safeguard the Treasury of the United States. The bill which we have brought before you to-day carries a direct appropriation of $271,942,867, plus an indirect appropriation of $22,500,000, or a grand total of $294,442,867. The Budget estimates were $298,866,794. Last year the Congress made a direct appropriation of $294,967,200 and an indirect appropriation of $35,450,000, or a grand total of $330,417,200. Thus the bill we are asking you to consider is less by more than $35,000,000 than the appropriation for the current year and it is less by more than $4,450,000 the amount recommended by the Budget, though some of the items that are excluded were excluded because the Committee on Appropriations did not have authority to give them consideration.

At this time I am going to invite the attention of Members of the House to a brief consideration or survey of the appropriations made and moneys expended for the Navy during the years passed, including the fiscal year 1916.

I have prepared a table which indicates the matter graphically and which I shall insert in the Record at this point:

Statement of appropriations, expenditures, etc., fiscal years 1916 to 1924, inclusive.

Year.	Unexpended balances at beginning of the year.	Appropriated.	Amount of re-appropriations.	Total available (exclusive of re-appropriations).	Expended.	Unused—turned back into Treasury.	Balances carried forward to next year.

No institution as large as is the Navy, having to do the work that the Navy has to do, can close its business upon the 30th of June every year with all accounts paid, all materials used up, and start upon the beginning of the new fiscal year to purchase everything that will be needed for the coming year. There are ships being constructed, munitions being manufactured, buildings, yards, and wharves and other establishments being constructed, involving such large amounts of expenditure that there must be materials and supplies on hand so that the work can be carried forward economically and efficiently at all times.

You then will be interested in knowing that for the fiscal year 1916 there was appropriated, outright, approximately $157,184,000. In addition to this, approximately $52,650,000 was carried forward from prior appropriations. The total, then, of approximately $210,000,000 was available for the fiscal year 1916. During this year the Navy expended $152,000,000, having a balance of money aggregating approximately $58,000,000, which was carried over to 1917.

This was the year in which the war was declared. That year we appropriated $1,350,000,000, but you will recall that war was not declared until April, so the Navy functioned less than 90 days in a war status before the beginning of the new fiscal year. Accordingly, in 1918 the direct appropriations were scarcely more than one-half what they were in 1917, although the money on hand coming forward from the previous year represented a vast amount; and the total amount of money for 1918 necessarily was larger than the total for 1917.

The fiscal year 1919 witnessed the high mark of appropriations. That year $2,322,000,000 was provided in direct appropriations, and $442,000,000 was brought forward from the preceding year.

The armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, and in spite of the fact that half of the fiscal year had not run, the responsibilities connected with the Navy were such that expenditures above normal could not instantly and appreciably come to an end. Immediately all work was stopped wherever it could be stopped advantageously, but we had 2,000,000 boys in Europe who had to be brought home.

We had supplies that had to be carried to those boys while they were there. We had a great construction program of yards, docks, and bases at different places that had to be carried on in order to prevent losses. We had ships of all kinds under construction, some under contract and some under construction in the naval establishments of the United States, and while work was stopped wherever it could be economically, nevertheless the great expenditures that had to be assumed by reason of the war carried on almost to the end of the fiscal year, with the result that for that year we used the stupendous amount of $1,953,000,000, representing the greatest amount that ever was expended in any year by the United States Navy.

With the end of the war, however, certain large expenditures could be eliminated. We turned back into the Treasury about $328,000,000.

In 1920 the war was over, but we had the burden of expending moneys upon ships and establishments that were in progress of building and that either had to be scrapped or the work carried forward. We did not know that an arrangement could be made such as was made in the Limitation of Armament Conference. Therefore we continued our work upon the battleships, upon the cruisers, upon much of the craft that we had upon the ways, and upon certain construction work at naval stations. The same thing applies to 1921, but that year you will notice we had to appropriate a larger amount of money, because the unexpended balance had to some extent diminished.

For 1922 and for 1923 you will notice substantial decreases when you compare the years with 1920 and 1921. The year 1923 was the fiscal year immediately following the Limitation of Armament Conference, and the effects of economics determined upon there were beginning to bear fruit.

Let me say that one of the first things, or the first thing, that is done with a ship when it is brought out of a navy yard is to send it on what is called its "shakedown" trip. It is for the purpose of testing the engines, for the purpose of testing machinery, for the purpose of seeing how the ship will perform, whether it will function as was designed. After the end of the war the Navy of the United States may be said to have been sent out on its "shakedown" trip.

A good many factors entered into the question of shaping a policy that would be regarded as a permanent policy of our country looking to some years ahead. One of these matters was the relationship of the United States to the world powers of to-day, which embraces the question of the man power of the different nations of the world, industrial possibilities, latent resources, and whether or not war is imminent. All such things as these were taken into consideration. Another matter had to deal with what we had assumed under the limitation of armament treaty and what other nations had assumed.

Again, there were elements that I shall refer to a little later on that entered into the equation. At any rate, let me sum it up by saying that as a result of the treaty that followed the Limitation of Armament Conference we were able, while we scrapped approximately $330,000,000 of ships, to call a halt on new structural work and to save outright approximately $200,000,000 or $225,000,000. Not only that, but the cessation of work along certain lines that had been begun and was planned to be continued saved our country the expenditure of approximately $200,000,000 or $250,000,000 annually for a number of years to come for the maintenance and upkeep of the Navy. What I have just said does not have relation to the fortification program that had been suggested and that appealed to the people of our country. What I have said has relation to the Navy itself. It does not refer to Guam, where it was estimated it would cost $85,000,000 to produce fortifications that would be adequate. It does not refer to building up one stronghold in the Philippine Islands, where it would cost probably another $85,000,000 or $100,000,000. It refers to the Naval Establishment alone and its upkeep had there been no Limitation of Armament Conference.

Accordingly then, we find that in 1923 we were able to reduce the amount of the appropriations to $447,000,000, plus $180,962,660, carried over, in 1924 to $294,000,000 direct appropriations with $140,000,000 indirect or coming over from preceding years. For 1925 the estimates of the Budget were $272,000,000, and I have already indicated that we have been able to go below that figure, and at the beginning of the fiscal year 1925 in addition we shall have probably an unexpended balance coming forward of around $91,000,000. The unexpended balances referred to are in the nature of a working capital and may be nearly as large at the end of the year as at its beginning.

Probably I should say at this point that I expect the Naval appropriation bill for the next year to carry a larger direct appropriation than the present bill carries. Likewise, I think the same thing will be true for the years 1927 and 1928, and probably for years to come, and why? I said awhile ago that any establishment as large as the Navy must have immense stores of materials on hand, and during the World War we purchased excessive amounts of stores—not excessive from the standpoint of the needs at that time, but excessive for an establishment of the size to which the Navy was reduced, following the armistice.

We could sell some of the material and we did where it could be done with profit to the Navy, but it would have been a foolish thing to have sold materials one year when we would have had to go into the market the next year and purchase similar materials and at higher prices. The result was that while we did sell materials that could not be used at an early date or that was obsolete, on the other hand we carried millions of dollars of materials forward and have continued to carry them forward, disposing of them, however, wherever it may appear advantageous to do so. In this bill we are making available, out of the proceeds from the sale of some of those materials, to supplement the direct appropriation, $22,500,000. We have reached the point now, however, where the materials that were purchased during the war have been largely used up. You can not draw upon them to any great extent next year or the year following. You will need to make direct appropriations, and the result is going to be that your Navy bill will probably carry a larger amount during each of the next several years, assuming that the factors touching labor, personnel, and cost of materials continue approximately the same as they are to-day.

Considering what the program will be for another few years, you want to have in mind that we have several new ships coming in, that we will have several cruisers, and also have in mind that there are several types of ships, the construction of which is being considered by the legislative committee, and, of course, those ships, if they should be laid down, will entail greater appropriations from the Congress.

For the coming fiscal year I wish to call attention to three factors that your committee could not control. First of all, there are the appropriations necessary by reason of the reclassification law, applicable to some 2,000 employees in the District. First you must consider their basic salaries, to which must be added the bonus, and you must still add another 4 per cent by reason of the classification act in order to account for the appropriation for the civil establishment within the District of Columbia during the next fiscal year. This item of increase is approximately $167,000. Go to the navy yards and consider the wages that are paid there. We have, under a general law, provision for a wage board. To fix the wages in the different naval establishments upon what basis? The basis paid for similar lines of work in private industry.

In other words, the Government does not attempt to establish higher wages than are paid outside nor does it feel that it is right for the Government to beat down the wages paid employees in comparison with wages that are paid in establishments that are not under Government control. The wages to-day are as high approximately in the Naval Establishment of the United States as they were during the highest wage period during the World War. Whether they will be lower within the next 10 years is a problem that I can not speculate upon at this time.

Another thing that we could not control, which had an effect upon the shaping of the bill, is the compensation to officers and men. The pay and allowances for officers aggregate approximately 35 per cent more than prior to the passage of the pay bill a couple of years ago. The pay bill also carried an authorization for pay and allowances for enlisted men aggregating 50 per cent above the old pay rate of the Navy. These things, then, are the factors that enter into shaping the policy of the Navy and the appropriation bill, not alone for this year but probably for several years to come, two of the elements tending to drive the amount down and other of the elements tending to keep the amount of the bill rather large.

In preparing our bill we had to consider the effect of the Limitation of Armaments Conference upon the program. What are other nations doing? The treaty, as you will recall, fixed the number of capital ships. It fixed to some extent the size of guns and the number and tonnage of the other ships needed to round out the Navy. It has been agreed to by all the powers signatory to the arrangement, the last nation signing the treaty on the 28th of August last year. We checked up on the question of the fidelity with which the nations entering into the treaty are carrying forward the obligations that they as well as ourselves have assumed. We found those obligations are being respected absolutely. The ships that it had been agreed should be put out of commission have been put out of commission. Ships that had been understood should be scrapped are being scrapped, and the nations are exchanging memoranda showing the progress of the work going on along that line among the nations. Respecting the number of ships, the size of the guns, and other factors, there is every reason to assume that perfect fidelity is being paid to the obligations assumed.

Another matter we considered had reference to the building programs of other nations along lines that were not limited by the treaty. There is something of a building program going on, especially in Japan and France, in the way of cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. In France this is largely new work. In Japan it is largely a modification of still larger programs voted before the limitation conference. The United States has something like 30 ships under construction, ships which were authorized and begun before the treaty. There may be absolute assurance and confidence on the part of our country that all of the nations that are parties to the treaty are respecting their treaty obligations, and we may look forward with confidence to the great results which were expected to flow from the consummation of that epochal compact.

PERSONNEL.

Having then agreed upon these factors, we considered shaping the bill itself. Two years ago when we brought a bill before you you will recall it was the first bill that had been prepared following the Conference on Limitation of Armament. At that time we took the number of battleships as 18, as fixed by the treaty. We then consulted with the Navy Department as to the other ships that would be adequate or necessary to round out the fleet. We checked up fairly well on what other nations signatory to the treaty or parties to the conference proposed to do. We brought in a bill providing for 18 battleships, 103 destroyers, 84 submarines, cruisers, and auxiliary ships, and we brought in a bill providing for 67,000 enlisted men. The House, after the fullest consideration on that subject, modified the figures touching the enlisted personnel. No debate, I think, in recent years has been more illuminating or held closer to the point at issue than the debate at that time.

Prior to the limitation conference the Navy Department had recommended a personnel of approximately 120,000. Following the conference it was recommended that the number be 106,000, as I recall, and then 100,000 and 96,000. Finally a compromise proposition was agreed upon, placing the figure at 86,000, which was adopted by the Congress and which seemed to meet with the approval very generally of the country. That figure was adhered to a year later. We have not attempted to change that figure. We accepted it as part of our naval policy. Let me say it was demonstrated for two years that the Navy has been able to function admirably on the basis of that number of enlisted men. We have every reason to believe that it can continue to function. Given a reasonable number of enlisted men, the difference between that number and a larger number of enlisted personnel is not so much a matter of efficiency in keeping up the ships of the Navy or the Naval Establishment but is a matter of keeping men trained and standing by to help in the event of a national crisis. You could increase the number to 96,000 or 100,000, and you then would provide for 10,000 men or 14,000 men who we would all agree could be trained and would be considered highly efficient but who would not be needed for the proper functioning of the Navy.

Having then agreed upon the number of men to make up the enlisted personnel we have part of the problem solved—for the amount necessary for provisions, for supplies, for training stations, and a great many other items immediately take shape.

This leads me to the officer personnel. We have an authorized enlisted personnel of approximately 137,400. The law provides that the officer personnel may be 4 per cent of the authorized enlisted personnel. Personally I do not see the value of the percentage of the officer personnel being based upon the enlisted personnel, and I will tell you why. In the first place, you take a great ship like a battleship. You need a large number of enlisted personnel to handle the ship. You do not need a relatively large number of officers. There is an establishment where your officer personnel can be low, but your enlisted personnel must be high. You go to the other extreme and take a submarine, an institution that is largely one of machinery, that requires men who are absolutely trained, who are technical and can handle almost every part of the work, and there you find an institution that requires a relatively large officer personnel and comparatively a smaller enlisted personnel to handle that piece of machinery, because a submarine is just one mass of machinery.

Then you can take the other ships all the way in between, your destroyers, your cruisers, your auxiliary ships, and you will find that in each class you will have a different ratio of officers to the enlisted personnel. The thought was in the mind of the committee that the peace-time officer personnel should be larger in proportion than the peace-time enlisted personnel. Why? Because you can train enlisted personnel in a comparatively short time. These men are being trained in large numbers to-day. Where? In the industrial plants of the country, in the garages in every community, in electrical establishments, in manufacturing plants. Men are being trained in such a way as to become men of the highest efficiency as soon as they may receive a comparatively short training in the technique of the naval machinery itself. But as to the officers, that is not the case. The officer must be trained for years. Great responsibility rests upon him.

Therefore we have felt that in reporting this bill we ought to report something of a larger personnel than 4 per cent of officers on the basis of 86,000 men, and we have done so to the extent of an extra number of officers, or approximately 960, as I recall. But having fixed the number of officers, other features of the bill were matters of mathematical calculation. The number of midshipmen at the academy, the amount of money to be appropriated for traveling expenses, pay, allowances, matters that have immediate relation to the number of officers that you have in the Navy.

NAVAL RESERVE.

We now come to the Naval Reserve, and on this subject there seems to be some confusion. I believe I can clear up the matter with a brief statement.

The Naval Reserve is made up of officers and men drawn from two sources, first, the Fleet Naval Reserve, and second, civilian life.

The Fleet Naval Reserve is made up of four groups. The first two groups are officers (Class 1A) and men (Class 1B) who have served, in the case of officers, for any period, and in the case of men more than 4 years and less than 16 years in the United States Navy, and who to draw pay must train and drill with the Naval Reserve. The third group (Class 1C) and fourth group (Class 1D) are men who have had 16 years' and 20 years' service, respectively, in the Navy. These two groups do not need to train or drill to receive retainer pay. However, when called into active service they receive additional pay for such service. All four groups are paid out of "Pay Navy." For 1925 our bill carries for these four groups $5,309,180, and the officers and men in these groups, as of November 1, 1923, were as follows:

Class 1A, 319 officers; class 1B, 1,403 men; class 1C, 3,204 men; and in class 1D, 2,444 men.

The second source from which the Naval Reserve is fed is civilian life, and here we draw officers and men who have had limited service in the Navy, or in the merchant marine, or in the Coast Guard, or, maybe, no service whatever, and, based upon their experience, they are placed in the several classes—2, 3, 4, and 5.

As classes 1A and 1B in the Fleet Naval Reserve must train and drill in order to be paid from "Pay Navy," so here, classes 2, 3, 4, and 5 must train and drill in order to be paid from Naval Reserve funds. We call this "retainer pay," and it is based upon not less than 36 drills and two weeks' active duty for each year of active enrollment.

We then have class 6 made up of volunteers from all the foregoing classes and who simply "stand by," as it were. Members of class 6 do not drill and do not receive retainer pay. They may, however, participate in the two-weeks' annual cruise, and if they do they are paid for this service.

In these several classes, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, were 2,778 officers and 12,157 men on November 1, 1923. Of this number on that date, 826 officers and 3,715 men had qualified to receive retainer pay from the amount provided under the appropriation for the Naval Reserve. In addition to retainer pay, this item carries money for rentals, travel for officers and men, and active service pay for those who have a part in cruises.

For the current year we appropriated $3,595,000. For the year 1925 the department, through the Bureau of the Budget, has asked for $4,000,000. The committee felt, however, that since the number of officers and of men is so far below what the current law would care for, we should not increase the appropriation for 1925. The current law was based on estimates for retainer pay for 1,640 officers and 5,400 men. But I have pointed out that only 826 officers and 3,715 men have qualified.

So by giving current law there may be an expansion of nearly 100 per cent in officers and nearly 50 per cent in men between now and the end of the next fiscal year.

FUEL AND TRANSPORTATION.

For "Fuel and transportation," which defrays the cost of all fuel consumed by vessels, the committee is proposing $14,500,000, the amount recommended by the President in the Budget. The department was allowed $16,000,000 under this appropriation head for each of the fiscal years 1923 and 1924. Of the 1923 appropriation, however, only $13,279,476.57 was expended, notwithstanding the fact that the joint fleet maneuvers conducted in the latter part of that fiscal year have been described by the Secretary of the Navy as "the most extensive maneuvers our Navy had ever conducted." During the current fiscal year, in fact, at this time, joint fleet maneuvers are being conducted on an even greater scale and yet the expectation is that the expenditures will not run for the year in excess of $14,400,000. Of course, it should be stated that the estimated expenditure of $1,600,000 below the appropriation this present fiscal year is because of more favorable fuel prices than were figured upon in the preparation of the 1924 estimate.

If it should become necessary to pay higher prices for next year's fuel requirements than during the present fiscal year the appropriation proposed allows but a leeway of $100,000 for a comparable amount of steaming; but the committee submits that the amount proposed is a generous allowance in these times of financial stringency and that if there should be an advance in fuel costs it should be absorbed in reduced mileage generally or in fleet exercises of less magnitude than projected, attention again being directed to the Secretary's description of the 1923 maneuvers when expenditures for the fiscal year ran about $13,280,000 and fuel oil was costing $1.58 per barrel as against $1.39 at present.

There will be found on page 30 of the bill two new provisos which the committee is proposing in connection with this appropriation. Their purpose is self-evident.

PUBLIC WORKS.

The Budget estimates call for a total appropriation of $4,000,000 for betterments at navy yards and naval stations, and the committee is proposing a total of $1,916,500. Many of the items embraced by the Budget total represent objects for which the committee has no authority to provide under the rules unless previously authorized by law, which explains by far the greater portion of the reduction which the committee is proposing.

The major portion of the sum proposed is distributed by yards and stations, as follows:

Boston Navy Yard	$175,000
Mare Island Navy Yard	728,000
Puget Sound Navy Yard	160,000
Pearl Harbor Naval Station	178,000
Cavite Naval Station	141,000
Great Lakes Naval Training Station	115,000

AVIATION.

The committee is proposing for naval aviation an appropriation of $14,590,000, which is $410,000 less than recommended in the Budget estimates and $57,174 less than appropriated for the current fiscal year. The reduction proposed in the Budget figure is wholly on account of a development program recommended to be undertaken at the air stations at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and Coco Solo, Canal Zone. This work is not authorized by law, which explains the committee's action in excluding appropriations therefrom from this bill.

MARINE CORPS.

The appropriations proposed on account of the Marine Corps are on a basis of 1,002 officers and 19,500 men. The authorized officer strength of the Marine Corps is 1,096. There were in the corps on November 30, 1923, 983. The enlisted force for which provision is proposed corresponds with the number provided for the fiscal years 1923 and 1924. The distribution of the force is shown in the tables commencing on page 710 of the hearings.

In connection with the appropriations administered by the Quartermaster's Department it will be noticed that they have been entirely rephrased. They are better expressed and much more concise. The new language was drafted, at the request of the committee, in the General Accounting Office, and that office has assured the committee that there is nothing in the modified paragraphs which either gives or takes away any appropriation authority carried for this branch of the service in the current appropriation act.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

For completing vessels under construction the committee is proposing a direct appropriation of $7,500,000 and an indirect appropriation of $22,500,000, or a total of $30,000,000. The indirect appropriation is explained elsewhere in this report.

On November 30, 1923, the following vessels, the construction of which is permissible under the treaty growing out of the Conference on the Limitation of Naval Armament, were in various stages of completion:

Battleship	1
Airplane carriers (originally designed as battle cruisers)	2
Scout cruisers	6
Submarines	13
Fleet submarines	3
Gunboat	1
Destroyer tenders	2
Submarine tender	1
Total	30

All of these vessels, the committee has been informed, will have been completed during the fiscal year 1925, except the two airplane carriers, three of the scout cruisers, and the three fleet submarines. It is estimated by the department that a further appropriation of $6,526,500, to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1926, will finally and fully complete the 30 vessels now building, including aircraft and their accessories for the airplane carriers.

The committee was not called upon to consider the question of providing appropriations for commencing the construction of ships not heretofore authorized. The committee did, however, elicit the information that the department is committed to a program of ship construction of types permissible under the limitation of armament treaty, which, in conjunction with a program for modernizing certain of the vessels we now have, would impose upon the Treasury an added expense of approximately $35,000,000 annually for the next 10 years.

A year ago the committee proposed, and it finally became law, a request by Congress that the President take appropriate steps looking to the consummation of a supplemental treaty to limit the construction by the leading naval powers of ships of the types to which the existing treaty did not extend or only controlled as to tonnage and gun power. Up to this time no formal conference has been held looking to such a supplemental treaty, though no light appraisal can be made of the influence of the expression of the Congress of the desire of our country. So far as the committee has been able to ascertain, neither Great Britain nor Japan has voted the construction of any treaty exempted or permitted craft since the conference was concluded. America certainly should not be the first and should exert its influence to prevent the necessity arising to commence at all.

FLEET SUBMARINES.

There are several other items, however, to which you should have your attention called at this time, because we have made rather vital changes as we have reported the bill to you over the estimates and plans that were recommended by the Budget Bureau. The first one of these changes has to do with the submarine program. You will recall that in 1914 we provided that one fleet submarine should be built. In 1915 we provided for two fleet submarines. In 1916, in connection with the program for the Navy that was laid down, we provided for 9 more, making a total of 12 fleet submarines that have up to the present been authorized. Of this number 3 have been completed, and 3 are in process of construction. The Navy Department through the Budget Bureau recommended that 3 more fleet submarines be laid down during the next fiscal year, which would cost a total of $18,450,000, and that $2,850,000 be made immediately available in this bill for the beginning of the program.

Now, let us see what the situation is. In 1920, in January, one of the fleet submarines authorized in 1914 was completed. In December of the same year another was completed, authorized in 1915, and in January, 1922, the third one was completed that was authorized in 1915. Where are those three fleet submarines at this time? They are tied up at Hampton Roads, out of commission. Why? Because their engines will not function properly. Let me read a statement that was made by the Chief of the Office of Naval Operations in his last annual report, which was a confidential document, when the committee began its hearings on the pending bill 90 days ago.

It is now a public document, and this is what was said:

The performance of the three fleet submarines, T-1, T-2, and T-3, was of such an inferior character as to make it inadvisable to retain them in commission longer. These vessels were also sent to Hampton Roads and decommissioned.

And in another part of the report in referring to these three ships we are told that the engines do not function:

The tandem-type engines of these vessels have proven costly failures, and these three submarines are useless unless they can be reengineered. It is understood that provision for the installation of two German 3,000-horsepower engines on one T boat has been requested in the next Budget. The engines have shown up well on the test stand, but information as to their behavior in a submarine is urgently needed, or else it may be necessary to install them as an unknown quantity afloat in later submarine cruisers designed. The failure of the S-18 to S-21 engines points a warning against accepting test-stand results on Diesel engines as conclusive.

A statement which was a confidential statement at the time our committee began its hearings is necessarily important as bearing upon the immediate problem.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I would like to inquire as to who is responsible for securing engines so unfit for this service?

Mr. FRENCH. Let me say this: Since we have been building submarines we have attained very high success in the construction and design of engines suitable for the ordinary type of submarine, most of which we have to-day being of that type. There is no nation in the world that to-day has a satisfactory engine for a fleet submarine, which requires the ship to be driven 25 or 30 knots an hour. Germany does not have one, nor France, nor Italy, nor Japan, and Great Britain has not one that we know of up to the present time.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, as I understand the gentleman, these are merely experimental engines which have been used and found not to be adequate for the work?

Mr. FRENCH. When they were designed it was supposed they would be adequate, but it has been found that they are not adequate and that the problem is still one that is not beyond the laboratory; that it is still in an experimental stage. I think if the gentleman will allow me to come to that, I will answer the question he has in mind.

Let me say, since the question has been asked, that the British Government has not succeeded, apparently, any better than our own engineers in the development of an adequate type of engine for a fleet submarine. Some years ago the K type of engine was developed by the British Admiralty as a type which it believed would be suitable for a fleet submarine or for a mine-laying submarine, but it was discarded.

Only one ship of the K type was finally carried to completion. This submarine is driven by a steam engine, a thought which surprises you, but by reason of certain devices that have been worked out during the last few years it is now believed by the British engineers that that old type can be worked over into a type which will be most efficient for fleet submarines. Within the last 30 days the ship that has been fitted with the latest devices in the modification of the earlier engine of the K type has been put to her tests in the North Sea. Those of you who have been following that subject have been reading that the tests appear to be satisfactory, but the British Government is not ready yet to say that the tests are final and that this fleet submarine is wholly adequate. Our own Bureau of Engineering has been working upon this problem and it is deserving of no criticism whatever, because here is a new subject and it is a new thought.

The engineers believe that they have to-day the choice of two types of engines that would be adequate for a fleet submarine, but they do not know. The three that have been completed within the last four or five years have failed to measure up to expectations. Now, then, what did we do to meet the situation?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. What was the total cost of the three submarines which are tied up?

Mr. FRENCH. The total cost was approximately $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, although the problem of final readjustment has to be met. The three proposed submarines would cost $18,450,000.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. What is the necessity of three experimental submarines? Why not try out one and if it fails find out what the defects are and then try out another? What is the need of three failures at one time?

Mr. FRENCH. The question which the gentleman has just asked is the question which addressed itself to the members of the committee. We met the problem in this way: We found we had certain hulls which we thought would be suitable for test purposes. We called the officers of the Engineering Bureau before us, and we asked with regard to the matter, and we were told very frankly that such was the case. We asked what it would cost to install in one of these hulls an engine which the Bureau of Engineering believes would be adequate for a fleet submarine, and we were told that could be done for $600,000. If so, then, instead of authorizing one of the three fleet submarines recommended by the Budget Bureau, we have brought in a provision in our bill appropriating $600,000 for the purpose of giving the Bureau of Engineering authority and the means to test out, not in the laboratory but to test out in a fleet submarine an engine which it believes would be adequate.

Mr. MADDEN. It is to be tested out in one of those already constructed, is it not?

Mr. FRENCH. We did not tie down the department, because contracts have not been adjusted.

Mr. MADDEN. But that was the intention of the committee?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. To use one of those that were found inadequate?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the money was made immediately available?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; we have made the money immediately available.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it the gentleman's opinion, if this bill is passed as reported, that it provides for a Navy which will come up to the 5-5-3 treaty?

Mr. FRENCH. There is no question in the minds of the members of the committee that the Navy of the United States is adequate under the basis of the treaty ratio. We have our allotted number of ships, to start off with, of the capital type; we have an excess number in some other types, as to which the number is not limited; other nations have excesses in some other lines. We are not well rounded out in some types. We shall need as we go along, probably, to modify the number of ships of different types, and other nations will need to do the same. But there is no question in the minds of the members of the committee that our Navy is second to none in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. LAZARO. One further question, please. What has the Navy Department finally decided to do relative to the appropriation made to increase the range of our guns on battleships?

Mr. FRENCH. A year ago, after the naval subcommittee had concluded its hearings, the Navy Department recommended an appropriation of $6,500,000 for that purpose, upon the assumption that the guns of the British ships could outshoot our guns on probably 13 of our ships by 4 or 5 miles. It was found after the bill had been passed and after the adjournment of Congress that the premises were not accurate.

The greatest disadvantage it was ascertained would possibly be to the extent of 2 or 3 miles. Under the circumstances, the Navy Department did not feel it should go ahead and expend money that had been appropriated on the basis of an entirely different assumption of facts, and so the money has been carried in the Treasury as an unexpended item until to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. We repealed that appropriation yesterday.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; we were told by the officers of the department it was not planned to expend the money until Congress should so authorize, and as the chairman of the committee [Mr. MADDEN] has said, the item was repealed yesterday; so the whole question will come up as a new proposition should it arise again.

Mr. LAZARO. Then this is the result of the judgment of the Navy Department and not on account of pressure brought from other nations, parties to the treaty.

Mr. FRENCH. You mean the action the House took yesterday?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. I would not say that. I think the Navy Department feels that if our guns can be outshot 2 miles, that that is quite a serious consideration, if not as serious as though they could be outshot 3 miles; but the position of the department was that it did not want to expend the money it had asked for on one basis when, as a matter of fact, it was shown to their satisfaction that their advice was erroneous. Therefore the officers of the department told the members of your committee that they did not propose to expend the money unless the Congress should authorize it. The simple thing to do seemed to be to repeal the appropriation entirely, let the whole thing go to the legislative committee of this Congress for consideration, to determine whether or not the changes can be made under the treaty, and, if so, whether or not there are compensating advantages that our ships have that could be weighed against any disadvantages that it is alleged exist here. The whole thing becomes a new question to be considered by the Congress.

Mr. LAZARO. One more question, please. How do we compare when it comes to carriers for hydroplanes?

Mr. FRENCH. We have at this time completed the Langley, which can be said to be a very complete and a very adequate airplane-carrier ship. It is largely experimental, and it is, you might say, in the way of a model for the airplane carriers that we are permitted to have under the treaty. Under the treaty, the gentleman will recall, we can have airplane carriers with a total tonnage of 135,000 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. I think, Mr. Chairman, I will conclude in a short while.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for an additional hour.

Mr. FRENCH. Under the treaty it is provided that two of the six battle cruisers that were under construction at the time the limitation conference was held could be converted into airplane carriers, and the work of converting these two vessels is progressing at this time. We have not wanted to progress too rapidly in that type of work, for the reason that this is a problem that is in its experimental stage.

The Langley is telling us constantly what should be done, what should not be done, and we are obtaining valuable lessons from the experience of the Navy in the matter of that great ship. Let me say that the ship Langley, in my judgment, is a triumphant success.

Mr. LAZARO. I will say to the gentleman I have been on the Langley and I agree with him about it, but you admit that we have only one real carrier.

Mr. FRENCH. That is the only one.

Mr. LAZARO. In the event of war, if it should be necessary to have part of the fleet on the Atlantic and the other part on the Pacific, what would become of one part of the fleet without a carrier?

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, what the gentleman suggests is true. We need to round out our fleet by way of completing the airplane carriers provided for under the treaty, and those things are doubtless met by the department and by this Congress upon the basis of the imminence of war.

Mr. LAZARO. Of course, the gentleman remembers that when the Panama Canal was built, the idea was that it was not necessary after that to keep all the fleet together.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. And to-day, with the progress that has been made in aviation, it is absolutely necessary to have at least two carriers.

Mr. FRENCH. I think the gentleman is correct; but, on the other hand, I think it has been a very desirable thing to hold back construction work upon the airplane carriers that are to be part of our Air Service until certain problems could be worked out upon the Langley.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman inform us how many airplane carriers Great Britain has of the same commodious type and with the same accommodations as the Langley?

Mr. FRENCH. Great Britain has two completed and two building, one of which is a small one. So we are not at so great a disadvantage, especially since the whole subject of aviation is in a rather experimental stage, although experiments are rushing fast upon each other and have done so during the last five or six years.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. May I ask the gentleman another question, if it is not an inappropriate place to ask it, assuming the gentleman is about to conclude his remarks? Is there any provision made in this bill for a fleet of river boats for the Yangtze River in China?

Mr. FRENCH. The committee did not have authority to consider those items. As I understand, the legislative committee has had the consideration of those items, and it will require legislation in order that the items may be taken care of. And let me say right here that your committee tried very hard to follow the rules of the House and not bring into this bill items that we did not have jurisdiction over.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. May I ask one further question? Was that matter brought to the attention of the committee by the Navy Department?

Mr. FRENCH. Not in the way of an estimate. The item has been referred to in the Secretary's report.

Mr. MADDEN. It did not come to us in the Budget, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. FRENCH. No.

Mr. MADDEN. And it properly should not be in the Budget.

Mr. FRENCH. Let me say that if the item had been in the Budget it would have been the duty of the committee to have declined to consider it and to have referred it over to the legislative committee.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The reason I asked the question is that, having been in that vicinity during last summer, there was brought to my attention the great disadvantage we were subject to by reason of not having suitable vessels to maintain the necessary patrol of the Yangtze River for the protection of American interests.

Mr. FRENCH. There is no question as to the importance of the Yangtze patrol. Our trade alone over there aggregates in money approximately $145,000,000 or $150,000,000 a year.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] who made the inquiry that there is pending before the legislative committee—the Naval Affairs Committee—a new building program which includes gunboats for the river to which he refers, the Yangtze.

Mr. BUTLER. Those estimates before the committee aggregate nearly $98,000,000.

Mr. FRENCH. Not for the purpose of the gunboats on the Yangtze.

Mr. BUTLER. No; but for everything.

Mr. FRENCH. I think for the purpose the gentleman had in mind it is $6,000,000 or $7,000,000.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is correct on that.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I am quite sure that will afford relief and satisfaction to a number of American citizens who have reasons to be in that part of the world.

ENGINEERING ECONOMIES.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, there are two other items I think I ought to refer to briefly, where we have made vital changes in the recommendations made by the Bureau of the Budget. One of them has to do with the Bureau of Engineering. Gentlemen will recall that the war resulted in the development of many engineering devices, means for saving fuel, and so on, and these suggestions have been assembled since the war, and we have now come to the point where the engineering department believes that many or most of our ships ought from an economical standpoint to be overhauled in part and to have certain types of machinery removed and other types put in place of them for several purposes: First, to safeguard human life; second, to gain efficiency; third, to obtain economies in such lines as fuel consumption, the storing and preservation of goods, provisions, and so forth.

The statement was made, not in the Budget, but it came up incidentally, that if an appropriation of $3,000,000 were available for bringing our ships up to date along lines that would be recognized by the best business houses, there would be a saving, after the installation of the machinery, of $3,000,000 every year. That interested the members of the committee. We immediately called for further information on the subject, and we had to draft the officers to tell it because they could not volunteer it. The result of extensive hearings, however, and the consideration of the problem was that we asked the officers to divide that $3,000,000 budget into a list that would indicate one-third of the most important, another third of the second in importance, and the last third of the least importance. We went over the several items and we were so impressed with the importance of the first two-thirds from the standpoint of the protection of human life and the promotion of efficiency and economy that we included in this bill in excess of the Budget for engineering purposes $1,960,000, giving the department the authority to carry on the work I have referred to, and gentlemen will find in the hearings all the items touching two-thirds of which it was believed the appropriation of necessary funds therefor would result in much saving and efficiency to the Navy.

MANUFACTURE OF TORPEDOES.

There is another change in the Budget recommendation to which I would refer and that has to do with torpedoes. The Budget Bureau recommended $1,200,000 for the purchase and manufacture of torpedoes. The current law carries $450,000. We have at this time the number of torpedoes recommended by the General Board for all the ships in active commission, including the reserve supply. In addition, we have 80 per cent of enough to care for all of the ships that are out of commission. Had we granted the appropriation of $1,200,000 for this purpose, it would have been necessary to increase the number of employees in the establishment manufacturing torpedoes. We did not think in this time of peace, with the number of torpedoes we have on hand, that it was a wise thing to do. Changes are constantly being made in torpedoes. Torpedoes that at the beginning of the war would have exploded upon the first impact were changed in two or three years, until they would not explode until they had reached the second impact. Changes are constantly being made.

These are instruments that cost from eight to twelve thousand dollars each, depending upon the amount of usable material on hand. We thought we had an adequate supply, and that we would better keep the establishment running, keep our hand in, keep a trained force at work and maintain the art rather than build up additional stores of torpedoes for the Navy at this time.

Let me say this in conclusion about the Navy: We believe that the Navy is an institution of which this Congress and this country can well be proud. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in speaking of guns and ships and navy yards and armament conference and the other matters to which I have referred, we think of the Navy as an institution of war. Let me remind you that the Navy, powerful as it may become as an agency of war, is essentially an instrument for peace. The record of our Navy is a proud record, and from the day the Navy was first organized in our Government until the present that arm of our Government service has reflected glory and honor upon its officers and men and upon our common flag. It was that Navy that brought an end to the impudent piracy of the Barbary States in the early days of our Republic. It was that Navy that enabled the United States to make a treaty with France in dignity and honor after we had been flouted by the French Government when we had no navy. It is that Navy that has added luster to the history of American Government in every war into which our country has been forced in the past 100 years. But the Navy of the United States stands for peace. It was because of the fact that our Navy was strong and that as a nation we were powerful that two years ago our Government could take the lead in the movement for the limitation of naval craft. It was our Navy, including the Marine Corps, that was called upon to bring peace and order in Haiti and Santo Domingo within the last 10 years.

The Navy of the United States as an agency for law and order has immediate relation to our success as a Nation. It costs us something like $3,000,000 per year to patrol, as it were, the West Indies. The trade with the West Indies aggregates more than $50,000,000 annually. It costs us $3,000,000 per year to maintain the Yangtze patrol in Chinese waters, and by means of law and order upheld by the Navy our trade with China aggregates approximately $150,000,000 every year. There are other by-products in the institution of the Navy that are close at hand. Through the engineering service of the Navy, tests that are made in laboratories and in boiler room, tests that are the result of discipline and intensive study, it is a modest estimate to say that the industries of our land in the consumption of fuel saved annually not less than from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 on account of naval devices and methods that have originated in the Navy. The Navy is an institution that means relief and helpfulness; and if it is Chile whose people have suffered by disaster, the ships of the Navy carry relief. If it is Smyrna in Asia Minor, the ships of our Navy are called upon for aid. If it is disaster in Japan, our Navy is the first to carry not only good will and sympathy, but food and clothing and medical supplies, that the people of Japan may not suffer. And, Mr. Chairman, the attitude of our Congress toward our Navy, as it shall be reflected in this bill, will be helpful in holding the good will of the nations of the world.

The committee believes the appropriations we have suggested are adequate. We believe that no extensive construction program is necessary or desirable; and certainly no program is called for in building of ships not limited by the limitation of armament treaty in such numbers as would arouse suspicion or endanger the friendliest relationships upon the part of other great and proud world powers.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. First, I shall apologize for not being here when the gentleman began his speech; and, not that my constituents may know where I have been, but in order that the gentleman may understand, I would say that I have been engaged over in the Naval Affairs Committee all day—

Mr. FRENCH. I know that the gentleman's committee is one of the busiest in the House, and I also know that hearings are at present going on on most important subjects before his committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman answer me two or three questions, so that I may get the knowledge and carry it over to the committee. What provision has been made for the repair of six of our battleships which need repairs very badly, and what will be expected of the Naval Affairs Committee in the way of authority to bring our ships up to date or up to as good a state of repair as the American people would be glad to have?

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman, I suppose, refers to the four battleships, especially, that broke down during the fleet maneuvers a few weeks ago?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman is referring to the coal burners?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRENCH. Last year the appropriation bill carried approximately $2,500,000 for upkeep work, repair work on the 18 battleships. It will be interesting to this House to know that $1,400,000 of that amount was expended on 14 ships, including 2 of the best coal burners, the other 12 being oil burners, and that $800,000 was expended on these 4 ships—coal burners—which broke down during the maneuvers a few weeks ago. In other words, $800,000 was expended on the upkeep work and repair work on 4 ships that broke down a few weeks ago, as against $1,400,000 on 14 other ships of the same general class.

Mr. BUTLER. How does the gentleman account for that?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, in this way: When the 1916 program was begun we commenced the laying down of a large number of battleships of the oil-burner type, looking forward to the ultimate decommissioning of the coal-burning ships. Even had we desired to do so, we could not have changed those ships during the World War from coal to oil burners. In the war they had the severest of usage, but they made good. After the war it was expected that the ships that had been authorized in 1916 would gradually take the place of the coal burners, and it would not be well to expend large amounts of money upon them for replacing machinery. It was expected that as ships would be completed which were authorized, those ships would be put in the second line, and gradually those ships would be taken out of commission and scrapped. Now, when the Limitation of Armament Conference was held two years ago we were limited to 18 ships, and instead of scrapping those 4 ships that broke down the other day during the maneuvers they were put in as part of the 18, and we scrapped 11 ships which were on the ways which were planned to be oil burners and ships that would be comparable to the best in any navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Would it not have been advisable under the agreement to have maintained two of the ships scrapped of about equally the amount of tonnage of these four ships on which the gentleman said we spent this large amount of money?

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, the gentleman will recall there was authority to replace two old ships with two ships which were about completed, but which were not completed when the limitation conference was held. Now, I have no doubt within the confines of the chamber in which the Limitation of Armament Conference was held there was much negotiation. We had trouble to have Japan agree to the scrapping of some of her ships. We had to arrange with Great Britain with respect to carrying on certain of her program. We agreed to maintain those four and to replace two others with new ones, and so they became part of our quota of 18 capital ships, and I assume it was the best arrangement that could be made at the time. Now, let me say this in conclusion on this subject.

Mr. BUTLER. How much will it cost? How much authority does the gentleman ask? Mr. VINSON of Georgia, the ranking minority member on our committee, has asked some questions. How much authority and how much money will be needed? The gentleman probably has the knowledge and we have not had an opportunity to consider it because we are considering one measure, and have been for 40 days.

Mr. FRENCH. I will answer in three ways. In the first place it will take approximately $35,000 to purchase materials for those four ships to-day and approximately $70,000 for labor and incidental expenses, or with approximately $100,000 we can put those four ships back in the Navy and make them able to function. That is, we still retain them as coal burners though not comparable to modern coal-burning ships. Now, a second plan can be adopted. It would be this, to continue them as coal burners with a replacement cost of approximately $375,000 apiece.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not desirable.

Mr. FRENCH. That would mean to continue those ships as coal burners, and it would mean to take out the old parts and replace them with new parts and make them comparable to ships that are in first-class condition but still coal burners. There is still another alternative, and that is to take out the coal burners and install oil burners.

Mr. BUTLER. How much would it cost?

Mr. FRENCH. It would cost approximately, I think, around $3,400,000.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Convert them over to oil burners?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That will have to be authorized by the legislative committee before you can make any appropriation for it.

Mr. FRENCH. Well, the limit that has been followed has been $300,000, although I do not believe the question has ever been determined by the House whether when an estimate comes down in excess of the amount it would be necessary for it to go to the legislative committee or not. However, I do not care to meet that question.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, of course I will say the Appropriations Committee would cooperate with the legislative Committee on Naval Affairs as much as we could.

Mr. BUTLER. We have not had an opportunity to get this information, and we are here to obtain knowledge. So far our hands have been tied.

It matters not whether the authority comes from the Committee on Appropriations or from the legislative committee; it would cost from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 to convert these ships into oil burners.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; that is the situation as to the four oldest ones.

Mr. BUTLER. That money must be provided.

Mr. FRENCH. To provide a Navy that may be adequate and yet to safeguard the treaty—that has been our problem; that is your problem. I remember one evening during the hearings, when the hour of adjournment had come, Admiral Robison, of the Bureau of Engineering, had just concluded his testimony for the day. The official reporter had been excused and the members of the committee were indulging in an unofficial interview with this naval officer.

I remember Admiral Robison said:

Gentlemen, it is a tremendous responsibility to be charged with the administration of the money that is contributed by our people for the expense of the Government. This responsibility has borne so heavily upon me as the head of a bureau that I have been compelled to think of the moneys that I am authorized to expend in terms of more than money. I have gotten to thinking of these expenditures in terms of human life.

And then he said:

You take a man and estimate not the value of all the kind deeds, the love, the amenities, his service to his home and community, but his earning capacity in a lifetime, and you can estimate his value at approximately $75,000.

Now, said Admiral Robison—

If that is the value of a human life, I have tried to think of the limitations upon any intelligent expenditure of money as expending a human life every time I expend $75,000 that you furnish.

Gentlemen, I want to say that this metaphor made a deep impression upon me. I have tried to have it control me as I thought of my duty on the items of this bill. I want it to make an impression upon you and help to control the expenditures of Government, and I want you to think of it in considering the bill now before you; the value of the dollar, not reckoned in so many cents but the value of the appropriation made on the basis of the human lives that will be spent, assuming that each human life is worth economically what was suggested, $75,000. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know that after the speech of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] you will readily accept as true my statement that in all my experience I have never known any Member of this House to give to an appropriation bill the time and thought that has been given to this bill by my colleague from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. He has devoted months to it and has made as detailed an investigation of the affairs of the Navy as ever has been made by a Member of Congress, and in consequence of that investigation he is to-day one of the best-informed men in the country on the affairs of the Navy.

I want to talk for a few minutes, not of the details of this bill—because after the discussion by the gentleman from Idaho it would be irksome to you—and then it is true that between us there is no difference, certainly no material difference, as to the provisions of the bill. I want to talk first about the organization of the Navy Department, because I think it exceedingly important that just at this time some one should call attention to a situation which is of vast importance to the future of the Navy.

For years there has been an effort on the part of some officers of the Navy to substitute military for civilian control of the Navy. It was attempted during the administration of President Arthur, during the administration of President Roosevelt, during the administration of President Wilson, and during the administration of President Harding. In later years the effort has been to concentrate power in the Chief of Operations. Gradually power has been vested in that office, but not until the last six months did it acquire the power "they long had sought, and mourned because they found it not."

Let me read the statute governing regulations:
Section 1547 of the Revised Statutes provides—

The orders, regulations, and instructions issued by the Secretary of the Navy prior to July 14, 1862, with such alterations as he may since have adopted, with the approval of the President, shall be recognized as the regulations of the Navy, subject to alterations adopted in the same manner.

This section has been construed as follows:

The authority of the Secretary to issue orders, regulations, and instructions, with the approval of the President, in reference to matters connected with the Naval Establishment, is subject to the condition, necessarily implied, that they must be consistent with the statutes which have been enacted by Congress in reference to the Navy. He may, with the approval of the President, establish regulations in execution of, or supplemental to, but not in conflict with, the statutes defining his powers or conferring rights upon others. The contrary has never been held by this court. (U. S. v. Symonds, 120 U. S. 46, 49; Glavey v. U. S., 182 U. S. 595, 605.)

Now, here is the law governing the office of Chief of Operations. The naval act of March 8, 1915, provided that—

There shall be a Chief of Naval Operations, * * * who shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, be charged with the operations of the fleet and, with the preparation and readiness of plans for its use in war.

The naval act of August 29, 1916, provided that—

All orders issued by the Chief of Naval Operations in performing the duties assigned him shall be performed under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and his orders shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary, and shall have full force and effect as such.

Under this law regulations governing the office of Chief of Operations have been made from time to time. In 1920, during the administration of Secretary Daniels, regulations were adopted providing that the Chief of Operations should advise as to the matters pertaining to fuel reservations and depots and other matters, but this was only for advice; it did not confer power to act in all the matters enumerated. But on August 30, 1923, the regulations were amended so as to give the Chief of Operations the power to "coordinate all repairs and alterations to vessels and the supply of personnel and the material thereto, so as to secure at all times the maximum readiness of the fleet for war."

The Navy Department has a Chief of the Bureau of Navigation to control the personnel of the Navy and the supply of the personnel to the ships. We have a Chief of the Bureau of Engineering, and of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to control repairs and alterations of ships. The only purpose of this regulation was to make the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, the Chief of the Bureau of Engineering, and the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks subordinate to the Chief of Operations. The regulation continues that "all orders issued by the Chief of Operations in the execution of his assigned duties shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary of the Navy and have full force and effect as such." Under this regulation the Chief of Operations can, as to practically every activity of the Navy, issue orders to the Chiefs of the Bureau of Navigation, Engineering, and Yards and Docks, and all other bureaus of the department, without submitting such orders to the Secretary of the Navy for his approval. And so far as the new Secretary of the Navy is concerned, if the President of the United States is going to be fair to him, he ought to telegraph to Mr. Wilbur, of California, that if he accepts the appointment as Secretary of the Navy and comes to Washington, he ought to bring with him his golf sticks, because, outside of entertaining visitors, attending banquets, making speeches, and signing his name on a dotted line, there is little left for him to do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How long has that been the law?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is the result of a regulation adopted August 30, 1923.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A regulation made by whom?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. By the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That was Secretary Denby.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Under the administration of Secretary Denby.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did he issue the order?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Well, the order I have is signed "Theodore Roosevelt, acting"; but I am satisfied this is an order that was sent to the officers and to the fleet, and it was issued under regulations adopted with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

But my contention is that under the statute, which specifically limits the duties of the Chief of Operations to the operations of the fleet afloat and to the making of plans, that Secretary Daniels was right when, in his annual report for 1920, he said this, speaking of the Chief of Naval Operations and his powers:

These limits are by no means narrow. There is a world of work incident to the operation of the fleet, requiring of its administrative agents, responsible to and under the Secretary, a very high order of professional ability. The preparation and readiness of war plans is a function no less important and one that calls for deep study and most careful consideration of campaigns, past and future, there being in fact no field of naval activity which offers greater inducement or affords more incentive for professional effort.

But important and far-reaching as these two legitimate and authorized lines of work are admitted to be, the fact must also be borne constantly in mind that the fleet is afloat, not in Washington, and that the "operation" of the fleet has consequently to do with the finished product itself and not the production thereof, the work of "preparation and readiness" pertaining solely to plans and not to ships or navy yards nor yet the Navy Department.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Did I understand the gentleman to take exception to the Chief of Operations having authority over the location of reserves and depots for fuel for the Navy?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; the Chief of Operations under the law has no power to do so. That is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy. But under this recent order, the Chief of Operations has the power to assign ships to any dock he wants to; he has the power to say what ships shall be repaired regardless of what the Chief of Engineering shall say or regardless of what the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks shall say; he has the power to say what fuel depots shall be established and, so far as I can see, make every other decision with reference to the conduct of the Navy.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. My colleague will notice that my question was directed entirely to the question of the location of the reserves, and the thought occurred to me—and I want to ask my colleague whether he will not agree with me—that the question of the location of the reserve, especially under conditions of modern warfare, is very germane to the war plans for the Navy.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. When the law says "preparation of plans," it did not contemplate the power to locate reserves. My friend must realize that the Chief of Operations like all other officials, must be governed by law. If the gentleman is of the opinion and if Congress should be of the opinion that the power to locate those reserves should be placed in the Chief of Operations and not in the Secretary of the Navy, then by law the power should be taken from the Secretary of the Navy and given to that officer, but until that is done that officer can have no right other than to advise the responsible head of the Navy Department, the Secretary of the Navy.

And any effort on the part of the Secretary to transfer to any officer the right to locate the reserves or to do any other act which by law is placed on the Secretary is an effort to abdicate functions specifically placed in him by law. I would not approve it because I believe this Government must remain, as it has remained, under civilian, and not under military control. I hold this view regardless of who may, for the time being, serve as Chief of Operations.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Could not the new Secretary of the Navy change these regulations?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Certainly, and that is the only reason for my remarks to-day. As a Member of the House I know that the Secretary of the Navy must assume all responsibility for the conduct of the Navy, and he should not do that unless he has hold of the reins of power. If he does not retain absolute control in his office and yet assumes responsibility, then his lot in life is apt to be a very unhappy lot.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does not the law authorize the Secretary of the Navy to make these regulations?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; he can make regulations provided they are not in conflict with the law, and when the law says that the power of the Chief of Operations shall be limited to these two functions, then any regulation which gives to him additional power is in conflict with the law.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does not the law give him those functions, but not limit him to those functions?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I contend it is in conflict with it, because it gives to him power vested in the Secretary of the Navy and not vested in him by law. If the Congress wants to vest such power in him, it can amend the law.

Mr. TABER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the regulations which have been issued are in conflict with the law?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I contend they are.

Mr. TABER. Then they are invalid of themselves, without any further action, are they not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They are invalid in law, but in fact they are not, because the Navy is operating under them to-day.

I have called attention to this because I want the new Secretary of the Navy, whoever he is, to know that they are invalid and to limit the power of the Chief of Operations to the functions provided by law. The gentleman and I will agree that they are invalid, but I want the Secretary of the Navy, whoever he is, to know that they are invalid and to insist upon compliance with the law. Service as Budget officer does not come under the power to operate the fleet or to prepare plans for war; but the Chief of Operations has been acting as Budget officer for the Navy; he has been preparing the estimates, providing for the appropriations for the department. Every man knows that duty in itself is enough to demand the entire attention of an officer of the Navy. Up to a few months ago Admiral Coontz, one of the most efficient men in the Navy, a splendid officer, who loves the service, was Budget officer, as well as Chief of Operations.

The Chief of Operations must direct the operations of the American fleet afloat and prepare plans for use in time of war, and I do not care who he is, he can not perform these duties and act as Budget officer and do justice to himself.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Who is the Chief of Operations now?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Admiral Eberle. But you must understand that Admiral Eberle is not acting as Budget officer, but Admiral Strauss is. Admiral Coontz was Budget officer while he was Chief of Operations. He served well in that capacity, but the Chief of Operations should not be the Budget officer.

Having called attention to this matter, let me make a few remarks about the appropriations. I hold the same views as the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. I regret we have to report a measure carrying as much money as this bill does.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Recurring to what the gentleman has just said about the transfer of power to a naval officer, has that naval officer, in charge of operations, authority under that order to make contracts binding the Government for supplies and material or for the manufacture of anything?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am satisfied the Secretary of the Navy would have to approve contracts of that kind.

The position is simply this: The civilian Secretary of the Navy coming into the Department without technical knowledge ought to have the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, of Engineering, and of Yards and Docks reporting directly to him and under his control, as a cabinet, so to speak, from whom he can secure various views as to the policy of the Navy, as well as having the views of the Chief of Operations. Concentrate all power in one officer and inevitably, as he has the power and is the ranking officer of the Navy, the only officer with whom the Secretary of the Navy will come in contact, it will be but a short time before the Secretary of the Navy, unless he is a most extraordinary man, will have only the views of the Chief of Operations. I would prefer to have the civilian Secretary receiving the views of the chiefs of the various bureaus, as well as the Chief of Operations, and forming his conclusions after listening to these experts, because sometimes it is good for a man to hear several experts before reaching a conclusion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; and it is fundamental, is it not, in our theory of government, that the Navy Department and the War Department and all other departments shall be under the control of civilians and not under Army officers or Naval officers.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And that control should not be nominal but should be actual control.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I agree with the gentleman in his statement.

In reference to appropriations, let me say that this bill, as the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has said, appropriates $298,000,000, or approximately $300,000,000. Let us stop and see how we have progressed. For the fiscal year 1916, after the beginning of the war but before we entered it, when rumors of war were in the air, we appropriated only $157,000,000 for the Navy.

Almost twice as much will we appropriate for the next fiscal year. We have had a limitation of armament conference limiting expenditures for the Navy. After that conference we are called upon to appropriate $300,000,000 for the Navy of the United States, and it makes us wonder what amount we would have to appropriate had we not held the conference for the limitation of armaments.

Mr. HARDY. How much would we have to appropriate?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I say the realms of imagination are open as to what we would have to appropriate.

Mr. HARDY. Five or six hundred million dollars at least.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. One man's guess is as good as another. Let us look at appropriations for the Army. In 1916 approximately $101,000,000 was appropriated, and for the next year we will appropriate for military activities of the Army $254,000,000, or two and a half times as much as was appropriated in 1916, just prior to the war.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You mean 1925?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. For 1925; yes. Two hundred and fifty million dollars, or practically the same as last year.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. The gentleman speaks of the necessity and regrets it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. What is that necessity predicated upon—upon legislation pending or upon some imaginary danger?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am frank to say to my friend from Wisconsin that I think it is necessary because we have as a result of the conference a 5-5-3 program. No two naval officers will agree as to the exact meaning of this 5-5-3 program.

But under the treaty there is no limitation of the cruiser strength, other than that the cruisers shall not exceed 10,000 tons. There is no limitation of aircraft. Great Britain, for instance, to-day has 48 cruisers with a total of 252,600 tons, while the United States has 10 of 75,000 tons and Japan has 25 of 157,000 tons. If we are to maintain such a Navy as was contemplated at the time of the armament conference, we can not under present conditions appropriate less.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. That is what I was getting at.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We really ought to provide for aircraft and cruisers that would put us on an equality with any other nation. I have been an advocate of economy in Government, but when it comes to the Navy I do not want a Navy superior to any other power, but I do not want a Navy that is inferior to any other power on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. The reason, then, is competitive?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; it is competitive. With resources that would permit us to construct and maintain a Navy stronger than any other power, we willingly surrender that right. I believe the Limitation of Armaments Conference performed a great service, because it demonstrated, first of all, that the representatives of the nations could gather around a conference table and make an agreement; but it did not go far enough. It changed the form of competition but did not eliminate competition. Competition is proceeding to-day in cruisers, in submarines, in aircraft, and if we are to maintain what the American people expect us to maintain, I am sure, a Navy equal to any other, we have got to appropriate this $300,000,000 to compete with the other two naval powers—Japan and Great Britain. But I am going to offer an amendment calling on the President again, as the last naval bill called upon the President, to request the other naval powers of the earth to once more meet in conference and make an effort to limit the number and tonnage of auxiliary vessels under 10,000 tons, and the strength of aircraft, so as to put an end to this naval competition.

Tell me it can not be done! Why, men thought you could not limit armament as to capital ships. Why anticipate failure? Conditions may have changed, and certainly the American Congress ought to put itself on record as saying, "Before we pass the bills now pending before the Naval Affairs Committee authorizing additional cruisers and gunboats we want to say to Great Britain and to Japan that as far as we are concerned we are willing to further curtail this competition in armament; we are willing to stop now before we go to the expense of building other cruisers, and then be placed in the position we were in as to capital ships—of canceling contracts and incurring an enormous expense and loss incident to the cancellation of such contracts."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was interested and somewhat surprised at a statement made before another subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations some weeks ago in discussing a matter connected with the Navy, where, in explanation of his appropriation, the officer made the statement that we had a greater number of ships in the Navy now than we had before the limitation of armament conference, or as many, I believe he said. Is that true or not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We have in commission now many less ships than before the conference. We may have more ships, but not in commission. Of course, we have not as many capital ships.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, as a matter of fact, there has not been any such reduction in ships, except the capital ships, as the public has been led to believe?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The treaty specifically limited the capital ships and aircraft carriers. It does not affect cruisers or auxiliary craft and does not affect the aircraft. That is why I want the Congress to go on record as favoring another conference and again ask the President to call on other powers so as to end this competition. The treaty applies only to ships of more than 10,000 tons. Inevitably the naval powers will proceed to develop fighting units not prohibited by the treaty. And as they are developed the ratio of 5-5-3 is destroyed. If we have capital ships of equal strength with Great Britain—but Great Britain is overwhelmingly superior in cruisers of 10,000 tons or less, and in submarines and in aircraft, manifestly, there is no equality in fighting strength. Provide a Navy of equal strength, manned by American seamen, and we need have no fears.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Does it not seem a surprising situation that this Government is loaning through private individuals $150,000,000 to Japan, and that at the same time Japan is engaged in this same race of building cruisers and other vessels?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have no information as to Japan except from newspaper sources. I may say that I have read somewhere that there has been a curtailment in Japan's program since her recent disaster. Prior to that time Japan was doing the proper thing. Japan announced that she was canceling contracts for the building of some cruisers, and made a favorable impression, but what she did was to cancel contracts for cruisers of small tonnage and immediately prepare to build larger cruisers of greater tonnage. The competition under the Limitation of Armament Conference results in this: Every nation is going to build cruisers up to the limitation of 10,000 tons. They will build them of nine or ten thousand tons, as many as they can, so as to make their navy the most effective, and they are going to compete for supremacy in aircraft and in submarines, which are not affected by the treaty.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. In the gentleman's judgment, how does our inferiority in the number of cruisers and in aircraft matériel affect us, in so far as maintaining a parity of naval strength with Great Britain?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That question answers itself. We have only 10 cruisers built and building and Great Britain has 48 built and building, Japan 25. We are deficient in submarines of an effective type. When it comes to these most effective units, I believe that we are deficient, and this Government will adopt and must adopt a policy of matching fighting unit with fighting unit. It can not do less; and the American people will say that, notwithstanding what the experts had in mind when they said 5-5-3, they thought that meant not only strength in capital ships but strength in fighting weapons, and that they believed that our Navy should be the equal to that of Great Britain.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I quite agree with the gentleman that that question answers itself.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I have been interested in the appropriations for aircraft of late. Can the gentleman give the total appropriations for aircraft—military, naval, and postal?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not do that.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. What does the Navy carry?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Fourteen million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, is it not true that considerable competition in naval armament by the different countries is inspired by private contractors, who reap rewards in obtaining rich contracts?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am frank to say that I am unable to answer as to the exact motives which inspire men or by which they are actuated. The gentleman is in better position than I am to answer that question.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Has the gentleman's committee taken any action to eliminate that in this country?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is nothing carried in this bill which would have any bearing on contractors.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. As a matter of fact, we are giving contracts out to these private contractors which we could perform in our own navy yards, are we not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not think that is correct. I hope that is not true, because I believe the other policy is the better policy. I can not yield further to my friend, but when I get through, if the gentleman has that information, I should be glad to yield to him and he can make a speech about it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can the gentleman tell approximately the number of airplanes used by the Navy?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Approximately 500. Let me proceed now along the line that I was speaking of when I was interrupted. I believe that we ought to have an effective limitation of armament and that the President ought to call for another conference. There can be no harm in asking for such a conference.

The reason such a request is not contained in this bill is because it is legislation and would be subject to a point of order. The committee did not want to violate the rules by including a provision that would be subject to the point of order and which ought to be presented by the Committee on Naval Affairs. But I believe in it and I believe, too, that it is exceedingly unfortunate that the President of the United States has seemingly become indifferent to a proposal which had the enthusiastic support of his predecessor, and which the people of America thought would enlist the hearty support of President Coolidge, namely, insisting on action by the Senate upon adherence to the world court. So far as the people are concerned I believe that they are in favor of the court, because they believe it a step toward the settlement of international disputes by arbitration instead of by the sword. Last fall before Congress convened the churches of America set apart a week, during which week throughout the entire Nation Christian people asked for favorable action by the Government upon this proposal, but nothing has been done. We find armament competition continues. We find the Congress appropriating again $300,000,000 for the Navy and $250,000,000 for the Army, and surely we ought to stop, look, and listen. We are drifting and have been drifting helplessly, aimlessly, doing nothing to accomplish that which is most desired by the people, not only of America but of the world, of promoting peace by the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. Investigations may be necessary, Congress may devote itself to other measures, but there is no proposal more calculated to promote the happiness of the people of America and of the world than the proposal to have the United States adhere to the World Court. [Applause.] This proposal was submitted to the Senate by President Harding. Leaders of the Democratic Party declared themselves in favor of it. Yet nothing has been done. Nothing will be done unless the President of the United States will take a more positive stand in favor of it. A mere announcement that he favors it will never bring about favorable action by the Senate. In his message at the opening of this Congress he commended it to the Congress and announced that he favored the proposal, but since that time I have not heard of any activity on his part to secure its adoption by the Senate. And as we drift, five years after the armistice, without making any progress toward peace, we can not blame the thoughtful women of the Nation who ask whether the cradles of to-day will be called upon to fill the trenches of to-morrow. No man here can answer that question in the negative. Competition in armament continues. Nothing has been done by this the most powerful Nation in the world to promote the settlement of disputes by arbitration. But the time has come for action, and my sincere hope is that as these bills with their large appropriations for military purposes are brought to the attention of the President he will follow the example of the soldiers of the Nation and fight for that which he says he believes to be right. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Would the gentleman from South Carolina like to use some more time now?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes. Will the Chair inform me how much time I have used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 45 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, my purpose is to make a connected statement, and I request that I be not interrupted until I shall have finished the statement.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read a section from the President's message, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the matter designated.

The Clerk read as follows:

IMMIGRATION.

American institutions rest solely on good citizenship. They were created by people who had a background of self-government. New arrivals should be limited to our capacity to absorb them to the ranks of good citizenship. America must be kept American. For this purpose it is necessary to continue the policy of restricted immigration. It would be well to make such immigration of a selective nature, with some inspection at the source, and based either on a prior census or upon the record of naturalization. Either method would insure the admission of those with the largest capacity and best intention of becoming citizens. I am convinced that our present economic and social conditions warrant a limitation of those to be admitted. We should find additional safety in a law requiring the immediate registration of all aliens. Those who do not want to be partakers of the American spirit ought not to settle in America.

Mr. BOX. I would like to ask that the Clerk read a section from the bill introduced by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] in the Senate, section 10, page 14.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the matter indicated.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 10 (a). When used by this act the term "quota" when used in reference to any nationality means 200, and in addition thereto 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such a nationality resident in the United States, as determined by the United States census of 1890.

Mr. BOX. The section read is essentially like the corresponding section in the Johnson bill reported to this House. Bills containing this provision have been introduced by Members of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and other Members of the House and Senate during the last three or four years. I have had a bill containing a similar provision pending for some years. This idea has been developed by the best thought which students of this problem could give to it. The President's message declares that sentiment, not without consideration, but doubtless upon mature consideration. The proposition had been long considered and discussed at the time the President read his message to the Congress. The proposition, however, has developed a very sharp issue.

I read from resolutions adopted by the Grand Council of the Order Sons of Italy of New York in opposition to the Johnson bill:

Resolved, That the Grand Council of the Order Sons of Italy of the State of New York hereby strongly protests against the enactment into law of the aforesaid measure and of any legislation the purpose of which is to discriminate in the apportionment of American opportunity.

The Patriotic Order Sons of America are on the other side of the question. With them are the Sons of the American Revolution, from whose statement supporting the same legislation I now read:

We favor a policy of restriction with an annual quota of 2 to 3 per cent of the number of foreign-born persons of each nationality resident in the United States, as shown by the census of 1890, not more than 10 per cent of the annual quota of any nationality to be admitted in any month.

The Johnson bill develops a sharp issue between the Sons of Italy and the Sons of the American Revolution. On that issue I propose to speak to the House and the country.

When an issue arises before the American Congress it is important to know who is aligned on each side of the question. I shall try to show you not all but some of the groups and influences aligned on each side as this question comes to issue:

American newspapers and magazines, too numerous to name, but composing a great part of the press, published outside the great cities populated largely by foreign peoples.

Let us, gentleman of the committee, examine the cry that this legislation will be unjust discrimination against certain peoples. Let us examine that for a minute. The word "discriminate" has different meanings. One is "to discern differences between"; another means an unjust exercise of discretion or an unjust choice, in which case the term "unjust discrimination" would be an apt one.

If alien people, if European people, if Japanese people, have vested rights in America, vested rights to a dwelling place, vested rights to employment; if they, living over there, have acquired rights here, and it is proposed to deny them what is theirs, then this legislation is "unjust discrimination." If America has the gift of citizenship, home, and opportunity to bestow as she chooses upon the worthy alien people whom she may select, no Government and no group in or out of America has the right to question the exercise of America's discretion in making such a choice. [Applause.] All of this talk that you hear about "unjust discrimination" means that our liberality has gone to such an extent that they think they own sections here. They said, "You will make Bolshevism worse." They said, "You will make our foreign-born people feel more dissatisfied, and it will be harder to get along with them, and you will have more trouble with them."

The hearings are filled with warnings by the representatives of racial groups that we are increasing unrest and the danger of Bolshevism among the foreign born by the proposed legislation. Gentlemen, that is to say that we already have admitted among us large, dangerous elements, and that we must admit more of them to keep them in a good and orderly humor. [Applause.]

The President's message suggests two bases for immigration quotas. One is a prior census. The other is the record of naturalization. Both tend to reduce immigration from southern and eastern Europe and to maintain those stocks which colonized here and came as our earlier immigrants, whose aspirations and views of individuality, home, religion, and government, and all of life have found expression in American institutions. Peoples have their own racial traits and characteristics, their own instincts, their own traditions, and our Government and civilization are born of what our fathers believed in, loved, and lived for. [Applause.]

The crux of the President's message is that we should maintain that which is good that we now have and to bring in less that will imperil it.

I have figures here respecting naturalization and its results. The "prior census" had the preference of first mention in his message, but that and the "record of naturalization" are based on substantially the same purpose. The prior census gives a smaller proportion of immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe. Basing it on the record of naturalization gives the same result in varying but striking degree. By far the largest percentages of naturalized foreign born are from the countries of northern Europe, and the smallest from central and eastern Europe. I give you the 10 European countries whose people run highest, and 10 of those running lower in American naturalization:

The 10 highest by countries.

(Abstract 1920 census, p. 388.)

Our choice of immigrants based on the record of naturalization will give the smallest quotas of immigrants from southern and eastern Europe and the largest from northern Europe. The President's message suggests these two plans, and a reading of it in the light of the known facts can leave no doubt that his recommendation is based on this very reason and purpose.

Who has any right to say that the President has changed his mind after the drive of these foreign groups against his recommendations?

In writing his recent letters in opposition to the basing of immigration quotas on a prior census, which reduces the quotas of certain countries, the Secretary of State is apparently in conflict with the views of the President as expressed in his message to Congress.

My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. Celler] said, in speaking to the House yesterday, that the very low percentages of naturalization among immigrants from southern and eastern Europe was because the new immigrants were so new. He said that the reason they stood so low in naturalization was because they had not been here long enough to increase the percentages of naturalized citizens among them. But I call your attention to the fact that the great bulk of this immigration started in the nineties. I have the figures from 1890 to 1919, inclusive. They came from those countries in large numbers during the nineties, then from 1900 to 1910, and from then up to 1915, when the World War checked them. The figures from Italy are typical. But I include several other southern and eastern European countries in the following tables:

[Many thousands came during each of the years from 1890 to and including 1898, but they were not counted by race or people prior to the fiscal year 1890.]

When these figures of the 1920 census on naturalization I have quoted were published the bulk of this population had been in this country for from 10 to 20 years, much of it for 30 years, and some for 40 years or more. More people came from Italy alone during two-year periods of that time than is shown by the total number of naturalized of those races at the end of a period of 40 years ending at the beginning of 1920, showing that their interest in American citizenship is not great.

During the extended hearings held by the House committee many of the foreign groups named appeared in opposition to this legislation. Their great partiality for the people of Europe and other non-American interests must have impressed the membership of the committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], a member of the committee, after hearing one or two of these witnesses, began to ask each one of them substantially the following question:

In case of conflict between the interests of the United States and the interests of the people of Italy, Rumania, Poland, Russia, and other European countries, which interests should prevail in the American Congress?

They often avoided answering the question by saying that they could not conceive the possibility of such a conflict. The strong partiality toward alien peoples which these foreign groups revealed, and their nonattention to or disregard of American interests, made the gentleman's question appropriate. Their attitude and argument raised the same question in my mind; and their demand that America furnish a place of domicile and employment for the unhappy millions of Europe, and their denunciation of America's proposed refusal to do it in an unlimited way, caused me to ask the question whether or not the people of Europe had any vested right to a place of domicile and employment here. The question seemed to excite and irritate them.

The arguments which these groups advanced in favor of the free admission of European aliens to America were a revelation of the viewpoint of America's foreign bloc. The protest of the Government of Rumania, which will be found on page 2841 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 20, 1924, shows that it is based largely on a dollars and cents consideration, as the following words from it disclose:

Further, it should be considered that the adoption of the census of 1890 would not only deeply wound the pride of the Rumanian people but also strongly affect their material interest, inasmuch as Rumanian immigrants by their savings increase the amount of stable currencies available for commercial and financial purposes in Rumania. This in itself would not fail to have a detrimental effect on the chances of Rumania to speedily attain its goal, economic recuperation.

I read again from the statement made by Justice Cotillo, of the Supreme Court of New York, who, however, appeared not in the capacity of an American judge, but as the grand master of the Order of Sons of Italy of the State of New York:

A severely restrictive immigration legislation will within a few years reduce greatly the emigrant's remittance, and it can be estimated that such reduction will amount from $50,000,000 to $70,000,000; that is, from one-fourth to one-third of the invisible flow of gold.

A severe restriction on immigration will be a severe economic blow to Italy, that is endeavoring so strenuously and so pluckily to do her share in the reconstruction of Europe and in bringing back peace and order.

This argument that we are wrongfully impairing the economic strength of Italy, Rumania, and other afflicted European countries, stated in plain English, is that America owes to the ruined countries of Europe the duty of providing homes and employment for their people so people will have money to be spent not in building up America but in rebuilding Europe. Such money is not to be taken from the wealth of the rich or the competency of the prosperous but from the jobs and wages of America's working people.

The charge made by the Sons of Italy that our refusal to continue to receive their surplus population in great numbers is unfair, unjust, and discriminatory has no sound basis. Because we have generously bestowed on Italy the gift of furnishing a dwelling place and employment for its surplus population, Italy now says that we owe them a duty to provide a dwelling place and employment for their surplus and unemployed population. The Italian commissioner of immigration actually contended that because the war had temporarily stopped the flow of Italian immigrants we owed them the admission of 1,500,000 of their surplus at the end of the war to make up for the places they had lost up to that time. (Hearings, pp. 82 and 86.) Then they wanted the stream to flow steadily after that. Representatives of other European groups indicated the same attitude. This attitude caused me, as a member of the committee, to inquire of them whether they understood that the overcrowded and unemployed population of Europe had any vested right to a domicile and employment in America. Their contention that we can not justly deny them a place of domicile and employment is, of course, based on the assumption that it is our duty to furnish them, which is preposterous and outrageous, and shows the un-American viewpoint of the foreign blocs already assembled here.

The argument of manufacturers, represented by Mr. Emery as counsel for the committee on immigration of the National Association of Manufacturers, shows in and of itself that the desire for labor in such abundance as to make it cheap is the mainspring motive of their efforts. There are many quibbles and criticisms of this bill and of existing law, but evidently the plan is to object to whatever is proposed and to propose nothing that will really tend to reduce the supply of labor.

The same view was presented by Mr. Klump, head of the labor department of the Michigan Sugar Co., who frankly declared that he was interested in procuring labor for his people. The chairman asked him:

Do you think about 6,000 would be all you would need?

Mr. KLUMP. That is about the usual number we need each season. Of course, there are quite a number of other sugar companies in Michigan. I would judge that the sugar companies of Michigan alone need from 20,000 to 25,000 people. (Hearings, p. 121.)

Mr. Emery, representative of a great number of manufacturers, admitted that he was before the Senate committee in 1921, claiming that there was a shortage of about 3,500,000 laborers, and in the same connection admitted that there was an oversupply of labor during that very year and constant unemployment in the United States, and that the doors should have then been closed against immigration. (Hearings, pp. 477-478.)

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD who Mr. Emery was and whom he represented?

Mr. BOX. Yes; I have it here. He represented the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States and some dozens of other manufacturers' associations among the names which I have read, as will be shown on page 444 of the hearings, serial 1-A.

As the vital interests of our own people, as represented and declared by our great patriotic societies, such as the Sons of the American Revolution, the Masons, the American Legion, and the National Grange, come to issue with the interests of foreign peoples, as declared by the Sons of Italy, the Polish National Union, the Italian Government, the Japanese Government, and the Rumanian Government, let us remember that the cause is being tried in the American Congress. No other forum has or will have jurisdiction of it until this body becomes so weak and derelict that it fails to meet the high responsibility which the Constitution places upon it.

At some early appropriate time I shall seek an opportunity to discuss the question whether the Congress shall control this domestic question, or whether we shall permit the treaty-making power or the Executive or State Department to usurp the power and handle it by agreements not even submitted to the Senate. Just now the issue is made before Congress. This consolidated Von Hindenburg drive of manufacturers, whose patriotism is subordinated by greed; of foreign-language newspapers, societies of foreigners, and millions of foreign voters, against the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution, the American Legion, and the interests for which the latter organizations all stand, raises the question whether the American Congress is too weak to hold the line and protect the country's dearest interests. This one big question divides itself into two phases:

First. Are Americans able to enact the immigration laws which they know the country wants and needs?

Second. Are Americans able to enforce such laws as they have, in spite of the interests, enmities, and opposition of those whose hearts are in their pocketbooks, or in Europe more than in America?

The legislative side of it arises first, and the first responsibility is upon the committee, and a double portion of responsibility is on the chairman as the leader of the committee. Let there be no misunderstanding. Fourteen or fifteen of the members of the committee signed the report supporting the Johnson bill. The rank and file of the membership of the committee signed. Five of the seven minority members sought the opportunity to sign individually and share the responsibility for themselves and their party associates, so that nobody could make a party question of this life-and-death American issue. The chairman has the support of an overwhelming majority of the committee—more than four-fifths of it. Moreover, this House wants to act on this question. The only thing which can keep the legislation from coming before the House for its disposition is the chairman and the party "powers that be." Even the steering committee and the Rules Committee probably can not prevent the consideration of this question if the chairman and majority members lead the way. If they are afraid to take the brunt of the fight, let them say the word and fall in behind. The minority are not afraid of the Sons of Italy, nor the Polish Union, nor the foreign-language newspapers.

In a recent newspaper statement the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the committee, denounced the report that the bill is dead. I congratulate him. We all stand ready to help him enact it into law. We are ready to help him show the country whether the Sons of Italy are stronger than the American Legion and all the rest. I have heard from many sources and have repeatedly read in the press that the groups of the foreign born of New York have notified our Republican friends that they will punish the Republican Party if this legislation is passed. I have seen evidences that such threats are inspiring fear. I hope the evidence is misleading. Time will tell. I have heard that New England politicians are saying that there should be legislation, but that since the Italian and European sentiment rules, or has the balance of power, it will ruin the Republican Party to pass the Johnson bill. Persistent rumors and press reports have it that the intention to enact this bill into law has been abandoned. I earnestly hope that these rumors do not bring a true prophecy; that these press reports misrepresent the prospects; yet these reports are disturbing.

In connection with recent exhibitions of the political power of these groups I am reminded of what the late Viscount Bryce, long ambassador to the United States, world traveler, student of world problems, and especially of America's great problems and prospects, author of such works as Studies in History and Jurisprudence, The American Commonwealth, and Modern Democracies, said in his Modern Democracies. I now read from that work:

The people—

Referring to the American people in colonial times—were nearly all of English or (in the Middle States) of Dutch or Scotch-Irish stock, stocks that had already proved themselves industrious in peace, valiant in war, adventurous at sea. All were practically English in their way of thinking, their beliefs, their social usages, yet with an added adaptability and resourcefulness such as the simple or rougher life in a new country is fitted to impart. In the northern colonies they were well educated, as education was understood in those days, and mentally alert. The habit of independent thinking and a general interest in public affairs had been fostered both by the share which the laity of the northern colonies took in the management of the Congregational churches and by practice of civil self-government, brought from England, while the principles of the English common law, exact yet flexible, had formed the minds of their leading men. Respect for law and order, a recognition both of the rights of the individual and of the authority of the duly appointed magistrate, were to them the foundations of civic duty. (Vol. 2, pp. 4-5.)

In speaking of New Zealand, Mr. Bryce says:

The country has grown steadily and not overswiftly in wealth, and has preserved the purity of its stock without that inrush of ignorant immigrants which North Americans have reason to regret. (Vol. 2, p. 331.)

Speaking of the practice of local self-government as the best training of a citizenship for a democratic government, he says:

The New England States of the North American Union, until they were half submerged by a flood of foreign immigrants, taught the same moral. (Vol. 1, p. 78.)

In discussing the forces which weaken the traditions of free government, such as Americans have up to this time cherished, he says:

Various have been the causes that have weakened or destroyed old traditions. Sometimes the quality of a population is changed; it may be, as happened in Rome, by the impoverishment of the bulk of the old citizen stock and the increase in the number of freedmen; it may be by the influx of a crowd of immigrants, ignorant of the history of their new country, irresponsible to sentiments which the old inhabitants have cherished. The English stock to which the farmers and artisans of Massachusetts and Connecticut belonged has now become a minority in these States. (Vol. 1, p. 140.)

These are not the words of a new Member of Congress, but speak the experience, observation, and ripe scholarship and philosophy of this great world observer, declaring a fact which is disturbing American students and alarming the American people. I wonder if this sinister power now apparently headed by the Sons of Italy is already strong enough to prevail against the Sons of the American Revolution and all their kind, including the American Legion, whose membership knew no defeat in open warfare? I wonder whether they are to see themselves and their loved America sniped to death by opponents unrecognized because wearing the garb of friends? Time will tell. Shall we allow the Sons of Italy to get the best of our honored compatriots, the Sons of the American Revolution?

A bill introduced in the Senate providing for the basing of the quota on the census of 1890 was recently viciously attacked by an assembly of foreign-born groups gathered in Philadelphia. I quote from the Philadelphia Inquirer of Monday morning, March 3, 1924:

REED ASKS FAIRNESS IN IMMIGRATION BILL—SENATOR CALLS QUOTAS BASED ON FOREIGN-BORN CITIZEN CENSUS DISCRIMINATORY—PENNSYLVANIA TELLS ITALIAN GROUP CONFERENCE HE FAVORS RACIAL STRAIN PLAN.

After receiving the delegation of the 15 representatives of Italian groups in Philadelphia, led by their president, Eugene V. Allesandroni, Senator REED opened the conference with a brief résumé of the present immigration situation in Congress.

CALLS JOHNSON IGNORANT OF EUROPE.

"Congressman JOHNSON, who lives all the way out in Washington, doesn't know anything about Europe or Europeans. He has an idea all European peasants are diseased. The anti-Japanese idea is wrong too. We're on a friendly footing with that country now. It is ridiculous to raise irritation again."

Here Mr. Allesandroni broke in:

"We objected to your bill, too, on the basis that it was also discriminatory, Senator REED."

"Well," answered the Senator, "I do not approve of the Johnson bill; nor do I approve of my own bill in its present form."

This incident aptly illustrates the drive now on in the United States by alien groups against this legislation.

The men of the American Legion turned the tide in one great life-and-death struggle. They know that this, too, is a life-and-death struggle. Let us hope that the Sons of Italy will not get the best of this momentous struggle. A great American journal recently truly said that the effect of the passage or defeat of this legislation will be felt in America for centuries.

The second phase of the question pertains to the enforcement of the immigration laws, to which I now invite your attention.

Laws and regulations produce results only in proportion to their enforcement. The immigration policy of the United States during recent years has been only partially successful. A large measure of failure which has attended our efforts to regulate immigration is due to a failure to enforce the laws made. Therefore I shall use the remainder of my time in an effort to present to the House that side of this very important question.

During recent years America has been the victim of the vicious habit of disregarding its laws. This attitude on the part of people and public officials has most ruinous tendencies.

Widely prevalent and persistent is our disregard of the laws against violence and murder. The American Bar Association, an organization well qualified to speak on the subject, found that America has more crimes of violence than any other civilized country in the world. The comparative figures submitted seem to prove the charge.

The overwhelming majority of our people, whose deliberate and fixed views caused the adoption of the eighteenth amendment and the enactment of the statute based on it, have been disappointed and disgusted because of the widespread and continuous disregard of that part of our Constitution and laws. The extent to which violations of these laws goes is distressingly great. The fact that this results from the activities of the most lawless element in the country, and that fundamental disloyalty to the Constitution and laws is involved, only aggravate the gravity of the evil.

I speak to-day in an effort to help the Congress and the people understand that our immigration laws are treated no better than are other restraining statutes made for the Nation's protection. A large measure of failure attends our handling of this question through the nonenforcement and disregard of the laws already made. It seems almost vain to write new statutes when such as we have are, to a great extent, failing because we do not enforce them.

Violation of these laws is, of course, not wholly new. I find proof of this in the records of Congress, in official reports, and in the history of our dealings with this question since the early eighties. I find distressing proof of the same fact in the bad results springing from the widespread disregard of the law.

To restrict the number of immigrants and regulate their kind are two of the main purposes of all these laws. Both of these purposes are defeated to the extent to which the law fails in enforcement.

Smuggling or bootlegging of nonadmissible immigrants is carried on in several distinct ways.

Smugglers come over the Canadian border, over the Mexican border, and from Cuba and the West Indies. They come in great numbers as deserting seamen.

A perhaps smaller number get in through the corruption of immigration agents and guards at the ports. At New York, where most of our immigrants enter, there have been several prosecutions and some convictions based on corrupt practices among Government employees in the Immigration Service. Considerable numbers come in spite of the quota law and other restrictions because foreign-born groups, industrial interests, and politicians representing such groups put such pressure upon the department charged with the enforcement of the law as to greatly impair its efficiency.

Great industrial interests often not only oppose the enactment of immigration laws necessary for the protection of the country, but they engage in wholesale and insidious violation of them.

Mr. Alexander Jackson, who was in the employ of the Rock Island Railroad Co. and appeared before the Senate Committee on Immigration in 1920, among other things, said:

In 1906 I was sent over to Europe by the Rock Island Railroad in charge of immigration, freight, and passenger business, with the title of general European agent. My district extended from St. Petersburg to Palermo, from Russia to Sicily, including all of the Scandinavian countries; everything, in fact, except the Balkan States. I didn't have anything to do with the Balkan States, because we considered that the immigration from these States was not worth bothering about.

My proposition was to try and develop good immigration that we could classify as assets instead of liabilities. We were after assets for our territory and not liabilities.

• • • If you get down to bedrock, you will find that a large percentage of these people have perjured themselves in that particular. A large per cent of these foreign immigrants perjure themselves in their declaration that they are not coming to this country under any promise of work or employment or anything else. I have observed this situation for 10 years.

Mr. Roberts, a reliable witness, residing in the vicinity of the Mexican border, familiar with conditions there and participating in the desire to have Mexican labor imported, testified before the House committee on January 28, 1920 (hearings, pp. 50 and 316), that great numbers had entered the country from Mexico illegally. He said:

• • • Sometimes we get them cheaper. Last year I made an arrangement with a man that he would get them for $3. He made that proposition, and that he would take them, haul them up the railroad to a station 18 miles away (from the border) for $1, making it cost me $4.

• • • They cross at night and bring them up to the next station. We do not care how they get them there as long as they get them there. He put 57 there at $4 a head.

The same witness estimated that there were not less than 200,000 such surreptitious entries per year about that time.

The result of all this is that tens of thousands, probably scores of thousands, more immigrants are coming than is shown by the official reports. The number of deserting seamen and the numbers smuggled in must be added to those shown in the official figures before we have the total number of immigrants coming.

An unascertainable number of aliens get into the country as deserting seamen. In his report of 1922 the Commissioner General of Immigration said:

Attention was invited in last year's report to the multiplied temptations of aliens to seek admission through the wide-open door presented by the seaman's occupation. For years, as it is well known, inadmissible aliens have entered the country in the guise of seamen, who promptly deserted their vessels upon arrival at American ports, and to the illiterate and criminal classes who formerly monopolized this open door has now been added the large class of aliens from countries the quotas of which have been exhausted (p. 151).

Secretary of Labor Davis has been repeatedly quoted by the press as estimating the number of aliens illegally smuggled into the country at 1,000 per day. That estimate may be too large. I called on the First Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. Henning, who is conservative and informed about immigration matters, for the estimate of his department as to the number "bootlegged" into the country. In his reply Mr. Henning said:

I think the most conservative estimates around the Immigration Service set the figures at 50,000 a year.

There were 522,919 immigrants who came into the United States during the last fiscal year through the ports, notwithstanding the restriction imposed by the quota law. In addition there were 150,487 who entered as nonimmigrants, some of whom remained. But if we count only those coming through the ports as regular immigrants and add to their number the estimated number of illegal entries, ranging between 50,000 and 350,000, we get a total of between 572,000 and 872,000. This is a large volume of immigration, and a large part of it confessedly is made up of those who avoid the guards and ports of entry and violate the law in the very act of coming.

But our failure to restrict the number of immigrants resulting from the violations of the law, serious as it is, does not adequately present the extent of our failure to regulate immigration. The admission of great numbers of those excluded by the laws presents a grave menace to the national welfare. Many of the illegal entries are made by excluded people. Communists and dangerous revolutionists are said to slip in mainly as deserting seamen, though doubtless many of them get in through other channels.

The extent to which the Department of Labor and the Immigration Service violate the law by admitting those excluded and in failing to deport those whose deportation the law requires is appalling. A Member of Congress proposed to impeach Hon. Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor under the former Democratic administration. I had become a member of the committee shortly before that, and was much disturbed to find that great numbers of warrants of arrest and deportation were being canceled and the deportations prevented, even after that same official had approved the orders of deportation. While the Rules Committee of this House was considering the impeachment resolution against Assistant Secretary of Labor Post, I stated to that committee, as will appear in its hearings, that Mr. Post did not appear to me to be in sympathy with the law and that he was not a suitable person to be charged with its enforcement. I had seen photostatic copies of a great number of these canceled deportation warrants and was dissatisfied with Mr. Post's action. I then believed, and now believe, that lack of sympathy with the law prompted some of his actions, and that many such aliens were not, in fact, deported because the service did not have the funds with which to deport them. I have not seen the official record made by the present Department of Labor in the cancellation of warrants such as Mr. Post canceled, but I am convinced, and upon my information and belief I state, that great numbers of such warrants are being canceled by the present Department of Labor much as Mr. Post canceled them. I do not know whether the number is greater or smaller than the number canceled by the former Assistant Secretary.

The two leading causes for the cancellation of such warrants and the failure on the part of this administration to deport those whose deportation the law requires, even after their deportation is legally ordered, is lack of funds and political pressure upon the department by Representatives and Senators and other influential political personages, mainly from the cities filled with the foreign born. The same causes promote many other miscarriages of the law. Hear it, Members of Congress! Hear it, American people! Lack of funds necessary for the enforcement of the law and unholy political pressure are defeating the accomplishment of the purposes of your immigration laws.

Those illegally admitted and those whose deportation the law requires but does not accomplish are of the most undesirable classes. Many of them are dangerous communistic social or political disturbers. Many are idiotic, feeble-minded, or insane. Others have dangerous and loathsome diseases.

In a survey recently made by a thoroughly competent man with abundant facilities at his command it was found that American jails, prisons, charitable institutions, and asylums are filled and overflowing with the insane, feeble-minded, and other classes of social inadequates.

I quote extracts from the testimony of Dr. Spencer L. Dawes, medical examiner of the New York Hospital Commission and also president of the Interstate Conference on Immigration, representing the States of California, Washington, Illinois, Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and New York:

Mr. RAKEN. Are we so helpless that they can pile these people in on us here from everywhere?

Doctor DAWES. Yes, sir. After they get in here. The trouble is that the law is not enforced at the ports of entry to-day. That is the secret of the whole game.

The CHAIRMAN. That is to say, it was not enforced this year or last year or the year before that?

Doctor DAWES. No, sir. And when I say that, understand that in particular I am not criticizing the officials at the ports of entry. There are not enough of them there. There are not the facilities there for examination of aliens at the various ports of entry.

I quote an extract from the testimony of Commissioner Curran, in charge of the immigration station at Ellis Island.

Mr. CURRAN. . . . This request here is based on the desire to have uniformity of immigration traffic for the sake primarily of decent inspection, so that we can sort them, really sort them, and we can't do it when they are going by at the rate of one a minute, as they have done for days and days at Ellis Island, and I have stood there with the inspector and watched them—an immigrant a minute. That is not inspection or examination; that is just counting them off and waving good-by to them as they go ashore. That is just what you get when your traffic is bunched.

Mr. BOX. Right there—I am sorry to interrupt you—but your health officers, the Health Service, who give them a preliminary examination; don't they have to examine them in much the same way?

Mr. CURRAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOX. And isn't what you say of the work of the inspector very largely true of the work of the Health Service?

Mr. CURRAN. Yes, sir.

In a later statement Commissioner Curran said:

That will bring about two results: First, an inadequate inspection. Last summer, when we took over 2,000 a day to Ellis Island for inspection, we had to examine them at the rate of an immigrant a minute. That is not an inspection; that is counting them as they go by; and is almost, to my mind, an abdication of the protection to the country that is required, or any proper and adequate inspection.

Mr. CURRAN. Yes, sir; they wanted to land 3,000 or 4,000; and we said "No; that 2,000 was the limit. But we do not call that inspection; we call that counting them as they go by and detecting the gross inadmissibilities."

The CHAIRMAN. I think it would be well to put in the report of the committee on State affairs of the National Republican Club of New York, which deals entirely with the cost of alien defectives, the alien insane in the State of New York, and the desire of that State to collect from the United States $17,000,000 for their expense.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish to insert it because it is much more concise than a pamphlet and more appropriate than the statement of Dr. Spencer L. Duwes. It carries this statement:

"On June 30, 1923, there were on the books of the State hospitals for the insane 41,302 patients, of whom 10,440 are aliens. Thus, over 25 per cent of the total population of the civil State hospitals are aliens."

Another excerpt from the report reads as follows:

It is high time that the State of New York, which is the greatest sufferer by reason of this condition, as well as the entire country, should vigorously insist upon the enactment of an immigration law not only defining what aliens shall not be admitted but also providing for effective administration and methods, particularly along the line of competent medical inspection and examination. The welfare and the rights of the State and of the Nation should be conserved, and neither the greed of steamship companies nor the desire of properly excludable aliens should be allowed longer to sweep over or around our immigration safeguards.

I quote from a statement made by the Interstate Conference on Immigration, held in New York City on October 24, 1923:

The chairman discussed at length laxity of enforcement based on a study of the records and on personal observation. He stated that he had seen immigrants passed as mentally and physically fit to enter the United States at the rate of eight a minute. He cited the testimony of a reporter of the New York Tribune who had seen 540 aliens passed at that same rate.

Passing to "bond cases" he said "that during the last fiscal year there were admitted under bond to the United States at Ellis Island 4,724 defective aliens who were excluded under the immigration law." This means that a bond was given, frequently with a false surety, which can never be prosecuted. The records of the Federal Government show that 95 per cent of those bonds are violated; these cases are spread all over the United States. They land in New York State—the Board of Charities takes care of them, the Commission for Mental Defectives, etc.; they get to the State of Washington, to Illinois—they were admitted mandatorily—Washington, D. C., said they should be admitted.

During the same year, 2,712 defective aliens were allowed to enter without bond; Ellis Island said they must not come in—they were defective. Of 12,976 other aliens found to belong to the excluded classes by medical officers at Ellis Island, 12,305 were permitted to enter by direct order from Washington—nearly 20,000 in all of the mandatorily excluded classes were permitted to enter the United States during the year.

This same deplorable failure in the enforcement of the laws excluding inadmissible people is shown by the official reports of the Commissioners General of Immigration. I insert tables made by me from the official tables covering the number of those classes admitted according to the showing made by the official reports during each of the last six fiscal years:

Tables showing numbers and percentages of aliens admitted and deported after certification by surgeons of the United States Health Service which examines immigrants as mentally and physically defective, for fiscal years ended June 30, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, and 1923, with illustrative specifications covering certain diseases and defects among those certified.

(Annual report, Commissioner General Immigration, 1923, pp. 142-143.)

A great many of the cases included in the tables and totals for these six years were disposed of by the Labor Department on appeal, but the greater number seem to have been decided by the primary inspectors and other immigration authorities at ports of entry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] asked me in his absence to yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. BOX. It must not be inferred that all these admissions were wrongful, though I believe the greater part of them were. In an effort to get the simple truth, without concealment and without exaggeration, I personally copied the figures given in these tables and submitted them to the Commissioner General of Immigration, from whose reports I had taken them, and requested him to point out any inaccuracies or wrongful inferences. He replied in writing that the figures harmonized with his records. In the same connection he wrote a long letter undertaking to show why the nonmedical inspectors, boards of inquiry, and the officials at the ports and at Washington were justified in admitting some tens of thousands who, according to the certificates of the Public Health Service, were of the classes excluded by law. In order that his explanation may be read in connection with my remarks I shall insert his letter at the conclusion of these remarks.

Many of these admissions were made by the Department at Washington "on appeal" to the Assistant Secretary of Labor by or in behalf of the excluded aliens. As illustrating the number of these appeals from excluding orders made at the ports for all causes to the Assistant Secretary of Labor, I give the following figures from reports of the Commissioners General of Immigration for the fiscal years 1918 to 1923, inclusive:

For 1918: Number of appeals, 3,618; number debarred, 2,555; 70 per cent; and number admitted on bond or otherwise, 1,063; 30 per cent. (Rept. 1918, p. 158.)

For 1919: Number of appeals, 4,121; number debarred, 3,109; 75 per cent; and number admitted on bond or otherwise, 1,012; 25 per cent. (Rept. 1919, p. 194.)

For 1920: Number of appeals, 4,812; number debarred, 2,950; 61 per cent; and number admitted on bond or otherwise, 1,862; 39 per cent. (Rept. 1920, pp. 204-205.)

For 1921: Number of appeals, 7,422; number debarred, 3,541; 48 per cent; and number admitted on bond or otherwise, 3,881; 52 per cent. (Rept. 1921, pp. 124-125.)

For 1922: Number of appeals, 12,828; number debarred, 5,244; 41 per cent; and number admitted on bond or otherwise, 7,584; 59 per cent. (Rept. 1922, p. 121.)

For 1923: Number of appeals, 14,506; number debarred, 6,247; 43 per cent; and number admitted on bond or otherwise, 8,259; 57 per cent. (Rept. 1923, p. 137.)

This summary of the results of appeals from excluding orders made at the ports shows an increasing percentage of admissions on appeal, running from 30 per cent and 25 per cent for 1918 and 1919, respectively, up to 59 per cent and 57 per cent for 1922 and 1923, respectively. These appeals are usually ex parte proceedings in the absence of both the alien and the physician who certifies that he is defective or diseased. In fact, about all that the departmental assistant usually has before him when he reviews the excluding decision is a brief paper record and a foreign bloc representative or a politician "with a pull."

In the same connection, and as showing some of the results of this serious failure to exclude or deport excludable or deportable aliens, I quote further from the statement of the National Republican Club of New York, appearing in the hearings.

Your committee recommends as follows:

1. That the Federal Government (a) through Congress by the enactment of law and the appropriation of sufficient funds, and through its proper officers in the adoption of methods and regulations, provide for and secure an adequate and competent medical examination of immigrants before entry, and a more efficient and rigid enforcement of the immigration law, particularly as regards the exclusion of excludable aliens and the deportation, without delay, of aliens legally shown by the authorities of the State of New York to be deportable.

(c) Regarding cancellation of warrants of arrest, that the Secretary of Labor, or such other officer as shall have the power to cancel such warrants, shall give due notice, with an opportunity to be heard, either in person or by letter, to the department or officer issuing the certificate, before a warrant, either of arrest or of deportation, is canceled.

The result of this miscarriage of our laws—of this folly in our failure to enforce them—is that we are enlarging to an alarming extent the proportion of our people who are mentally, morally, or physically defective. In support of this proposition I call your attention to the following:

The Abstract of the Census of 1920, page 97, shows that 65.3 per cent of our population is native born of native parentage and 34.7 per cent of the population is foreign born or of foreign-born or mixed parentage. Yet Doctor Laughlin, who made a survey of all the State and Federal institutions of the United States, found that the 65.3 per cent native born of native parentage furnished only 55.1 per cent of the inmates of institutions for those who are so defective or derelict as to require their being kept in custody, while the 34.7 per cent of foreign-born or mixed parentage furnished 44.9 per cent of the inmates of these institutions. (Hearings, 67th Cong., serial 7-C, p. 751.)

The same bad tendency is shown by kindred figures from the State of New York, whose population is 72.8 per cent native born and 27.2 per cent foreign born, but this 27.2 per cent foreign born furnishes 43.1 per cent of the inmates of the institutions for the insane, while the 72.8 per cent native-born population of that State furnishes only 56.9 per cent of the inmates of its insane asylums. (Abstract of Census of 1920, p. 103; testimony of Doctor Dawes, Hearings, 68th Cong., serial 1-A, p. 407.)

The number of the mentally diseased in care of public institutions throughout the United States has increased enormously during the last 40 years. I quote an excerpt from a statement by Dr. Walker L. Treadway, surgeon, medical officer in charge of the Public Health Service at Boston:

The rate of mental diseases under care in public institutions has increased during the past 40 years from 81.6 per 100,000 to 220.1 per 100,000 in the general population. This enormous increase in the number of persons requiring care in public institutions has entailed a great outlay of public funds for buildings and equipment and an increased yearly expenditure for their care. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. BOX. That foreign groups, industrial interests, and politicians have borne with hard unholy political pressure against the enforcement of the 3 per cent quota law, as they have against other portions of the law, is shown by the testimony of Assistant Secretary of Labor Henning, who, speaking of appeals for the admission of excess quota immigrants, said:

Just as I was trying to get out some Congressman's stenographer came in with an armful of them and I went through them hurriedly. (Hearings December 19, 1921, p. 224.)

And by the statement of Chairman JOHNSON, as reported on page 235 of the same hearings:

* * * ; neither do I think we are justified in leaving conditions as they are, with Members of Congress working for their constituents, with Senators working for their constituents, further pressing the department.

The enforcement of the 3 per cent quota law has been discreditable and subversive of its purpose. Repeatedly great groups, numbering thousands, have been admitted in plain violation of its terms. Congress has twice during the last three years stultified itself by pretending to validate these lawless acts months after they were done. On one Christmas occasion the gift of illegal admissions was generously bestowed on some 1,200 or more in the following language:

To officers of the United States Immigration Service:

By direction of Secretary, aliens now being held in detention all reports solely because in excess of quota, and those who may arrive on or before the 25th instant and be so held, are hereby lauded for a period of 90 days on execution of their personal bonds or personal-bonds relatives, with additional understanding that bonds with qualified sureties may later be required.

This order will not apply to those seeking admission and who are therefore in detention. Expedite to fullest possible extent release for all aliens who may be affected by this decision.

W. W. HUSBAND, Commissioner General.

The foregoing generous order applied to the 1,200 who were then at the stations in New York and Boston and, in addition, all quota cases among the Hungarians, Poles, and Italians in the harbor and coming up the bay at New York and all who might be on the sea on December 24 and 25 who arrived on or before the latter date.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman's figures are very interesting with reference to insanity, and I will state that before the Veterans' Bureau Committee recently testimony has been brought to us that in civil life the insane are about 3 to the 1,000, and among the veterans of the World War it runs about 6 to the 1,000.

Mr. BOX. I have personally visited the ports several times and minutely observed the work of inspection. The persistent efforts of labor importers, foreign groups, and politicians and the result of their work have likewise been noted.

First. The 3 per cent quota law has been and is so poorly enforced that its purpose has been in considerable measure defeated, though it has accomplished much.

Second. Scores of thousands of inadmissible aliens are coming in from Canada, Mexico, and adjacent islands, and at the ports. Some of this is unavoidable. The greater part of it is due to insufficient appropriations and consequent lack of men to enforce the law.

Third. The greater number of the admissions at the ports after the aliens have been certified as diseased or defective have been wrongful, in plain violation of the law, and in defeat of its salutary purposes. I personally stood by an inspector on a ship in New York Harbor and saw him pass a senile woman. As he did so he remarked, "She has been certified as senile, but I shall pay no attention to that. Senator — is interested in her." Political and business powers from the centers largely populated by the foreign born persistently interfere with the faithful administration of the law by pleading for and demanding the admission of mandatorily excluded aliens. The executive department feels compelled to heed these demands as far as possible. The result is a discreditable and distressing failure to enforce the law in hundreds, probably many thousands, of cases.

Fourth. Many large foreign-born groups already here are at enmity with the law, as the friends of the liquor traffic are at enmity with the prohibition laws. They resort to every means to prevent its operating to exclude aliens. To this source may be traced another large part of the law's failure.

Fifth. Those in charge at Washington are guilty of flagrant and continued violation of the law. I thought that Louis F. Post, the former Assistant Secretary of Labor, was not properly enforcing this law. I therefore advised the Rules Committee, composed chiefly of Republicans, then considering an impeachment resolution against him, that in my judgment he was not in sympathy with the law and was therefore not the man to be charged with its enforcement. I am fully convinced that the present Department of Labor is failing to a ruinous extent, and that its failure is due to weakness and political influence. The monstrous idea that they are not bound to enforce the law as it is written, but may break it at will to avoid hardships, is inconsistent with any efficient enforcement. All laws faithfully enforced sometimes crush men who come in conflict with them seeking to defeat their purposes. That officials may set aside mandatory statutes at their discretion is preposterous, and the official who does it is unworthy of his place.

For at least six years there has been much of this in the enforcement of the immigration laws. Unless the country can find men of sufficient conscience and firmness to apply the law, the purpose behind all former legislation and this bill will fail. That purpose is the protection of the Nation against a recognized peril. Unless we have strength to execute the law, foreign groups, whose alien affinities rule them, and labor importers, whose greed subordinates their patriotism, will have their way, and America will be filled with the poison and fire which have flooded the Old World with the miseries of perdition. [Applause.]

EXTENSION.

Being a copy of the letter of the Hon. W. W. Husband, Commissioner General of Immigration, explaining why so many aliens certified as diseased and defective by the examining physicians are nevertheless admitted, and comments thereon:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, February 9, 1924.

Hon. JOHN C. BOX, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BOX: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 6 inclosing certain tables showing the disposition of cases in which medical certificates had been issued in connection with aliens applying for admission in the fiscal years 1918-1923, inclusive. I have had these checked over by our statistical division, and they are found to be in accordance with the bureau records.

In explanation of why large numbers of aliens are admitted notwithstanding certificates showing physical or other defects have been issued by the examining medical officer I can perhaps do no better than to quote the following from a recent letter of the department in answer to a similar inquiry as to the record for the fiscal year 1923. The department stated in part:

"You are, of course, aware that the mere fact that an alien is certified for a physical defect which in the opinion of the medical examiner affects the ability of the alien to earn a living does not in itself render an alien inadmissible, but that the immigration officers at the port must consider such medical certificate in connection with all of the surrounding circumstances and decide the case accordingly. For instance, of the number against whom medical certificates were rendered, 5,623 were certified for senility, it being the invariable custom for the medical examiners to attach to such medical certification the statement that the disability may affect the ability of the alien to earn a living.

"The fact remains, however, that approximately 95 per cent of these aliens are the parents of aliens already here, who are both able and willing to properly care for them, and who, themselves, are not expected to engage in remunerative employment. Without in any manner intending to reflect upon the work of the public-health doctors assigned to immigration inspection, as I believe they are performing a most meritorious service and almost without exception are conscientious and painstaking in their duties, it appears that there are some medical examiners who make it a practice to certify almost all aliens over the age of 55 as being afflicted with senility; but when all the surrounding circumstances are taken into consideration, there would seem to be no justification either for the officers at the port or for the department when such cases come before it on appeal to exclude such aliens merely because of the medical certification.

"There are numerous other causes, such as deformity, hernia, pregnancy, less than normal function, loss of member, etc., for which medical certificates are rendered, but when considered in connection with the other facts in the case, which, of course, the medical examiners can not take into consideration, it is quite apparent that such 'deformities,' 'loss of member,' etc., would in no wise affect the ability of the alien to earn a living. For instance, if a jeweler, bookkeeper, or any other person engaged in occupations of a sedentary nature, were to be certified for deformity of the hip, loss of the nether extremities, etc., it could hardly be considered that such defect would impair their earning capacity. In fact, one of the officers in the principal districts has stated that over 90 per cent of the medical certificates rendered might be considered in the nature of marks of identification.

"As you are no doubt aware, the seventh proviso to section 3 of the act of February 5, 1917, provides that aliens returning after a temporary absence to an unrelinquished United States domicile of seven consecutive years may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor and under such conditions as he may prescribe. It is not at all unusual to have it develop in cases comprehended within this class that the alien has resided practically all of his life in the United States; that the ailment for which he is certified was contracted in this country; and that he has a wife and minor children residing here. The department has taken it for granted that the particular provision of law mentioned was designed to take care of just such cases, which seems the only logical conclusion if one is to be guided at all by the dictates of common decency and humanity. You understand, of course, that the medical officers can not take these matters into consideration when rendering their medical certificates, and if aliens so certified are admitted under this particular provision, the medical certificates would remain a matter of record. This circumstance might apply to any one or all of the aliens shown to have been certified for ailments which render them mandatorily excludable, and I have no doubt that they do apply to a large majority of the cases shown in the inclosed table.

"I might state, in this connection, that only a few days ago the department was confronted with a case wherein a family was returning to the United States after a temporary visit to one of the European countries. This family, when it first came to the United States, was accompanied by an infant child against which no medical certification was then rendered. When the family returned, however, this child, which is now, according to my recollection, in the neighborhood of 18 years, was certified as being an imbecile. The case was presented to the solicitor for an opinion as to whether this child could be considered as comprehended within the seventh proviso to section 3, already mentioned, and the solicitor's opinion was in the affirmative. Consequently, the department directed admission. I am sure that it could not be logically argued that the entire family which knew no home other than the United States should have been refused permission to reenter simply because of this afflicted child, or that the child in its helplessness should have been separated from the parents.

"Another circumstance which might explain the admission of such aliens is the fact that it has been the practice for a long time past to admit aliens for the purpose of obtaining medical treatment in this country where it is shown that similar treatment is not obtainable in the country from whence the alien comes. This applies particularly to a large number of aliens who are admitted from Canada for the purpose of obtaining treatment in the Mayo Institute, Rochester, Minn., and also to considerable numbers who are permitted to undergo treatment for tuberculosis at Saranac Lake, N. Y., and elsewhere. In fact, there are certain organizations, such as the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the International Typographical Union, and others, which have filed a blanket bond with this department under which their members residing in Canada are permitted to enter the institutions maintained by them, there being no possibility of such aliens becoming public charges nor there being any danger of spread of contagion resulting from their admission.

"By reference to section 22 of the immigration act, it will be noted provision is made that whenever an alien shall have been naturalized or shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, and said wife or any of said minor children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or minor children may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be accorded hospital treatment until cured and then be admitted. This provision also accounts for a large number of those shown to have been admitted, particularly those affected with trachoma or venereal diseases."

In this connection the department did not take into account the joint resolution of October 19, 1918, under which section 3 of the immigration act of 1917, known as the excluding section, was very materially modified for the benefit of aliens who served in the United States forces or those of the allied nations during the World War. The terms of this resolution applied to aliens returning within two years after the termination of the war, and the fact that this was in force up to March, 1923, undoubtedly accounts for the admission of a considerable number of defective aliens who otherwise might, and in many cases undoubtedly would, have been denied admission to the country.

I am returning the tables, as requested, and trust that I have given you the information you desire. Additional information as to any specific point will be gladly furnished if desired.

Sincerely yours,

W. W. HUSBAND,
Commissioner General.

COMMENT BY MR. BOX.

The record of the thousands of appeals to Washington from excluding decisions made by the hard-pressed port inspectors and of large and increasing percentages of admissions by overruling the port inspectors, as revealed by the commissioner general's own annual reports, shows that the doctors, port inspectors, and boards of inquiry who see and examine the diseased and defective immigrants do not agree with the Washington authorities, who see the attorneys and politicians about them.

They also show that the New York National Republican Club was right in saying that there is need of "a more efficient and rigid enforcement of the immigration law, particularly as regards the exclusion of excludable aliens," and corroborates Dr. Spencer L. Dawes, of the New York Hospital Commission and president of the Interstate Conference on Immigration, when he said "that he had seen immigrants passed as mentally and physically fit to enter the United States at the rate of eight a minute"; that "there were admitted under bond to the United States at Ellis Island 4,724 defective aliens who were excluded under the immigration law" during the last fiscal year, and that "during the same year 2,712 defective aliens were allowed to enter without bond; Ellis Island said they must not come in—they were defective. Of 12,976 other aliens found to belong to the excluded classes by medical officers at Ellis Island, 12,305 were permitted to enter by direct order from Washington; nearly 20,000, in all, of the mandatorily excluded classes were permitted to enter the United States during the year." I quote these statements of Dr. Spencer L. Dawes without personal knowledge as to the exact figures, but because he is in position to know and his statements are strongly corroborative of the facts stated by me in the foregoing remarks.

[Mr. FRENCH was granted leave to revise and extend his remarks in the Record on the pending bill.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, in common with all the Members of the House, I presume, there came to my desk about 10 days ago, in anticipation of the discussion of the bonus bill, a letter from a gentleman who purports to be the head of the Antibonus League of the United States. In that communication he imparted to me some startling information.

This startling information was to the effect that if the bonus was passed by Congress the measure of the obligation chargeable to the fourth Michigan congressional district, based on population, would be the significant sum of $10,149,000.

In view of the fact that this district is undoubtedly an average one and this burden seemed rather tremendous, relatively speaking, my mind was naturally challenged by the statement, and I thought I would undertake an analysis of the situation to see what the exact facts were, and with the further thought that these facts might be of some interest to the members of the committee, I have asked these few minutes to present to you what the facts are as I find them from a survey of the actual conditions in this district. For the fiscal year which ended in 1923, the congressional district which I represent paid into the National Treasury a total of $1,743,200, in all sorts of internal revenue, assuming that ours is an average district for the revenue district in which the congressional district is located. Segregating this $1,743,200 to personal income taxes, corporation taxes, and miscellaneous taxes, the figures run as follows: $610,125 to personal income taxes, $610,125, or practically the same amount, to corporation taxes, and $522,950 to miscellaneous taxes.

In this congressional district there are 8,135 Federal income tax returns filed according to the latest report. Taking the proportion of income tax which these personal income-tax payers return to the Government, I find that the average per return for this congressional district is $75. Please keep the $75 in mind.

The Budget this year for the United States is $3,019,000,000, and taking the figures as estimated by the Ways and Means Committee as to the annual cost of the soldiers' bonus as it is to be reported to us as being $105,000,000 per year, this would make an increase, assuming it is to be an increase, of 3½ per cent in the Budget and a corresponding increase in the amount of taxes paid in the various revenue-collection districts. Three and a half per cent of the total amount that we paid in our congressional district for the year 1923 would be $61,012 for just one year, or a total for the 20-year period of $1,220,240, instead of the alarming sum of $10,149,000.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Possibly the exponent of the Antibonus League thought you were going to raise this money by the tariff, and if you did, inasmuch as under the present system every dollar that went into the Treasury would cost your people $10, in order to raise $1,000,000 it would cost your district $10,000,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am at a loss to understand how the figures given by the gentleman could have been finally produced.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. It will take me but a moment more to complete my statement, and then I will gladly yield to my colleague.

The 3½ per cent increase on $75 would amount to $2.62 additional on each income-tax return filed. This surely would not be a heavy burden to the individual income-tax payer, in view of the reduction of 50 per cent just provided on such incomes in the revenue measure recently passed by the House.

These are as close as I can get the figures from one congressional district, and I thought possibly they would be of considerable interest to others who might have been troubled somewhat by the rather astonishing figures from the president of the Antibonus League. Let me turn the situation the other way around. If it were true that this congressional district would pay $10,149,000 as its share of the bonus, then on that basis the whole country would pay $16,915,000,000, instead of $2,119,000,000. I have brought this to your attention in order to indicate to you the length to which some gentlemen will go in order to create a wrong impression in the minds of those of us who are honestly trying to face this proposition.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was attracted by the question asked by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] as to where this money is coming from with which to pay the bonus. Evidently no one expects it to come from Mississippi, at least no one who reads and knows what the returns in the shape of taxes are which the different States make. Last year Mississippi paid into the Federal Treasury from internal revenue taxes, income taxes, and so forth, $3,000,000 out of about $3,000,000,000 that were turned in by all of the States. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] is justified in talking about what is paid in by Michigan and portions of it. Michigan paid $187,000,000 into the Treasury last year, just 50 times as much as did the State of Mississippi.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I notice the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] has been figuring considerably upon the bonus and it occurred to me that perhaps he is prepared to answer the celebrated question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] as to whether the tax will pay this bonus. That question has not been asked for a week or two.

Mr. KETCHAM. In reply to the gentleman may I say that I have been very greatly impressed by the statement which appears in the newspapers, credited to the great chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN], that it is expected that the savings which will very soon be made in vocational training and certain other features of our war welfare expenditures will care for the amount to be annually appropriated and set aside as a sinking fund to meet the maturing insurance policies. This should be comforting to all who have feared an actual increase in Federal taxes if the bonus bill passes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. In reply to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, which has brought out this bill to run over the Congress and the ex-service men, I desire to say that one reason taxes from Mississippi do not go more into the Treasury of the United States directly is because so much money goes into the pockets of the manufacturers who collect it through the tariff, and according to the gentleman's figures we are entitled to at least a full share of the adjusted compensation, because we furnished a greater proportion of soldiers for the amount of property we had to protect, and I do not believe his figures get him anywhere when it comes to comparing them, to show that this is the reason why the masses of the American people should be taxed $10 through a tariff where only $1 is poured into the Treasury.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I suppose the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] in respect to the tariff, injected into this bonus speech, comes because those States that believe in free trade believe also in free soldiers, and have not paid their soldiers in cash any bonus, and are now, therefore, dissatisfied with the insurance which the committee had reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] for his courtesy in yielding me time, and to the gentlemen of the committee for granting the privilege of extending my remarks. I have made the request for extension because of the fact that it is not possible in the time allotted me to discuss adequately the matter I have in mind.

I want to speak with reference to one feature of the pending bill which seems no longer controversial. A few years ago the mere mention of it led to agitated debate and there was much difference of opinion concerning it. The difference of opinion grew out of a lack of familiarity with the subject, but by this time its practical importance as a proper matter for legislative consideration and action has been forced upon our attention in the hard school of experience.

It is my purpose to discuss briefly the history and importance of the helium project in this country. When I first became a Member of this body in the Sixty-sixth Congress, it naturally fell upon my shoulders to seek to get an adequate appropriation for the continuance of the operation of the helium plant, because I live in the city of Fort Worth, Tex., where it is located. Owing to the fact that the three original experimental plants, at which the feasibility of the project was determined, were called argon plants, helium by its true name was as much Greek to the public as the language from which the word is derived. These experimental establishments were known as argon plants during the war in order that, for purposes of military safety and caution, the secrets of helium might not become generally known. The public were excluded from these plants and the secret experimentation was carefully guarded. Under these circumstances, when I first appeared in my efforts to get an appropriation for a helium plant, some of the Members looked at me as if they wondered whether I was talking about a patent medicine or a new breakfast food. The subject had been discussed very little in the magazines, and perhaps less in the press, and there was no general familiarity with it. During the great world conflict helium had been traveling incognito, and it was only after the cessation of war that it came to public attention undisguised.

The progress which has been made in such a brief period in the production of helium and in the ascertainment of the purposes to which helium is adapted is almost incredible. There are probably many new Members in this Congress who have not had an opportunity to hear the subject discussed, and it is this fact largely which has led me to make these remarks to-day. In the first place, therefore, let me talk about it in an elementary way, for my one desire is to try to give helpful information. In deference to myself I should state, however, that I do not claim to be a helium expert. Such education as I have received has been along the line of the arts rather than the sciences, but as a layman I have given the matter considerable study. And perhaps the observations of a layman on the subject will be more readily understood, anyway, because they will be free from technical terms intelligible only to those with some scientific training.

What is helium? It seems to be generally conceded now that helium is an element, like oxygen and hydrogen. It is a gas which is inert and which is not noxious. It is noninflammable and noncombustible. By reason of its buoyancy it has 92 per cent of the lifting power of hydrogen, which is the lightest of known gases.

How did it get its name? Why is it called helium? Back in 1868 some scientists were observing an eclipse of the sun. They found in the solar chromosphere an element unknown at that time on the earth. It made a little yellow line in the spectrum, a line somewhat akin to that made by sodium, but it was sufficiently differentiated to convince these observers that it was not sodium. It was a chemical curiosity, and such it remained for many years. There was no known counterpart in the world for this strange element of the heavens. Now, the Greek word for sun is Helios; and, in view of the fact that this mysterious gas made its first manifestation to science in the sun, it was appropriately termed helium in honor of the great orb of day. The scientists felt that, though there might be nothing new under the sun, they had certainly found something new in the sun.

Later light on the subject, scientific rather than natural, brought the revelation that this heavenly stranger had deigned to reside also on this mundane sphere, and fortunately for us the United States of America seem to furnish the principal scene of the earthly visitation. It was first discovered on the earth, it appears, in some effervescent springs abroad; then, in inconsequential measure, in the air. The chemists began a curious and diligent search for it and succeeded in separating a few cubic feet from uranium ores. Up until the time we went into the war in 1917 these few cubic feet of this chemical curiosity represented the world output of extracted helium. These had been obtained in laboratories at the prohibitive cost of from $1,500 to $2,000 per cubic foot. Helium was then but an expensive plaything for the scientists. Several years before that time Professor Cady, of the University of Kansas, had determined from experimentation in that State that it might sometimes be expected to appear in natural gas. He made this discovery in certain natural gas in Kansas, but the volume of the known supply of this particular gas at that time seemed hardly sufficient to justify any extensive operation in extraction. Besides the percentage of helium in that gas was quite low.

The results of this experimentation, however, led to a very satisfactory discovery. Just before our entrance into the World War helium was found in some gas wells which were drilled at Petrolia, Tex., about 104 miles north of the city of Fort Worth. It developed that there was approximately 1 per cent of helium in this gas, and it has been learned that that percentage affords a very profitable basis for practical operation in extraction. This is a relatively high content of helium. Just how the helium gets in the natural gas is still a matter of scientific conjecture. I have been informed that helium is one of the elements into which radium finally breaks up.

There may be some activity of radium down in the earth which accounts for the presence of helium in this natural gas. That is a matter about which I must confess that I know nothing. At any rate, it is present in some natural gases and absent from others, and the men of technical skill and training are still trying to solve the mystery.

The advantages of the use of helium in lighter-than-air craft appealed at once, of course, to the Government authorities. If a sufficient volume of it were available its service in war might be of incalculable value. That highly inflammable gas, hydrogen, had cost much in the loss of life and property. A noninflammable gas to take its place would save both, and also multiply efficiency. Naturally the Government was deeply interested in the Petrolia discovery. If helium could be had to replace hydrogen in lighter-than-air craft a great problem would be solved. The Government determined, therefore, to see if some feasible method could be found of extracting the helium from the natural gas. Fortunately, the volume of gas at Petrolia appeared to be adequate for quantity production. The one thing necessary was the separation of the helium. How could it be done?

Bear in mind that prior to 1917 the minimum cost of separating a single cubic foot of helium had been $1,500. A realization of this fact will help us to appreciate the subsequent accomplishments.

Three experimental plants were started under Government operation. As I have said, they were called argon plants. Two of them were located at Fort Worth and one at Petrolia. Two were placed at Fort Worth because of the fact that at the little town of Petrolia sufficient power and water were not available for the purpose. A different process was tried in each plant. It seemed from the experimentation that the most practical one at the time was that of the Linde Co. From the successful operation of these experimental plants the United States had 210,000 cubic feet of helium on the docks at New Orleans ready for shipment to France at the date of the signing of the armistice. That was several hundred times as much helium as had ever been extracted previously in the whole world. And what did it cost? Mirabile dictu, 40 cents a cubic foot. From $1,500 to 40 cents. Surely that was a drop that rivaled Niagara. In times of peace 40 cents would likely be prohibitive, but as an element of offense and defense in war helium seemed practically invaluable. We shall see that this cost has been reduced almost incredibly in the short time of the Government's operation since the war.

In view of the fact that reasonably cheap extraction seemed both possible and probable, the Government determined to build a permanent plant for the production of helium. That plant has been maintained at Fort Worth, Tex., since about the time of the conclusion of the war. It was constructed when war prices were prevailing and cost about $2,000,000. A pipe line was also built by the Government from Fort Worth to Petrolia, 104 miles, at a cost of more than $1,500,000. The helium-producing wells in this gas field were owned by a private company, and a contract was entered into by the Government with that company for the privilege of extracting the helium from some of the gas. The contract also contained clauses designed to conserve this helium supply in part, at least, by restricting the output of the gas to be used for commercial purposes.

As I have stated, the Linde process has been used in the operation of this production plant. It may be interesting to know, in a general way, how the helium is extracted from the gas. Through refrigeration by compression and expansion all of the constituent elements of the gas except helium are liquefied. The nitrogen, for instance, is liquefied. They create a temperature of about 300° below zero. At this low temperature all the elements except the helium become liquid. The helium is drawn off and stored in metal cylinders which hold about 190 cubic feet each under pressure. The liquefied gases are then returned to the gaseous state, put back in the mains, and used commercially. Of course, the gas is better for commercial use after the helium has been taken from it, inasmuch as helium is a nonburning element.

The helium project is supported on a 50-50 basis by the Army and Navy, one-half of the necessary appropriation being carried in the supply bill for each of these services. The operation of the plant itself is conducted by the Navy, and the output is appropriately divided. Storage facilities are available at the plant for several million cubic feet. The entire project is under the supervision of the Helium Board, composed of one member from each of the following departments: War, Navy, and Interior.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

672-7X1

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. What is the capacity of the helium field in Texas?

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman that, fortunately, they have been finding some new wells down there containing helium-bearing gas—some about Petrolia and some in other sections of the State. If you mean to inquire how much gas we have from which to extract helium, I will say that it is largely a matter of conjecture; but if properly conserved there is certainly enough for many years of operation. This inquiry leads me to say some things further which may be of interest and which, to my mind, are of great importance. This country has practically all of the known sources of supply of helium in the entire world. In its almost monopolistic possession of helium this is a favored Nation.

No other country on earth, according to the information now available, has this rare element in sufficient volume to make its continued extraction feasible either commercially or as a factor in national defense. There is a little in Canada, and some in Italy and Czechoslovakia, but it is relatively insignificant. It seems that we have been peculiarly blessed by the Almighty with this wonderful asset of offense and defense. That we are making the most of this natural and national advantage is not so certain. The annual wastage of helium in the United States is estimated at 500,000,000 cubic feet. In other words, our yearly contribution of it to thin air is almost one hundred times as much as the total of all that has ever been separated from its gaseous host and made available for practical use. The mere statement of this fact forces upon our attention the importance of its conservation. Shall we continue this lavish and prodigal waste of an element valuable both in peace and in war, and which, for practical purposes, is our exclusive possession? There is a bill now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs whose purpose is to provide for proper conservation. Practically all of the helium-bearing gas in this country is privately owned. As this gas is being used commercially without being processed the helium is being lost. Practically no geological structure containing a natural gas bearing helium to an appreciable extent has been discovered on our public lands.

This statement naturally prompts an inquiry as to where helium is found in the United States. In addition to Texas, it has been discovered in Oklahoma, Kansas, Ohio, southern Illinois, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, and New York. In other words, a strip of land beginning in north Texas and running in a northeasterly direction into New York includes the most available territory. The greater volume of it seems to be in the southern part of this area. It has been found also in a few isolated spots in the West, but the preponderance of the gas, so far as known, is located in the sections indicated.

I wish now to say a few words concerning the capacity of the plant. I have said that up to 1917 only a few cubic feet had ever been separated, but in January of this year the United States Government extracted at this plant a million cubic feet of helium. That is almost half enough to fill the Shenandoah, our large dirigible. And a very significant feature of this extraction is that the helium was obtained for 6½ cents a cubic foot. When you are thinking of progress, stop and consider that accomplishment. I attended a hearing this morning before the Committee on Patents and heard a gentleman discuss progress in an interesting and learned way. He said that the original ideas of Mr. Alexander Graham Bell's invention of the telephone, of Mr. Marconi's wireless communication, and of the Wright brothers' flying machine might have amounted to but little in a practical way but for the subsequent discoveries and developments which have facilitated their general use. The mere finding of helium in the sun, and later on the earth, might have amounted to but little in a practical way had we not by persistent experimentation subsequently demonstrated the fact that we can extract in one month 1,000,000 cubic feet of it at a reduction in cost from $1,500 a cubic foot to 6½ cents. Think of the progress that has come in this new project in the brief course of seven years. And I may say, further, that the successful testing of a new process practically assures the extraction of helium at a cost of about 3 cents a cubic foot.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Gladly.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that Professor Cady, a constituent of mine in Kansas, has made some important discoveries in connection with helium?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes. He made in Kansas the discovery of helium in natural gas, which seems to be the only practical source for getting it in sufficient volume.

Mr. LITTLE. Then my constituent had a large part in the progress that has been made?

Mr. LANHAM. He did, and I am glad to see given to him his proper meed of praise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Under the leave extended so graciously by you gentlemen, I shall extend my remarks in the Record. [Applause.]

I desire in this extension of remarks to discuss further the practical application of the discovery and extraction of helium to the pursuits of peace and war. And it is interesting to observe, in passing, that in the entire period of experimentation, operation, and development of this project we have expended only about one-fourth of the cost of a single battleship, despite the fact that much of our expenditure was made during the prevalence of war prices. Helium also has an advantage over the warship in that it is durable. That which was extracted in the experimental plants tests just as pure to-day as when it was first obtained. Let us consider briefly some of its advantages over hydrogen, which it is so rapidly supplanting in our lighter-than-air operations.

Hydrogen is limited in the period of its utility. After it has become contaminated with air, a highly explosive mixture is formed, which is worthless as an agent in aviation because of the attendant danger. Helium, on the contrary, never ceases to be an available asset. When contaminated, it may be repurified at a nominal cost and used over and over again. I understand that the necessary machinery for this operation may be transported on two flat cars. Subjected, therefore, to the critical analysis of cold calculation in dollars and cents, the inert helium is not displaced as an agent in aviation by the active hydrogen which roars and flashes its claims to consideration in explosions in dirigibles and the consequent loss of men and material. In the Roma disaster we lost more than 30 trained men. The Roma, the ZR-2, and C-2 have all gone the hydrogen route to the scrap heap. The flying of dirigibles with helium has not been attended with the loss of either ships or men. For my part—and I speak as a layman lacking in technical knowledge and skill—I doubt the wisdom of even permitting brave American boys to imperil their lives and their usefulness to the Nation by going up in balloons that are needlessly filled with hydrogen. With helium, safety is possible; safety is economical. Why not have it?

It seems to be generally agreed that if the Shenandoah had been filled with hydrogen when it broke from its mooring mast the men and the ship would have perished in an awful catastrophe.

Hydrogen evinces a fiery and explosive disposition. I am told that one who is smoking is not permitted to approach nearer than 100 yards to a hydrogen-filled dirigible. About one that is inflated with helium one may smoke with impunity. Helium is passive, well behaved, and manifests no tendency at all to break up the party. It approximates much more nearly than hydrogen the scriptural definition of charity—it "vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, does not behave itself unseemly, is not easily provoked." Its use naturally relieves the tension of the crew. It is an old saying that "it is better to be safe than sorry." Perhaps we have not learned that lesson absolutely in our lighter-than-air flying, but we have certainly advanced beyond the primer stage. It is very much easier to sell the helium idea now that hydrogen has hurled so many trained men into eternity and so many dirigibles into the discard of the junk pile. Safety in aerial sailing makes for a clear head and a stout heart. It stimulates concentration upon the purpose in mind.

The experts tell us that the leakage of helium through fabrics is only about 10 per cent of that of hydrogen. And, besides, the invulnerability of helium-filled airships to gunfire, to the once troublesome incendiary bullet, is a distinct point in favor of the use of this new element. It goes Achilles one better. Also, the greater possibilities in mechanical construction of helium-filled ships afford the opportunity for a direct drive and the consequent enhancement of speed and effectiveness. Hearings before committees have brought out the fact that both the Army and Navy Air Services contemplate the use of large, rigid dirigibles for transporting troops and naval personnel, and also mother ships for airplanes and their equipment that will be serviceable from coast to coast and far out from our continental shores. In fact, the cruising radius of airships is a vital point in their importance. They can remain in the air for long periods of time and cover great distances, and thus they become the most logical craft for search and reconnaissance scouting. Their ability to hover seems to be surpassed only by that of the national debt, and their consequent availability in bombing operations is apparent.

We are being taught constantly in the school of experience that the achievements of the past are but an earnest of the things which the future holds in store. This is no time for a near-sighted policy. We need eyes that in the scope of their vision will rival the strides of the old, fabulous 7-league boots. I hope that we may have no necessity for further wars. Fortunately, the uses of helium are adapted also to times of peace. A large commercial company is now contemplating the establishment of transportation routes with helium-filled dirigibles. An agent has testified before a committee of this House concerning this matter, and he has stated that the trip from New York to Chicago could be made easily and safely in one night. But if war should come, it seems that rigid airships filled with helium are destined to become one of the most important factors in national defense and offense, both by land and sea. Just a little flight of the imagination will picture the possible flights of these mighty leviathans of the air. Colonel Lucas, the English officer who made the trans-Atlantic trips in the R-34, has given, according to my information, some most interesting statements concerning the possibilities of helium-filled dirigibles in times of war. We are told that Germany was even preparing to bomb New York from a hydrogen-filled dirigible. No other nation possesses helium, and for the purposes of peace and war our aerial future should be made correspondingly secure.

The first real flight with helium in the history of the world was made on Monday, December 5, 1921, by the Navy blimp C-7. The weather conditions were quite unfavorable, but the attempt was entirely successful. In a snowstorm this small dirigible, inflated with about 190,000 cubic feet of helium, journeyed from Norfolk to Washington and then returned, after circling the Capital City. There had been two brief preliminary test flights at Hampton Roads. It was my pleasure to witness a part of this flight and also to speak concerning it in the House on the day of its occurrence. That initial trip demonstrated the superiority of helium over hydrogen in other respects than its safety. It was found that the use of helium facilitated the operation of a dirigible in many important ways.

Since that time the use of helium has been greatly extended in lighter-than-air flying, both in the Army and Navy branches of the service. I had the privilege the latter part of November of taking an hour's ride over Fort Worth in the Army dirigible TC-3. It was the first time I was ever physically up in the air. The use of helium made the jaunt an entirely safe one and I enjoyed the experience thoroughly. We sailed over the helium plant and thus for the first time brought into proximity the respective agencies of cause and effect in this wonderful project. In exemplification of the possibilities of such flight the engines were stopped temporarily and we hovered in mid-air. One of the crew left the car and went upon the engine platform to demonstrate the ease with which necessary adjustments and repairs could be made in flight. And this was all happening in less than seven years from the time when helium was an exorbitantly expensive chemical curiosity.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts has given on the floor of the House a most interesting talk on the proposed polar explorations of the Shenandoah. In the light of past performance and present accomplishment, who can say with authority that the achievement is impossible? The dreams of yesterday are the realities of to-day. Of course, I have no personal familiarity with Arctic conditions. Certainly there are some circumstances which augur well. The continuous daylight would prevent the varying expansion and contraction of the gas, which occur in this country with the frequent successive periods of day and night. Under conditions otherwise normal, this fact would facilitate the flight. The distance from Nome to Spitzbergen directly over the pole is but little more than half the cruising radius of the Shenandoah. The trip could likely be made in about four days. We have been advised that the purpose of this proposed journey is not the rediscovery of the pole, but rather the exploration of a great area of unknown territory. One thing is certain. This is the only country under the sun which is able to use in such an effort that wonderful element discovered in the sun which renders a dirigible entirely safe from destruction by explosion. Whether it may be done will likely be a fact of history before the lapse of another seven years.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I trust my colleagues will pardon me for speaking out of order, but a matter has been called to my attention that is so shocking to my sense of patriotism and does such violence to the tenets of public decency that I feel it should be brought to the attention of the Congress and the whole country. I have just received from a patriotic constituent, Dr. H. E. Christenbery, of Knoxville, Tenn., a clipping from a recent issue of the Knoxville Journal and Tribune which calls attention to a very sad situation, which, in my opinion, challenges the earnest and patriotic attention and the immediate action of the Congress. The newspaper clipping, bearing a Washington date line, recites the following:

[From the Journal and Tribune, Knoxville, Tenn., Wednesday, March 12.]

NO MONEY TO DISTRIBUTE THEM, UNITED STATES MAY DUMP CAPTURED TROPHIES INTO OCEAN.

(By John T. Lewing, Jr., Central Press correspondent.)

WASHINGTON.—When the late war ended the Government decided that the American people would want souvenirs of the conflict in the form of captured German guns and equipment, and it arranged the shipment of a huge quantity of the materials to this country. Guns were to be given to cities. Complete collections of German helmets, guns, sabers, etc., were to be given to museums and schools.

But this plan has never been carried out. The shipload of stuff is in the Government arsenal at Fort Newark, N. J., rusting and rotting. It may be dumped into the ocean shortly.

No money has been appropriated by Congress for the purpose of distributing the materials. A bill has been pending many months. Sponsors of the bill say it isn't likely to be passed, because Congressmen frown on the idea of spending money for such a purpose now.

Several private firms are reported to be willing to buy the smaller trophies, of which there are thousands, for sale to persons desirous of obtaining souvenirs; but the idea of commercializing the mementoes is frowned on, too.

While this story was doubtless written in good faith and was based upon the reasonable apprehensions of the Washington correspondent, to me the whole proposition is preposterous and utterly inconceivable. Is it possible that we have lost all sense of gratitude and national pride? After spending from twenty-five to fifty billion dollars in the prosecution of the war, in the name of common justice can we not spend a few paltry thousands to commemorate and perpetuate the brilliant deeds of heroism performed by our brave boys in carrying Old Glory to victory on the Marne, at St. Mihiel, in the bloody Argonne, and elsewhere? Of course we can; and the act will be unanimously approved and universally applauded from Maine to California.

Besides, gentlemen of the House, the distribution of these trophies will entail no expense on the Government, should the Government be willing to put itself in a niggardly light, because the States, counties, municipalities, and civic organizations, as the case may be, will be only too glad to bear the expense incident to their transportation and installation.

Out of a spirit of loyalty, Doctor Christenbery resents the proposed or supposed attitude of our Government as described in the clipping which I have just read to you; and this position of his, in my opinion, is shared by every patriotic American citizen.

At the conclusion of the war it was generally understood that these German cannon and other trophies captured by our brave soldier boys would be distributed throughout the country; and, acting upon that impression, practically every Member introduced a number of bills providing for an allotment of these relics of the war to his particular district. The proposition appealed to me as it did to the membership of the House generally as a thoroughly meritorious and praiseworthy action. To exhibit the trophies of the war at public places throughout the Nation would not only be a proper acknowledgment and recognition of the signal prowess exhibited by our intrepid soldiery but it would be a patriotic inspiration to the people who would behold them and contemplate their significance.

In my judgment, it would be a downright shame, a dastardly crime, a gross insult to our soldiers, both living and dead—yea, it would be practical perfidy itself to destroy these testimonials of the unparalleled valor of our service men as is suggested in this newspaper article, and in the name of our gallant soldiers, both living and dead, and in the name of every patriotic American citizen, I desire to register my solemn protest against this unholy program, and insist that provisions be immediately made for the preservation of these war trophies and their suitable distribution throughout the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us what the Committee on Military Affairs is going to do about this? They have had the subject before them for several years, and meanwhile, I understand, the trophies are rotting.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. According to this story they will be cast into the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has the gentleman taken this matter up with the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I have not, but I hope to do so. I think it is a meritorious measure.

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the gentleman that it has been reported out of committee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, now that Secretary Denby has reached home and has been received with a brass band and various other demonstrations of approval, it becomes us to inquire what else is to be done with reference to distinguished executives who cooperated and collaborated with Mr. Denby in what has been pronounced such a violent misappropriation of the assets of the Navy and of the United States.

Secretary Denby is not shown to have done anything except to have made a mistake of judgment. He is not shown to have had any interest tied to him that might have influenced his judgment. He is not even supposed to have been the recipient of any loan or to have had any connection whatever with the oil people. And yet he has been rejected under such circumstances that his fellow citizens met him with a brass band when he got home.

All the time we find the Assistant Secretary, who was collaborating very actively in the whole business, left as the guiding star to the new Secretary who is to come from the Pacific coast in a day or two. I want to direct attention to the fact that if Mr. Denby ought to have gotten out, Mr. Roosevelt ought to get out, too.

Why do I say so? We have had numerous attorneys who were suggested to conduct certain litigation rejected, and promptly rejected, because it was shown that at some time or another they had been retained by, or had been connected with, some of these oil companies. We have one now held in suspense where the committee of the Senate refuses to recommend him because he is connected with a bank that is known as a Standard Oil bank; they refuse to confirm him because, forsooth, having represented one of the Standard Oil banks he is not in a position to represent the Federal Government in bringing suits against an oil company which is said to be robbing the Government.

Let us look into it and apply that to an official of the Navy Department to-day. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy was a director of the Sinclair Oil Co. up to the time he entered the war. He was a stockholder in it. When he returned from the war he did not go back with them, but, according to the testimony produced before the committee, he became an employee of Montgomery & Co., the bankers of the Sinclair Oil Co., having in his particular charge the business conducted by the bank with the Sinclair Oil Co.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the Assistant Secretary of the Navy perpetrated any other crime than this?

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will be patient, I will not charge the Assistant Secretary of the Navy with any crime, and I do not intend to; but I want to call attention to the fact that he is in an equivocal position, if these different attorneys were in such a position that they could not properly represent the Government.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did I understand the gentleman also—

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not yield any further now. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy, when he returned, as I say, took up his duties with Montgomery & Co., according to the testimony of his brother, Mr. Archie Roosevelt. According to his own testimony, his wife became the owner of 1,000 shares of the Sinclair Oil Co., and retained them until 1922, after the leases that are complained of had all been executed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. On what authority does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. STEVENSON. I get it from the statement of Mr. Roosevelt himself in his testimony before the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to hear the gentleman make that statement and prove it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I will refer you to the testimony that he gave himself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me get the gentleman correctly. Does the gentleman state that Mrs. Roosevelt owned that stock at the time the leases were made?

Mr. STEVENSON. I said that Mr. Roosevelt in his own testimony, which I can read to you, said that they owned it and sold it in 1922, and that then—

Mr. LONGWORTH. No, no. The gentleman made this positive statement: The gentleman said that Mrs. Roosevelt owned that stock at the time the leases were made, and I submit that the gentleman—

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not care what the gentleman submits.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That the gentleman has made a false statement, and let the gentleman prove his statement.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman will not maintain that outside of this House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let the gentleman prove his statement.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Why does not the gentleman read the testimony?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will read it at the right time.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not yielded.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is no use of getting "het up" about this thing. [Applause.] I will call the gentleman's attention to what Mr. Roosevelt said in one minute:

Senator WALSH. And your stock was sold some time during 1917 or 1918?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. My stock was sold, I should say, in the winter of 1918.

Senator WALSH. And then your wife became a stockholder in 1920?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. In 1920, and sold that stock in 1921, I think. I can tell you approximately. It was, I think, in 1922; sold it in 1922.

Senator WALSH. Are there any other members of your family interested in the Sinclair Co.?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. My brother is an employee of the Sinclair Co.

Senator WALSH. Does he hold any official position there?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. Yes; he is an employee. I do not know whether you would call it an official position. I will ask Mr. Sinclair, however.

And so on.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. "And so on" is pretty vague.

Mr. STEVENSON. I can read you what he says additionally.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has made the positive statement that Mrs. Roosevelt owned this stock at the time these leases were made. Does the gentleman repeat that statement?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not say that he has said so, but I say—

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the gentleman said it himself?

Mr. STEVENSON. I say she owned this stock, according to his statement, in 1922, and the order which he procured the President to sign was on the 31st day of May, 1921, when she owned it, and this was the basis of the whole transaction. The contract was made on the 7th of April, 1922, and it is up to him to show whether she sold before or after the 7th of April.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has made the positive statement that Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt owned this stock at the time the leases were made. Is the gentleman prepared to prove that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I have stated what the proof is, and if the gentleman now says she did not own it on the 7th of April, 1922, I shall not be prepared to controvert it, but she did own it when the negotiations were going on and when the order of the President transferring this was signed, for the very purpose of consummating the act, in 1921, according to their own statement; they can not get away from it and say there could have been no such transaction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am prepared to make a statement, and if the gentleman cares to deny it, let him do so.

Mr. STEVENSON. Just wait a minute; this is in my time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman makes a statement which I know is not true, I will deny it and I do not hesitate to say so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.
Mr. LONGWORTH. I am prepared to make the positive statement that Mrs. Roosevelt did not own a share of stock at the time these leases were made.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman make a statement as to what time in 1922 she parted with it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will make a statement to the effect that she was not in possession of any of this stock within three months before the leases were made.

Mr. STEVENSON. After or before?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the leases were made.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then the gentleman is prepared to admit that she owned it when the original order was procured by Mr. Roosevelt to be signed by the President, is he not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That proposition is negated by what I have stated.

Mr. STEVENSON. No; it was stated positively she owned it in 1922.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, the gentleman stated his own inference from the testimony.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman stated his own inference from the testimony, which Mr. Roosevelt could have made positive, but he did not do that. Mr. Roosevelt knew what they were driving at. If he had sold that stock before the leases were made, why did he not say so then? If he had so stated, I would not have disputed it. If he sold it in 1922, if you run back for three months from April, then it must have been sold the 7th of January. We had hardly gotten into the year 1922 then.

Now, I am not going to have any further controversy about that. That is settled. It is settled that Mr. Roosevelt, through his wife, had an interest in the oil company when the negotiations began and when they were running and when he himself carried the order to the President, May 31, 1921, and had the order signed and brought it back to the Navy Department.

Mr. FRENCH. Would the gentleman yield just a moment, and if necessary, I will yield him whatever time I may consume?

Mr. STEVENSON. All right, sir.

Mr. FRENCH. It should modify the situation to have it understood that Colonel Roosevelt was one of the officers in the Navy Department who was not in accord with this leasing and building program. The Navy Department was not harmonious on that question—neither the administrative officers who were civilians nor the regular officers of the Navy. It happens that in this great administrative matter Colonel Roosevelt was opposed to the leasing and storage construction program.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; well, we will see about that. At page 420 of the record:

Senator WALSH. Please let me know whether you approved or disapproved of the policy of making expenditures of between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000 for these tanks by private contract and without competitive bidding.

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. I approved the general policy of endeavoring to arrange the situation so that the oil, which was evidently intended by Congress to constitute the naval reserves, should be kept as a naval reserve in the only way possible, which was that.

What was that but approval, and he said it several times. He was pinned down on that several times, as I will show the gentleman, when he said, "I approved the general policy which was adopted." See also page 1300, where he reiterates it.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman must remember that the policy of conserving oil for the Navy is one thing and the policy of what arrangements should be made for building storage and all that sort of thing is a different thing. That could have been worked out through calling upon the Congress, or it could have been worked out without having these leasing companies build the storage reservoirs. There are various ways, either one of which might have been adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is the gentleman going to yield me time for the time he is taking now?

Mr. FRENCH. I shall be glad to. Undoubtedly Colonel Roosevelt believed in the general program that we probably, as a Congress, all approve, of conserving oil for the Navy.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman will find—and I will put it in my remarks—that Mr. Roosevelt not only approved it at this point but he approved it at two or three different times when pinned down and said, "I approved of this general policy." Page 1300.

That is the proposition which comes before the new administration of the Navy Department.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. STEVENSON. All right.

Mr. FRENCH. Did not Secretary Daniels approve of saving the oil?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; Secretary Daniels approved of saving the oil, but he did not approve of leasing it out and taking a large part of it for the purpose of constructing tanks.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not yield any further. We will get through with one thing at a time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield if I yield him time for the time I consume, and that is what I propose to do?

Mr. STEVENSON. All right.

Mr. FRENCH. Does not the gentleman know that under Secretary Daniel's administration there was that actual thing done—the leasing of the right to procure oil in order to conserve its value to the Navy or to the Treasury?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir. But those were protective wells. Mr. Daniel's position is fully stated in the Record of February 10, 1920, page 2700.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there so that I may ask the gentleman from Idaho a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I judge from the remarks of the gentleman from Idaho that the gentleman favors this naval policy.

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, no; the gentleman has no right to make any such deduction from my remarks.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman was citing with approval the fact that Secretary Daniels had leased some wells, and I supposed he was using that as a basis for supporting his own belief that that was a proper thing to do.

Mr. FRENCH. I have no hesitation in asserting that it was the right of any Secretary of the Navy, whether Secretary Daniels or his successor, to carry out vigilantly a policy of endeavoring to save the Navy oil for the Navy, to save it for the country, and unless something had been done to protect the Government's interests the oil would have been pumped out by the Standard Oil Co. and other subsidiary companies through wells upon lands adjacent to the oil reserves. The question of method of carrying forward such a program is an entirely different proposition, and if the gentleman will consult the hearings held two months ago, and held some time before the statement was made by Secretary Fall touching his entire relationship to the matter, the gentleman will find that I specifically disapproved of the policy that was followed, and that continues to be my own attitude.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to have any more interpolations about this before I get through.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, may I yield the gentleman as much time as the gentleman thinks I ought to yield for the time I have consumed?

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman ought to give me at least five minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Ten minutes, they say, and I suspect that is right. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair understand about the matter of time. Does the gentleman yield 5 minutes or 10 minutes?

Mr. FRENCH. Whatever time we have consumed I wish to yield the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no need for anybody to get too warm about this matter. It is all in the record. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] said a moment ago that I did not read on, and so forth. Well, I will read on and just give all that is there at that place:

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. I will ask Mr. Sinclair, however.

Mr. SINCLAIR. He is a vice president of one of the subsidiary companies.

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. Vice president of one of the subsidiary companies.

Senator WALSH. Is he a director in any company?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. Again I will have to ask Mr. Sinclair.

Mr. SINCLAIR. He is not a director in the original company; he is in the subsidiary company.

Senator WALSH. Do you know how long he has sustained these relations to the Sinclair Co.?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. Yes; since the spring of 1919.

Now, we will see where Mr. Archie Roosevelt came in on this proposition. He says:

Senator DILL. Mr. Roosevelt, you may have stated, but I did not get it clearly, as to just how you came to go into the employ of Sinclair Co.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. You can help me on this, Mr. Stanford. I think Montgomery & Co. were bankers for the Sinclair Co., weren't they, at one time?

Mr. STANFORD. I think so.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. And my brother was with Montgomery & Co., and had represented Montgomery & Co. with the Sinclair Co. This is a long time ago, and I don't know about it as well as, perhaps, you would. And he said to me—

The CHAIRMAN. Who said to you?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. My brother, Ted. He said, "There is a chap I know in New York, and he might give you a job." He said, "I served on his board of directors. And he might give you a job." And that was how it came about.

Senator DILL. Well, did your brother go to Montgomery & Co. in your interests?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. To Montgomery? Oh, no. He was with them.

Senator DILL. He was with Montgomery & Co.?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes.

Senator DILL. And did your brother go to the Sinclair Co. for you?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Oh, yes; he helped me there.

Senator DILL. He helped you get it?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. He helped me get the job; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions? If not, we will excuse Mr. Roosevelt.

So Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, the present Assistant Secretary and Acting Secretary of the Navy, being with the bankers of Sinclair & Co. goes and gets the job for Archie, his brother, with Sinclair & Co. What compensation did he get and when did he quit? Mr. Theodore Roosevelt said two or three days ago that Mr. Archie Roosevelt got $10,000 a year to start with, which was subsequently increased to $15,000 a year.

That is twice the salary of a Congressman. If you read the testimony of the gentleman—and I never saw Mr. Archie Roosevelt—I think you will conclude with me that it was a remarkable salary to be paid to a man of the capacity which he showed in the testimony. I do not know him and I never saw him, but I know from reading his testimony that he did not show sufficient capacity to do much more with that crowd than to turn a grindstone or grease a gimlet. That is about the way it impressed me, and yet he was being paid $15,000 a year, and was so paid until this investigation got too hot, when he jumped overboard. Then, gentlemen, talk about there being no interest up there.

There was a picture the other day of Daugherty standing on the burning deck, with the oil fumes all flowing up around him. It was called "The boy stood on the burning deck." That reminded me of the scene when they found that Ned McLean admitted practically that he had been lying, and Senator CARAWAY made a speech which scared Archie so much that he hallooed for Teddy. Senator CARAWAY certainly got a feather in his cap, because he scared a Roosevelt.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I can not yield just now.

Mr. LITTLE. I just wanted to know why the gentleman said "practically"; that is all.

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, I shall not qualify it; I shall say that he admitted that he lied, but he had not admitted it at that time. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy rushed over to New York and they listened in on a telephone conversation with another fellow, and then came back here and jumped overboard. Fifteen thousand dollars a year was good enough until it began to burn. It impressed me so much that I wrote a little parody on that well-known poem. It seems that doing such a thing has become fashionable these days, although mine was completed some weeks before Senator HEFLIN and Senator LODGE began it. It is as follows:

ARCHIE AND THEODORE OR THE BOY JUMPED OFF THE BURNING DECK.

Archie stood on the oily deck

Whence Theodore had sped;

He proudly drew his weekly check—

It was his daily bread.

But soon the deck became quite warm—

The boss to Europe fled—

Feeling a sense of keen alarm,

He called for Brother Ted.

With life preserver in his arms,

Abandoning his bread,

He made a flying leap from harm,

But landed on his head.

That is what happened to Archie. I leave it to this House whether or not the fact of the ownership of the stock while negotiations were going on, and that under the influence of the Assistant Secretary, this boy was being carried on the pay roll at $15,000 a year, does not call for a change over yonder?

There are one or two other things that I want to talk about. The gentleman talks about Mr. Daniels advocating this, that, and the other. Mr. Daniels is not Secretary of the Navy at the present time, and if he had been you would not have anything like this going on. Doheny and all of his crowd admit that they could not break in with a crowbar when he was there, and they denounced him for it. What was done? They went to work in defiance of the right of Congress to appropriate the money and the assets of the United States and made the contractors spend $20,000,000 in building oil terminals at Pearl Harbor and other places and paid for it out of the oil that belonged to the Government, taking the assets and making contracts and building establishments without any right from Congress or anything else, but it was all approved by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, because he said so in his testimony which I just read to you and in many other places.

We are going to have a new Secretary of the Navy from the Pacific coast. They are exceedingly interested in building a naval base at Alameda, Calif. If he conceives that he has the same power that this other Secretary and Assistant Secretary conceived they had, what is to hinder him from alienating every gallon of oil in the naval reserves and building up a great naval base there without the consent of Congress or anybody else? One is as bad as the other, and one is not any better than the other, and you can not distinguish between them. I say for that reason the Assistant Secretary of the Navy is now in a position where he ought to get out. Not only that, but you had the testimony a day or two ago of the marines being used and sent out there to throw off those people who were contesting with Mr. Sinclair the right to that property. Some say that that was Government property. Oh, no; it had been transferred to Sinclair, and the question was between him and the "squatters," as they were called. It was a question between two claimants to land, and we find the Navy Department, under the express order of this Assistant Secretary of the Navy, taking that great historic organization, the marines, and sending them out there instead of letting those people try their rights at law. We find him bringing all the power of the military force of the United States to bear in behalf of Sinclair and his crowd, to whom they had granted these leases, and on whose behalf they had no right to use the military arm of the United States Government.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Assuming the fact, which the gentleman will probably deny, that this lease was a legally made lease, would it not be the duty of the Government to put the lessee in peaceable possession of the leased property?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Government would have properly remanded him to the United States court, and when the United States court had determined his right, then the marshal and his force and all of the military forces of the Government would be behind the decree; but that is what they did not do. They did not propose to submit the matter to a court. They said: "We have taken up Sinclair and we are going to see him through with the military arm of this Government, and we are not going to give anybody else a chance," and it became a military strong-arm ejection that went on out there, probably all of them squatters, but they had their rights as American citizens.

I made the statement when I started out that the wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy owned stock when this contract or lease was made. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] challenged it. I have read to you the evidence. If that is not true, it is merely a wrong inference from the evidence. I do not intend to misrepresent those people, and the gentleman from Ohio knows that I do not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I admit that. I think the gentleman made an erroneous statement, made it without authority.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Was that made clear in the evidence?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; the Assistant Secretary had the opportunity to make that clear, and that was what they were driving at, and he failed to do it, and I had a right to infer that. Had he stated that the stock was sold in February, 1922, as he had the opportunity to do, no question would have been made of it by me.

But, gentlemen, do not forget this is a matter of 12 months' transactions. Gentlemen, do not forget that the foundation stone of this was the order of President Harding which Mr.

Roosevelt himself carried to the President on the 31st day of May, 1921, and secured him to sign. At that time the stock was owned by Roosevelt's wife, according to his own testimony, and continued up until some time in 1922, and this contract was signed April 7, 1922, and therefore assuming that while the gentleman—I am not charging the gentleman has done anything wrong, but assuming after all these other men referred to are disqualified by being lawyers, because they accepted pay from an oil company—the gentleman who occupies the position of Assistant Secretary of the Navy is disqualified from sitting in that position after the circumstances which I have detailed when his personal interests in the Sinclair Co. were in such shape as I have detailed, and I think he can very properly follow the lead of Archie and jump overboard, and I believe he will.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been a matter of some considerable satisfaction to most of the Members of the House that the House of Representatives has not indulged in as plain unwarranted gossip and vicious scandalization without warrant as some other branch of our Government has been indulging in. What was the object of the speech just made? It could have but one object, and that was for the Saturday night and Sunday morning papers to carry to the country the statement that Theodore Roosevelt was interested in Sinclair oil, and that while it was admitted it was in the name of his wife, by reason of the leases made he has profited, and for that reason he should get out of the office of a Cabinet officer. The excuse offered by the learned gentleman, who always displays some partisanship in making a speech on this floor, is that a plain denial of that statement of his was not contained in any hearing. Now, let us stop and be moderate. Is it possible in this great country of ours the right way to do is to charge some one with being a criminal unless he has some legal proof of his innocence? Think how unfortunate it would have been for a great and honored family of this country if they had no one on the floor to speak for them and deny that contemptible insinuation and assertion. [Applause.] I suppose the thing that prompted the charging of it was the fact that men intimately connected with the family are prominent on our side of the House. Thank God for the support to that honored family that the country may know the base falseness of the accusation at the same time it is issued. Mrs. Roosevelt had stock in the Sinclair company and Mrs. Roosevelt sold it three months before the lease. Could a person say that she sold it at a profit by reason of her husband having to O. K. a lease that might make the stock more valuable? Mr. LONGWORTH is here, and I want to ask him, Do you know whether Mrs. Roosevelt sold her stock at a profit or at a loss?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, of course I have nothing whatever to do with the business connections of any of the members of my family except myself. However, I do know this: Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt has her own property entirely independent of control by her husband, and I do know this, she sold whatever she may have owned of the Sinclair oil stock at a substantial loss at least three months before any of these naval leases were made.

Mr. TINCHER. I assume that no one will deny the truth of that statement. But how nice it would have been for the scandal mongers if the morning papers had carried the statements here presented and should have insinuated that while Theodore Roosevelt was in the Cabinet position he enriched his wife by making an oil lease. Shame on that kind of statesmanship! I believe in an honest House, where it reaches honest conclusions with some reason and common sense. I do not believe you will gain anything as a party by stooping down and trying to attack a man like Theodore Roosevelt in such an underhand, contemptible manner, and without any excuse for it whatever.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. Does not the gentleman from Kansas also think it would have been ordinarily decent to have given the new Secretary of the Navy a chance to start in on his duties before attacking and criticizing him? I want to say the new Secretary of the Navy is as clean and fine a type of American citizen as you will find anywhere in the United States, and I know it. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. I believe it, and I will say this, that the time has come in this country when I do not believe men will bear the reputation of being clean, fair, and honest statesmen who are willing to stoop to scandal of this character or kind.

We are getting rid of some of the grafters; we are prosecuting some of the criminals, more than you ever did; and I do not believe you raise yourself in the estimation of the people of this country by such dastardly, cowardly attacks on the good name of men and women on this floor without any warrant whatever for them, except you could not find out where they denied it in some hearings you read. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman from Texas wants to speak on this subject?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes. That was the understanding. That is the only one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, a great many Members on this floor, especially my good friends on the Republican side, sometimes good-naturedly tell me that I am a partisan. That charge is true. If I did not believe in my party and its principles I should leave its ranks. I am a partisan, but I have not permitted my partisanship heretofore to cause me to say anything on this floor about any of the transactions that have attracted so much attention in the public press with reference to Teapot Dome and Secretary Fall and Attorney General Daugherty. I shall just take this occasion to make a few observations with reference to the conduct of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] a little while ago in rising in his seat and so bitterly attacking the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] for standing up in the House and quoting from the printed hearings, the sworn testimony of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Colonel Roosevelt. Now, if a noise were wisdom, and heat were courage, the gentleman from Kansas would probably occupy the leadership that is now occupied by the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause.]

But such, happily, is not the case in this instance. I want to say a word to gentlemen on the other side, and especially to the gentleman from Kansas, because he is quite a debater. He is quite a partisan on this floor. I admire a man who is willing to stand up and fight, but I admire still more a fighter who, when the battle goes against him, is willing to take the gaff once in a while.

I remember when the gentleman from Kansas made his advent here on the floor of this House, fresh from the wild plains of Kansas, bellowing like a roaring bull about the way the war had been conducted under a Democratic administration. I heard him and other Republicans pouring out here on this floor volleys of denunciation of the waste, the criminal extravagance, the corruption, and the graft that filled the War and Navy Departments under the Democrats. And yet, with all of your investigations and all of your smelling committees, with all of the machinery that the Republican Party could set in motion immediately after it came into power in this House in 1919, never was there uncovered in all the vast transactions of the war a single transaction that was corrupt. They never uncovered one transaction that imputed dishonor or disloyalty to a single responsible Government official under the Democracy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In a moment. They did uncover one official of the Government, and they indicted him, and that happened to be an Assistant Secretary of War, a Republican, from Cleveland, Benedict Crowell by name, whose indictment was dismissed by the court a few days ago because the Attorney General and his assistant could not write an indictment that the court would hold to be sufficient to charge a crime.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Kansas suggested a few moments ago that the Republicans had prosecuted more criminals than the Democrats did. That was necessary, because more criminals had developed under the Republicans than got in under our administration. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Now, I have not charged or attacked anybody in all this controversy. But as I have said, I like to see a fighter. Let me say to the gentleman from Kansas, your party, after making all kinds of investigations and raising such a bull-balloo about the Democratic administration, when it comes to your time to be investigated, when it comes to throwing the light on your secret transactions, when committees of investigation find some tracks leading up to your door, when they find these tracks leading up almost to the White House itself, if the gentleman from Kansas is a real fighter, if he is game, if he is not a quitter, he will stand up and take his medicine and not whine and cry like a whipped baby. [Applause.]

Now, what about the Assistant Secretary of the Navy? Since this question has been raised I want to make some observations about that. I honor the name of Roosevelt. The first time I saw Colonel Roosevelt, sr., was in San Antonio, Tex., when he was recruiting his Rough Riders. I saw him hooted and spurred, out in the camp, organizing the regiment that made him famous. As a schoolboy, I tried to enlist in his regiment, and I met and talked with him, and I was inspired by the splendid qualities of that great man.

But the name Roosevelt did not make him what he was. It was the great qualities of heart and mind and the great qualities of courage that made him, and not the name Roosevelt. There is no magic in a name. I grieve for his son. It grieves me and it makes my heart sad that the same son that bears his name and, as I understand it, entertains the same ambition that he entertained did not, when he was confronted by this situation in the Navy Department, exhibit the heart and the courage of a real Roosevelt and say to Sinclair and Fall and Doheny and the rest of them, "I will have nothing to do with those transactions. You shall not steal the Navy's oil. We are going to keep it for the Navy; and if this is your game, rather than be Assistant Secretary of the Navy I will resign," as he advised his brother Archie to resign, "and go out into private life."

My God, gentlemen, I derive no satisfaction from the fact that these things, these corrupt and scandalous things, have occurred. Since they occurred I am of course glad they have been uncovered. But I derive no satisfaction, because I happen to be a Democrat, from the fact that there have been revealed these corrupt chapters in the administration of the public affairs of my country. Would that they had never occurred, because I know that the harm that will be done out yonder among the people, the harm that will be done in the destruction among the people of confidence in the Government, will be more harmful to the country at large than could be counteracted by any partisan advantage that my party or I will derive from them. I am for my country first and my party afterwards.

When I contemplate that my party went through a great war with marvelous opportunities for fraud and for graft and emerged free from the taint of corruption in high places, I do derive some little satisfaction out of the fact that while I regret these things, Teapot Dome and the naval oil-lease scandals, and the Department of Justice scandal, have occurred, and while I regret that this dish of corruption shall be held up to the nostrils of the people of the country—I derive some satisfaction from the fact that when they invaded the chambers where the dark doings of conspirators and criminals were taking place, when they bared the secret schemes and corrupt bargains that were hatched there, no responsible figure in the party to which I belong was either found there or was revealed as being guilty of corrupt conduct in office or of treachery to a public trust. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH, Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I personally am somewhat tired of the "everybody knows" type of evidence to which we have been treated and to which the country has been treated for a good many weeks in connection with Teapot Dome and other matters. I should like, if it were possible, to deal with information and to deal with facts rather than to deal with hearsay in the second, third, and even fourth degree. My purpose in asking for this time this afternoon is to depart from the usual practice on this general topic. I propose to give the House some information on the subject which has been brought into this debate by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield in order that I may make one slight correction?

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. My friend from California, I infer, believes I criticized the new Secretary of the Navy. I think you will find in my remarks nothing critical of him but a plea that he should have a clean slate.

Another statement which I want to correct is an inferential statement which the gentleman has just made that I have been stating that "they say" and "everybody knows." I did not quote a statement from that record except from Theodore Roosevelt and Archie Roosevelt—not a single one.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Most of the gentleman's speech, which I heard, was based on inference rather than on sworn testimony.

Here are the facts, as I understand them, concerning Theodore Roosevelt's connection with this Teapot Dome matter. I assert them on my own responsibility. So far as I know they have not been set forth in consecutive form before this moment.

Col. Theodore Roosevelt's connection with the oil leases was, briefly, as follows: Shortly after President Harding's induction into office Secretary Denby sent him, Roosevelt, a copy of a proposed Executive order transferring the naval oil reserves to the Department of the Interior without recourse. At the same time a copy was sent to the Bureau of Engineering. After getting his copy of the order Colonel Roosevelt asked Admiral Griffin, who was then chief of that bureau, and who had naval oil matters under his particular care, to talk it over with him. Colonel Roosevelt knew very little of the matter, for it was exceedingly intricate and complex, and he had recently taken office. Admiral Griffin felt very strongly that this transfer to the Interior Department would be a mistake. After thinking the matter over Colonel Roosevelt decided he was probably right. His grounds for coming to that conclusion were that the Interior Department has as its general mission the development of the resources of the United States, whereas the oil lands belonging to the Navy should not be developed except in a case of real necessity; and that, therefore, there would be a conflict of ideas and policies between the two departments. Colonel Roosevelt went to Secretary Denby and urged that the lands be not transferred to the Interior Department. Secretary Denby informed Colonel Roosevelt that his protest was made too late, because the transfer had already been agreed to by the President, Secretary Fall, and Secretary Denby. After this Colonel Roosevelt went back and discussed the entire situation with Admiral Griffin and certain other officers. It occurred to Colonel Roosevelt that if he could get an amendment to the original order for transfer, making it necessary for the Interior Department to gain the consent of the Navy Department before any leasing or drilling was undertaken, the Navy could guard the oil lands against improper exploitation. In other words, the Navy would not lose its complete control over the details of ensuing transactions.

A number of amendments with this end in view were submitted to Colonel Roosevelt. He took them to Secretary Denby and discussed them with him. After considerable discussion Secretary Denby agreed to a modified form of one of them. Secretary Denby told Colonel Roosevelt to take it to Secretary Fall, and that if Colonel Roosevelt could get Secretary Fall to agree to this amendment it would be all right with Secretary Denby. Colonel Roosevelt took the amendment to Secretary Fall, who agreed to it. Colonel Roosevelt then took it to the White House for signature.

I want you to mark carefully the language of this Roosevelt amendment:

But no general policy as to drilling or reserving lands located in a naval reserve shall be changed or adopted except upon consultation and in cooperation with the Secretary or Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Now, gentlemen, see what that Roosevelt amendment did. That amendment reserved to the Navy complete supervision over the oil reserves. It was on account of this Roosevelt amendment that all of the leases under discussion by the Senate committee at this time were countersigned by Secretary Denby. They could not have been validly executed without the affirmative sanction of the Navy Department.

At this exact point—and I ask you to note the sequence of events—Colonel Roosevelt's active participation in the entire matter ceased. It so happened that he was not consulted on any of the oil leases. Colonel Roosevelt did not know they were under contemplation until after they were signed. With reference to the Teapot Dome lease in particular, Colonel Roosevelt did not even know there was a plan on foot to lease Teapot Dome. Colonel Roosevelt did not know that Sinclair was interested in any of the leases and heard of them only after they had been made known to the general public.

The question of the Roosevelt family's ownership of stock in certain Sinclair companies has been brought out this afternoon. I think most of us will feel it is rather unfortunate to drag, with the apparent purpose of exciting suspicion, the name of a woman into this general controversy; but that has been done. Therefore I should like to give you the facts upon this point. Again, I say, I assert them on my own responsibility.

In so far as Colonel Roosevelt's connection with the Sinclair Co. goes, it is as follows: He was among the group of bankers who were interested in its original formation; he was a director of the company until the United States entered the war in 1917, when he resigned. Colonel Roosevelt's last stock in the company was sold during the war, not later than 1918. Colonel Roosevelt's wife bought 1,000 shares of Sinclair stock, however, in 1920, but sold them at a loss some time before the lease with the Navy Department was signed.

Colonel Roosevelt has engaged in no business of any kind since the war and since his entrance into politics, and he has, therefore, made no money of any kind in business.

Much of what I have here set forth is given in the Senate hearings. It has not, however, been developed in the chronological order in which I have attempted to present it this afternoon.

Gentlemen, I have a very keen admiration for the name of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.] I have a very keen admiration for the personality of the present Theodore Roosevelt. I have for that reason made it my business and my duty, as I regarded it, to acquaint myself, so far as possible, with the extent, if any, to which he was properly to be criticized throughout this whole transaction. I have followed the story in the newspapers; I have followed the testimony in the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one more minute.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And I have discussed this matter with those who were apt to be best informed on the general topic. I can assure you, gentlemen—and I say this on my honor as a Member of the House—that I have not been able to find one instance in which the manliness, the dignity, the honor, or the efficiency of Theodore Roosevelt has in the least degree been affected by the Teapot Dome revelations. [Applause.] I think he has been an admirable public servant; I think it would be a tragedy if his public career were even for a moment to be retarded by these disclosures and by the inferences which unfair critics have been prone to put upon what he has done and upon what he has not done.

Gentlemen, the name of Theodore Roosevelt is untarnished; we can have perfect confidence in the performance of this man as Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I hope the country realizes how fortunate we are to have a public servant of his ability, character, and unblemished reputation and honor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, liberty is the sublimest word in the language of men. Nothing can be grander in this world than to fight the battles for its attainment. Nothing can be more glorious than to fight in defense of one's country, especially when that country is the land of one's nativity. Born in a struggle, developed in an atmosphere of independence, our forefathers wrung from the hands of British oppression the unhindered right to be free. During all the period of our national existence we have been an independent people, but our independence had to be won on the field of battle, and having been won it must be maintained even at the point of the bayonet.

Since the beginning of our national life the name America has been a synonym for liberty and freedom. The peoples of all the world have spoken of Americans as defenders of those great principles of human happiness. That very fact, however, should cause us to use all the more zealous care to see that we deny to no one else the same privileges that we claim for ourselves.

At the time of the conclusion of peace at the close of the Spanish-American War, we accepted the Philippines under certain specified conditions. Hardly a voice was lifted during the discussions in favor of the permanent retention of the islands.

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH PHILIPPINES WERE ACCEPTED.

The sole controversy that arose during the proposed relationship was whether the Philippines should be granted immediate independence or whether a sort of protectorate should be established until such time as the Filipinos should show themselves capable of self-government.

The latter plan was adopted. William McKinley was President of the United States at the time. In discussing the problem in the year 1890, he used the following language:

The Philippines are ours not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government.

He further said:

We must make these people whom Providence has brought within our jurisdiction feel that it is their liberty and not our power, their welfare and not our gain we are seeking to enhance.

This has always been the declared policy of the Government of the United States, and I have been able to find no expression of any official having authority to declare our position which conflicts with this statement.

In 1907 Governor Taft said:

Our jurisdiction and control will finally end in the islands when they are capable of self-government.

In 1915 Theodore Roosevelt said:

If we act so that the natives understand us to have made a definite promise, then we should live up to that promise. These being the circumstances, the islands should at an early moment be given their independence without any conditions whatever by us, and without our retaining any foothold in them.

THE JONES ACT.

In 1916 the Congress passed what is known as the Jones Act. The preamble to that act read in part as follows:

It was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement. * * * It has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Did not the Jones Act, as it originally passed this House, provide they should have their independence upon the 4th of July, 1922?

Mr. JONES. I do not think any definite date was set in the law as actually passed.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Not as actually passed, but as passed by this House.

Mr. JONES. I think probably the gentleman is correct, as the act passed the House.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. The opposition to the granting of independence to the Philippines has come somewhat from a fear that they might become the prey of some other nation, or may be controlled by some other nation, which might be detrimental to the welfare of the United States, and I would like to hear what the gentleman has to say on that phase of the question.

Mr. JONES. I think if the gentleman will get down to the heart of things he will find that is not the real fear, and that is not the essence of the objections which have been made as to Philippine independence.

The real objection is the interest of some business men who have interests in the Philippines. As to their becoming a prey to some other nation, if any nation undertook to take them over, a number of other nations would oppose such a course, while under present conditions the United States would have the entire responsibility should any nation undertake to gain a foothold there. Besides, if that were the only objection to independence, the United States could, if they saw fit at the time they granted independence, say to the world that for a definite or an indefinite length of time we would see to it that no outside nation interfered in the Philippines. In other words, we could make such conditions as might seem wise relative thereto. At any rate, there can be no question of the obligation which the United States has assumed—that we undertook the obligation to release the Philippine Islands as soon as they showed themselves to be capable of self-government. There can be no doubt of our obligation to make their interests and not ours the test. The question is not what is best for ourselves; it is not even what is best for the Philippines; the big question is whether or not they are in position to look after their own government. It is very easy for us to minimize the importance of this question. It is always easy for any individual or any nation which is exercising power of any kind to feel that such individual or such nation can exercise that power better than anyone else. No doubt England thought exactly the same way when the American Colonies sought their independence.

America has grown to be a great Nation; the richest, the most powerful organized country on earth, but at the time she fought for and obtained her independence she had less population, less national wealth, and was probably of as little apparent relative national importance as the Philippines are to-day.

But whether or not these comparisons be true, the only questions now left to be determined are whether the Filipinos desire independence, and whether they have shown that they are capable of conducting their own government.

PHILIPPINES DESIRE INDEPENDENCE.

There can be no doubt of their desire for independence. They have sent two missions to the United States with the single purpose of urging upon the Congress the granting of absolute independence. I was a member of the Insular Affairs Committee of the House at the time this first commission came, and had the pleasure of listening to their presentation. That was the first time in the history of the world that a dependent people had come before the governing country asking independence without reciting a complaint whatever but asking simply for the recognition of a great principle on the basis of fundamental right and breathing nothing but appreciation and good will toward the governing people. It was a magnificent tribute to the unselfish purposes of their country. Only recently another has come for the same purpose. Even the Woods-Forbes report shows that the Filipinos desire independence. I quote from that report, as follows:

We find the people are happy, peaceful, and, in the main, prosperous. We find everywhere among the Christian Filipinos—90 per cent of the population—the desire for independence.

Thus their desire for independence is beyond question. However, I may add in this connection the following quotation from the same report:

The Americans in the Islands, numbering 6,931 out of 10,956,732 total population, or far less than one-tenth of 1 per cent, are for a continued American control.

Thus it seems that the Americans who are there are anxious to have them continue under American control. I wonder if there is not a likelihood that the present policy toward the islands may have been determined more upon the basis of the interests of Americans than the interests of the Filipinos themselves?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. Very largely I agree with the gentleman, but may I call his attention to the difference between a Christian Filipino, the Moros, and the Mindanao people and suggest probably there is considerable difference in their capacity for self-government.

Mr. JONES. But the Wood-Forbes report says that 90 per cent are Christian people.

Mr. LITTLE. That is true, but as the gentleman knows the Moros and the Mindanaos are really practically savages, and I do not believe you should place the Moros and the Mindanaos in the same category.

Mr. JONES. I base my judgment on the seven years' government under the Jones Act.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. KENT. During the administration under the Jones Act, which was very largely under a Democratic administration, of course.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENT. Does not the gentleman realize at that time the banking system they organized was completely disorganized because of the speculative efforts of the men in control of the system—

Mr. JONES. I have heard all kinds of charges on that score, but they got along fairly well during the seven years, and I do not believe that they had much more trouble along that line than we had in this country during the crash that followed all over the world after the war.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. A moment ago the gentleman stated an official report as to the percentage of American residents in the Philippines desiring independence for the Philippines, and if I recall it was very small, almost negligible. Practically all of the Americans there desire the continuance of the American Government?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I would like to ask if the gentleman has any authoritative figures touching the percentage of American residents in Cuba who were in favor of Cuban independence and the percentage in favor of retaining the island under the Spanish Crown?

Mr. JONES. I have not the figures at hand, but I have an idea you will find the same condition existed there as now exists in the Philippines, at least that is my opinion.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I do not have authoritative figures, but I can give some newspaper figures to show that at least 75 per cent of the Americans in Cuba just preceding the final revolt there were in favor of retaining Cuba under the yoke of Spain, and the illustration seems to be apt with reference to the attitude of Americans now resident in the Philippines.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I think that is true.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will yield, the same thing is true to-day with the controversy over the Isle of Pines, which some contend belongs to the Cuban Republic. Those Americans who have gone in and invested money and exploited those people protest against taking it out from under the American flag.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I am sorry, I really have to get on.

Mr. KENT. If the gentleman will just permit, is it not a fact that capital always wants to invest itself under a stable government?

Mr. JONES. Most assuredly, but capital has not the right to dictate to a government or a people the form of government they shall have simply for the protection of outside invested capital.

Mr. KENT. The gentleman, then, is conscientiously of the opinion that there is a stable government now in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. JONES. What I said and what I undertook to say is that the Filipinos have shown they are entitled at least to the experiment of self-government. They have had seven years during which they have made their own laws, controlled their own affairs, with simply the veto power in the hands of Governor General Harrison, which was seldom exercised.

Mr. KENT. Would the gentleman want to send it out independent as a republic among the nations?

Mr. JONES. According to our promise, that is our obligation. We could, of course, reserve the right under certain conditions to, at the end of a certain time, resume the control; but I am perfectly willing to "cut loose" entirely with the possible exception of coaling privileges. Now I must decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. In his message to Congress on December 2, 1920, President Wilson plainly recognized that the only remaining condition which had stood between the Filipinos and independence had been complied with, and in his message to Congress he uses the following language:

Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf, and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the islands.

THE PHILIPPINES ARE READY.

I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our duty to keep our promise to the people of those islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet.

This message was written just after America had taken part in a great war, the greatest of all history. One of the great principles which was involved in that struggle was the right of peoples everywhere to control their own destinies without regard to the governing authority of any country and without regard to the selfish interests of any group or set of men whatever. During the war the Filipinos showed their loyalty to the Government of the United States by tendering the services of 25,000 men. They contributed a submarine and a destroyer to the fleet of the United States, and 6,000 of their men served as volunteers in the United States Navy. They gave a half million dollars to the Red Cross fund and subscribed about $20,000,000 to the issues of Liberty bonds.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Does the gentleman think that the people in the Philippine Islands would have maintained a stable government had it not been for the American authority established in the islands?

Mr. JONES. That is a purely academic question. That was 25 years ago when we first took them over. Whether or not they would at that time is an entirely different question to the one with which we are now faced. The only question we are face to face with now, if they desire independence, is whether or not they can handle their own affairs, not as they were then, but as they are now.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Does the gentleman think they could maintain order to-day—

Mr. JONES. I most certainly think that the Philippines are in much better condition to handle their own affairs than a great many of these other little countries that we recognized at the conclusion of the great World War, and I believe that the experience under the Jones Act, under which for the last seven years they have practically handled their own affairs, until General Wood went over there, shows that they can handle them. We had no trouble until General Wood went over there.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. That does not answer the question.

Mr. JONES. I am sorry. I have made it just as clear as language can make it.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. I asked the gentleman if he believed they could maintain order in the Philippines to-day were it not for the presence of the American authorities.

Mr. JONES. I most certainly do. That is purely an opinion; and I base it on their experiences for the seven years prior to the time we sent General Wood over there and upon the judgment of men who are in a position to know. I want to say in that connection that in the last 25 years there has not been an insurrection of any consequence nor a revolt against the United States Government. There has been as little of disorder as could have been expected by the most sanguine of the advocates of independence. Since the enactment of the Jones law they have had practical control of all of the affairs of their country until the sending to the islands of General Wood.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has the gentleman's attention been called to a consideration of the conduct of Governor General Wood and a misunderstanding with the Philippine people and its bearing upon the general question of independence?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and I want to say—

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Is the gentleman's speech an attack on General Wood?

Mr. JONES. Not at all. I am answering the gentleman's question as to whether or not they are able to handle their own affairs. I say they did do it until we sent a military man there. I do not believe—and I am not saying this as an attack on General Wood—that a military man ought to be at the head of the Philippines or any other civil government. [Applause.] That is exactly the way I feel about it.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is the gentleman acquainted with General Wood's administration of civil affairs of Cuba?

Mr. JONES. I understand there were a great many complaints of his administration there. There have been several efforts made to get me away from the Philippines, but I want to speak to the Philippines as far as I may.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. RANKIN. Before the gentleman gets too far from the proposition of the Filipinos' fitness for self-government, I wonder if the gentleman is familiar with the statement Admiral Dewey made about 1898 or 1900, and subsequently before a committee of either the House or Senate, to the effect that in his opinion the Filipinos were more capable of self-government than the Cubans were.

THE WOOD RÉGIME.

Mr. JONES. I believe the sending of General Wood to the Philippines was a great mistake, not so much because it was General Wood but because he was a military man. The training of a military man in its very essence and nature renders him unfitted to head a civil government. It is just as unwise to select a man whose lifelong training has been in a military way to head a civil government as it would be to select a man who had all his life been in civilian employment and never had any military training to command an army on the field of battle. The very nature of the training, the very character of the work that a military man is called upon to do demands unlimited authority and unquestioning obedience. No man can escape the nature of his training. It was but natural, therefore, that General Wood should endeavor to institute a form of government that was altogether out of harmony with the spirit of autonomy, and that would tend to destroy rather than to develop the art of self-government in the people of the Philippines.

Not only was General Wood unfitted by virtue of his military training to be the head of a government in the Philippines or of any other civil government, but in addition thereto he seems to have had the wrong viewpoint generally. He seems to have had the viewpoint of the big business interests who apparently want to exploit the islands instead of to see them remain the property of the people themselves. This has been the complaint of the Filipinos practically ever since General Wood became Governor General of the islands. At the time complaint was first made many thought it was due to an impulsiveness or to a little irritation occasioned by the change of governors. However, the complaint was so persistent and additional ones were so numerous that it appeared there must be some grounds for such continued dissatisfaction.

A number of things have occurred that seem to bear out these complaints. Only recently it has developed that the governor's son, Lieut. Osborne Wood, had made an immense fortune in speculating on the exchanges in New York City. If this had been but a single speculative investment it could easily have been designated as a stroke of fortune, but it extended over a period of more than a year, involving a great many investments in numerous stocks and other interests. When those who have spent their lifetime bending over and watching every pulse of the stock ticker find it difficult to beat the game in New York, it is very remarkable that a boy in his twenties should through a long course of speculation involving both sides of the game—short selling as well as purchasing—be able to come out so handsomely and so consistently. Of course, General Wood denies any knowledge of these investments. We must take him at his word—at least, until proof is given to the contrary—but, at the same time, it requires some effort to give full credence to that position when it is remembered that Lieutenant Wood is the son of Governor Wood, was his first aid, and was with him during the whole period, especially in view of the rumors that have been going around for months as to the good fortune of young Wood.

OUR HONOR AT STAKE.

That, however, is merely an incident. The big question before the Congress and the American people is the plighted faith of the Government. America occupies a proud place in the world's affairs. From simple beginnings we have grown to a position of heritage and power. It is easy for a nation to forget its early struggles when hardships have been endured. After the lapse of a few years the hardships are forgotten and only heroic memories remain. People become absorbed in other things and are prone to forget what has gone on before.

More than a quarter of a century has elapsed since Old Glory was first raised in the Philippines. For nearly 150 years that flag has been the symbol of liberty and not of conquest, an emblem of human rights, without a taint of selfishness or exploitation. "Blazing all over its ample folds" has been an unbroken record as stainless as the stars that sparkle in its field of blue. Shining through every thread of its wondrous fabric has been the memory of the Revolutionary blood that was spilled to make it possible. In all the period of its glorious history not one ignoble deed of national consequence has been done to dishonor it; not one cloud of suspicion has arisen to pollute it since the days of Betsy Ross, whose Quaker hands first fashioned it into a robe of triumph. Can we, we with such a heritage, afford by any act, either of omission or commission, to raise any question as to our utmost good faith? Shall we forget the blood that was spilled in our defense, or the tears that were shed for our glory? Not so long as the fires burn upon the altar of freedom and we remain true to the traditions of the Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will give the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. JONES. America's word has never been dishonored. Her honor has never been questioned. The world's faith in her has never been shaken. Shall we desert the principles bulwarked into our national structure at so terrific a cost?

Perhaps the Filipinos would make some mistakes. Perhaps for a time their government would not be so good as the one we have given them. A child would never learn to walk alone if some grown person, who could walk better than it could, insisted always in rendering assistance.

Mr. KENT. Is it not a fact that by reason of the experiences in the past year or so the failure on the part of the Filipinos to adapt themselves either to military or civil authority is one of the strongest grounds for doubting that they are able to govern themselves?

Mr. JONES. I do not admit the gentleman's premises. Those who are in the best position to know think otherwise, and I prefer to accept their authority rather than that of others with reference to their ability to govern themselves. Years ago Governor General Taft said the Philippines would soon be ready for self-government. The great Roosevelt said substantially as much. Governor General Harrison said they were ready for the great adventure. President Wilson three years ago urged immediate independence. The last seven years have fully demonstrated their ability to govern themselves. The parting of the ways has come. The hour for action has arrived.

I do not know what the future may hold in store. I do not know what discoveries, what inventions, what wonderful things the genius of man may contrive. I know not what labor-saving devices, what triumphs in the arts and sciences, what wonders in delving into the earth or in mastering the elements of the air may be the attainments of the peoples of the world in the years to come. Probably what has already been discovered, what has already been invented, what has already been achieved is but faintly typical of the marvelous things in store for the future. But I do know that whatever may be discovered; whatever inventions, whatever triumphs, whatever glories await the peoples of the world, there can not come to any race of men, to any country, to any land or people anything to take the place of liberty.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, in this morning's paper is a dispatch from Chicago evidently intended to influence the wheat market and legislation on wheat. It states that the President has increased the tariff on wheat 12 per cent and that that has resulted in a cut of 8 cents a bushel in the price of wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade. It also gives a distorted statement of the wheat on hand now. The Agricultural Department has just informed us that the farmers have 22,000,000 bushels less wheat on hand than they had a year ago; that the country mills and elevators have less wheat on hand than a year ago, but that the speculators have on hand 18,000,000 bushels more of wheat in what they call the "commercial visible supply."

The dispatch says that the "largest house in the grain trade" says, "Our visible supply is 10,000,000 bushels larger than last year." That one firm or outfit has on hand over half of the speculative wheat, and they are at the bottom of all this effort to break the value of the farmers' wheat and to bulldoze Congress into buying the speculators' wheat at a fancy price through legislation now before Congress, and this dispatch was sent to further those interests.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is the gentleman referring to some bill that is now being considered?

Mr. LITTLE. Well, I am going to leave that for the gentleman's very able and logical mind to decide for itself. [Laughter.] The gentleman probably knows more about it than I do.

Gentlemen, an immense amount of the agitation for wheat legislation springs from the wheat speculators, who do not know just what to do with their wheat—18,000,000 bushels more than last year. Their market price is cut down, the farmers suffer, and then they call attention to a misfortune in Europe—the alleged terrible shortage of food there—and that the Government must buy their wheat. Well, we put a stop to that last summer when they threatened to again force down the value of wheat if the Government did not buy their accumulations and ship them to Europe.

Here is one firm that has 10,000,000 bushels of wheat more than a year ago. If they get 50 cents more a bushel on that and sell it to the Government, they will make $5,000,000 on it.

I want to put these facts before the House while the morning dispatch is fresh in the minds of the Members, and to show the Members that there is a mysterious influence which is continually keeping such stuff in the papers. You wait another week, and you will see another dispatch.

If this Chicago Board of Trade can cut the price of wheat 8 cents a bushel in a day, as it claims in this dispatch, simply because the President raised the tariff on wheat, it is a venomous incendiary and should be suppressed by criminal penalties; but it boasts in this wire that it did that.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. I want to get the gentleman's judgment on this: Is it the gentleman's judgment that the bills which are now being considered to relieve the wheat farmers will relieve not the wheat farmers but the wheat speculators?

Mr. LITTLE. My judgment is that the wheat speculators are very earnestly agitating some such legislation because they expect to make money out of it, but in addition to that I think the farmers very much need some legislation of this sort. Without any doubt whatever there are men who agitate for legislation that will force the Government to buy their speculative wheat, taking advantage of the dire necessities of the farmer whose wheat they bought for almost nothing.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is it not a fact that every one of the speculators who has appeared with reference to this bill is very violently opposed to it for the simple reason that it takes away from him the future market which has been the source of his speculation?

Mr. LITTLE. No; if the gentleman is asking me.

Mr. KETCHAM. I have attended the hearings and I find that is the evidence.

Mr. LITTLE. So have I, and I have heard them speak. There is one great buyer that is said to have on hand 15,000,000 bushels of wheat. If they could get $1.50 for this wheat, which cost them 90 cents or less, they would profit by several millions of dollars. I must not yield too much. Who is the speculator referred to by the gentleman?

Mr. KETCHAM. I am speaking of the president of the board of trade, if the gentleman please.

Mr. LITTLE. All speculators are opposed to any law except those just now stuck with too much wheat.

Mr. LAZARO. How much of the wheat of the last crop is now held by the farmers and how much by the speculators?

Mr. LITTLE. One hundred and thirty-three million bushels are held by the farmers, 22,000,000 less than a year ago, 90,000,000 bushels are held in farmers' elevators, which is less than one year ago, and the wheat speculators hold 72,000,000 bushels, 18,000,000 bushels more than they had a year ago. They are making much agitation, in my judgment. They buy the farmer's wheat for 80 cents a bushel, and under the pretense of getting better prices for the farmers advocate some plan that will give them 50 or 60 cents a bushel profit on the wheat they accumulate. Nevertheless, gentlemen, it is your duty to provide sufficient legislation to enable the wheat farmer to continue in his business without losing money. Your manifest duty is to accord him the possibility of such a successful business. He simply must have more money for his wheat or quit raising any wheat for export, and since the war he has exported wheat that brought him approximately $1,500,000,000. Is that worth preserving?

Now, the gentleman has touched a point right there which I have discussed before. He asked me how much was held. I am right here going to tell you what the experience of the year before this was, and you will have the figures before you. They are constantly misrepresented; I will just say, plainly lied about all the time by the bunco steerers of the boards of trade in London, Liverpool, Chicago, and elsewhere. They constantly assert we have grown too much wheat, but there never was a year when we had a surplus of wheat, and there never will be.

The gentlemen fail to differentiate between an alleged surplus and our exportable wheat. We produce about 800,000,000 bushels per annum. We utilize about three-fourths of that or more at home. The rest we must sell in the world's market, and the wheat speculators and the boards of trade scare the farmer to death by telling him that is a surplus. There is never any surplus. Our foreign market is just as certain as any other market, and the wheat we sell abroad is sold just as much as any other wheat the farmer raises. It becomes our duty, gentlemen, to devise a means by which the American producer can dispose of his goods in the foreign market at a reasonable price, but first you must get it clear in your minds and in the minds of the farmers that we have no surplus.

And I shall now present to you the figures for a whole year to demonstrate that when the year is done we have no wheat remaining except the ordinary carry over, which we must maintain every year because the millers must necessarily have it to produce good flour when the soft crop first comes in and to meet the home consumption from month to month.

I have consulted the Wall Street Journal, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], chairman of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, who has given more attention to this particular feature of it than perhaps any of us. For example, take the year beginning July 1, 1922; that year we grew a crop of 856,000,000 bushels. We had a carry over from the year before of 78,000,000 bushels. We imported that year 20,000,000 bushels, or a total of 984,000,000 bushels. We could eat it or sell it, as we pleased. We carried over into the next year 101,000,000 bushels. We exported 222,000,000 bushels, and we ate, fed to stock, or used for seed all the rest, 631,000,000 bushels. When the year ended we did not have a bushel of surplus wheat. The carry over of 100,000,000 bushels was quite ordinary. Of that amount the farmers only held 35,000,000 bushels in their bins. There was no surplus except what the farmer had in his bin, because the farmer is the only man who can have a surplus. If he sells all his wheat, there is no surplus; it does not make any difference who buys it, or whether it is bought in London or Cleveland or Liverpool.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The gentleman's distinction is this, as I understand it: The bill he has particularly in mind puts in the term that there is an exportable surplus, while the history of the growth of wheat the world over, year after year, demonstrates clearly that there never is any such thing, viewed by and large in the world, as a world surplus.

Mr. LITTLE. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. If the gentleman will permit me, I will go into that in detail a little, because I think I can make it clear. There is in the world this year—the Wall Street Journal claims, and it is the limit, I think, but the Secretary says, in effect, the same thing—there is a total crop of 3,400,000,000 bushels of wheat. For the six years before we went into the war the annual average crop was 500,000,000 bushels of wheat a year more than this year. You will see, gentlemen, that it is pure nonsense to talk about any world surplus at all.

Before the war and up to 1915 the world produced 500,000,000 more bushels of wheat a year than we have got this year. There is no surplus.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I understood the gentleman to say in his opening remarks that the speculators state that there are 18,000,000 bushels more of wheat than really exist.

Mr. LITTLE. This house says they have 10,000,000 bushels—

Mr. RANKIN. More than really exists?

Mr. LITTLE. No; not more than exists.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman confesses then that all the wheat they claim is in existence is really in existence?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; sure. Perhaps the gamblers exaggerate in claiming 72,000,000. The department should make those figures itself.

Mr. RANKIN. The reason I ask that question is the Department of Commerce has recently given out a statement accounting for 600,000 bales of cotton that does not exist at all, and I just wanted to know if they had imposed on the wheat farmer the same as on the cotton farmer.

Mr. LITTLE. They are better sharks than the wheat men, I guess, and that is going pretty strong. No; there is some wheat in the country, but that is nothing to be scared about. They have that every year and get rid of it every year. There is no world surplus of wheat and there never is. Now, let us go further. These speculators at Chicago say they have no market. They were weeping around here last summer begging the Government to buy wheat and ship it to "starving people in Europe." I found out that the scoundrels had a lot of wheat that they could not get as high a price for as they wanted and they wanted to pass it on to the Government, and I telegraphed to the department and sent them, I am afraid, a rather impertinent telegram; but anyway we stopped it.

Now, in reference to this wheat market: In the years since the war we have shipped to Europe and exported, all told, 1,500,000,000 bushels of wheat. They talk about no market. There never was in all time any market that compared with the foreign market this country has enjoyed. I do not want you to think there is a surplus of wheat. There is nothing here but less than the usual exportable wheat which we have every year, and we sell it every year. It is not a surplus at all. If we sold every bushel we raised in London it would not be surplus, it would be export wheat. What we have got to deal with is the exportable wheat. That is our menace, and I will speak to you about that in a moment, if you will permit me.

We have plenty of markets and we have no surplus. We have to contend with the exportable wheat. The board of trade at Chicago and the one at Liverpool and Broomhall in London begin each season by scaring the farmers to death by telling them there is too much wheat all over the world and various other tales.

MEET FARMER AT HARVEST.

I find that if we can meet the farmer coming in from the wheat field with his crop before these sharks get to him and give him a decent price for his wheat, he will be in the clear. [Applause.] This is the first thing we have to do.

I am now going to speak to this side of the House for a moment. In this country for 100 years we have been paying a tariff tax in order to keep you folks in New York and New England busy. You could not compete with the shoe manufacturers in England, and we gave you a tariff and we built up the greatest manufacturing industries in the world; and I am a Republican and proud of it. But now you must reciprocate. Times have now changed. It was a very simple thing then. We could not make a pair of shoes that could compete with a European pair of shoes and so you stuck a tariff on the shoes and we had to pay a little more for them, and as a result we make our own shoes and have cheap shoes at home and sell shoes in our home market. Now, this world market confronts the farmer when he sells wheat, as it did the shoemaker. They have become so prosperous they are growing more wheat than we can eat, and they have to ship it to Liverpool. The conflict gives them a lower price than they ought to have at home. Are you now going to put wheat on a par with shoes and steel? We have made you rich.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman knows that there is no duty on shoes or leather now.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, I am not speaking of the moment; I began a hundred years ago. The principle, of course, is what is involved. Now, these farmers are stuck. There is just one thing for you to do and you might as well quit fooling with it. You either have to enable them to meet the market in Liverpool or they have got to quit raising so much wheat. The shoemaker did not quit making shoes. When you put a tariff on, somebody has got to pay it.

Mr. SNYDER. I am not a shoemaker, but the gentleman knows what the tariff did. It made us make so many shoes that we now supply not only this country but other countries, and we hope to do the same thing with wheat. We have put 45 cents a bushel on wheat and hope that that will enable us to supply ourselves and other countries.

Mr. LITTLE. When the shoe trade could not compete with the European shoemakers 100 years ago, we put a tariff on shoes and all these other foreign competitive goods. The rest of us paid a better price and made the shoemakers and other eastern factories well to do. The tariff is useful to the farmer, but it could not be such a bulwark to him as it was to the factories and laboring man. We can use it here, because it protected our shoemaker in our home market. We can not so much benefit the farmer thereby, but what he wants is protection in the foreign market, in Liverpool, for instance. We can not by any tariff give the farmer protection in Liverpool, but we must give him something just as useful and we can do it under H. R. 8330, my export bill. The predecessor of it was reported favorably by the committee last year.

The first difficulty the farmer meets is that when he comes in from his harvest field with his first wheat he finds himself confronted by threats of a surplus crop and insistence that his wheat has no value. The first thing you have got to do for him is to fix it so that he will get a fair, reasonable price when he harvests, and nobody will do that but you gentlemen, you of this House, if anybody ever does. It is useless and idle to pretend any longer. The bill H. R. 8330 provides that when the farmer brings his wheat in the Government shall stand ready to pay him $1.10 a bushel at once for his wheat at his home town, not in Chicago or Minneapolis. It provides that he shall get $1.10 at home for his crop, which we hope will be enough to prevent him from a loss. If you are going to maintain a tariff you will simply be compelled to make provision for the farmer and his protection in the Liverpool market.

When he knows that the Government is prepared to pay him $1.10 at his home market, the wheat buyers of this country will necessarily be compelled to meet the Government competition and pay $1.10, too. When that happens it will not be necessary for the Government to buy any wheat at all. The bill, if administered intelligently, will simply make it clear that the Government will pay $1.10, if nobody else does, and then the wheat buyers will pay $1.10 for all the wheat we need for home consumption. We produce about 800,000,000 bushels a year, and we consume and utilize about 650,000,000 bushels of it at home, and the home market of the United States would be $1.10 a bushel, and the farmer would be sure of that amount for his wheat until the home consumption was amply supplied. That disposes of three-fourths of our crop.

Let us suppose the wheat buyer, the farmer, and the Government agent meet at a town in the morning. The wheat buyers will purchase through the day until they have bought as much as their market demands. Possibly at 4 in the afternoon, or on Saturday morning of the week, they may say, "We have all the wheat for which there is now any demand for home consumption." The Government will then step in and purchase the surplus of wheat on hand at that town that day or that week or that month, and eventually that year, and pay $1.10 for it. Thus at the end of the year the Department of Agriculture will have purchased all the wheat we raised that must be exported.

The conditions will necessarily adjust automatically to meet that plan. Thus when the Secretary of Agriculture gets our 150,000,000 or 200,000,000 bushels of wheat each year to Liverpool he will have no American competitors to prevent him from controlling the Liverpool market.

Last year my bill simply provided that we pay $1 a bushel. They laughed at me and said the farmers would insist on at least $1.50. Wheat sold for 70 cents, 80 cents, 90 cents, and 95 cents. Nobody out West got $1 a bushel until very recently, when they have gotten $1.02 in some places. This country raised 780,000,000 bushels last year. If my bill had gone into effect just as it was written last year, they would have averaged 20 cents a bushel on wheat more than the farmers have received, and the wheat farmers of this country would have been worth $150,000,000 more than they are now or will be by the end of this crop year. I think those who have kept track of this proposition will concede that, and the Government would not have been compelled to buy more than about 100,000,000 bushels of wheat all told, because that is nearly all we have actually exported by this time. Now, again they tell me the wheat farmers insist on $1.50 a bushel. Why, does anybody seriously think that they are going to get it? No; nobody does. Why not be reasonable, gentlemen, and sane and sensible and try to actually accomplish something? Last year I would have made you $150,000,000 if you had let my bill alone and made it a law.

This year H. R. 8330 provides that the Government shall be authorized to pay $1.10 instead of $1. I think the eastern people are opening up a little. They begin to understand that if they do not pay the farmers at least a cost price for their wheat the farmers will discontinue sowing wheat and it will soon soar out of sight and the American people will quit eating wheat bread. This bill also provides that when the price goes above $1.10 the Department of Agriculture can stay with the rising price until they pay $1.25 to encourage its rise and to make a supply in the Government vaults for any unexpected emergencies and foreign trade. If my bill had become a law last year, I think a good share of the wheat would have sold at $1.10 without any further encouragement.

We now, if this bill becomes a law, approach what will happen in Liverpool when America appears in the foreign markets with one-fourth, one-third, or perhaps one-half of the exported wheat. In the last six years since the war we shipped abroad 1,500,000,000 bushels of wheat. The European world would have starved to death, gentlemen, if they had not received our wheat. If the Department of Agriculture should say to Liverpool, "We have determined to ship you no wheat for three months," wheat would go up 50 cents a bushel in Liverpool before the 90 days elapsed, and the Government could sell its wheat at its own price. Joe Leiter was the only benefactor the farmers have ever really had. He actually got them more money for their wheat, and there is not a thing in the world that will do them any good except to get them more money for their wheat at their home town. The Secretary of Agriculture, with that enormous crop in his hands, could go to Liverpool and do far more than Joe Leiter did when he controlled the markets at Chicago and raised wheat so high in price. They tell us that the farmers are losing money on the exported wheat. Let us suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture should suddenly conclude to lose money on 20,000,000 bushels of wheat. Why, he could undersell Canada or Argentina in two weeks and drive them out of the European market, and then fix his own price. He could say to the great Canadian exporters, "Unite with me and we will raise the price of wheat by our little pool 20 cents a bushel in Liverpool," and that could be done any time by the Secretary, who would become the potentate of the export trade. You take any shrewd wheat man like my colleague, Mr. HAVEN, chairman of the Agriculture Committee, and make him Secretary in full control of our wheat crop abroad. He could bring home for the American farmer a profit on every bushel of wheat they sent abroad. There are several other bills, but every one of them admits from the start that we must necessarily lose money under their plans on every shipment we make. Why, then, make any such a law? Why undertake any such commerce? We can do as well as that right now. Let us take a gambler's chance anyway and fight for the markets of the world.

House bill 8330 takes care of all of our home consumption and means that the price of wheat would be $1.10. That disposes of the local situation as long as the home market holds out. You are a wheat buyer, we will say; you will stick to it until pretty soon you will find that the home consumption is supplied. It might happen the first day at 4 o'clock, and you may begin buying for home consumption right away. The wheat buyer says that he is not going to pay $1.10 and export to Europe and sell for 99 cents. Then the Government has got to come in, and you may as well face it now. You can tell the farmer to quit raising wheat or do what I am suggesting. They tried it on coffee in Brazil and all of them got rich.

Mr. KVALE. How is the gentleman going to get that bill through this House when the boards of trade and chambers of commerce do not want it?

Mr. LITTLE. I am after them right now. Are you with me?

Mr. KVALE. I am.

Mr. LITTLE. You stay with me and I will lick them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of a policy of price fixing on any commodities raised by the farmers?

Mr. LITTLE. I am not fixing any prices. I am not in favor of fixing the price on anything. I wish to make the Department of Agriculture a competitor in the wheat market that the wheat gamblers will respect, so that the farmer may get cost price at least for his wheat.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to remind him that during the war, when our cotton was selling for 40 cents—

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, why do you remind me of that? Do you think that I can not remember back that far?

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the gentleman's proposition would lead to.

Mr. LITTLE. Excuse me. I can not yield any further. The gentleman is a good lawyer and will see that this is not a price-fixing bill as soon as he reads it. The Government would not have to buy any wheat to maintain home consumption wheat at $1.10. I explained to you that the price would fix itself. The Government acts as a competitor. We do not fix the price any more than you would if you went into the market.

I carefully avoided price fixing. The Government is not going to buy any wheat on this proposition as long as the home markets hold out. I am not in favor of price fixing; I am not in favor of trying anything but wheat on this. I tried that because we can go and stick it in the elevators and keep it there for a cent a bushel. We would build no storehouses. Because of the many elevators, the Government need never build any storehouses. Cotton could be handled in exactly the same way, and the two major farm products made safe crops by the same plan, and with no investment except for the purchase of the wheat and the cotton themselves.

I did not suggest hogs, because it would be, in my judgment, absolutely impossible to buy and feed and keep and slaughter hogs without involving the Government in tremendous expenses and complications. The same is true of handling cattle and many products of the farm. If we can not enact a law that will put wheat farmers in the clear, we certainly can not make a law that will help any other crop or product. If we can manage to make a good law out of this, we can gradually develop possibly other crops and other products as the Government learned its business; but if we undertake to take care of many of them at once, the Government would be swamped. If the Government has a few millions on hand the wheat buyer will respect its promise to buy and stand clear and meet it. To buy the total export of 200,000,000 bushels in a year would be entirely within the range of the Government, but if this Government undertakes at the same time to purchase corn, cotton, wool, hogs, sheep, cattle, flour, and other farm products, no bluff would work. The buyers would absolutely decline to respect any such talk of possible funds. Billions of dollars are needed every year to buy and sell the stock and stock products alone. If this Government would undertake to establish a universal market for all these things, they would require a cash capital of at least $20,000,000,000 in order to make themselves respected in the competing local markets. One of the reasons this wheat proposition might succeed is the Government could afford to buy and hold wheat and sell the wheat when it got ready and thereby dominate the market, but if this wheat and these hogs, and so on, must be turned as rapidly as trade turns them now, immediate cash by billions would necessarily have to be kept on hand all the time.

As I said before, home consumption will buy wheat at, at least, $1.10. It will then become the duty of the Government to pay $1.10 to the farmer for the export wheat and to take care of it abroad. For nearly 20 years the Government of Brazil has been buying and storing inland its coffee product, shipping it to Santos and Rio, the seaports, and selling it abroad and dominating the market price of coffee in the world. That is the job I suggest for the Secretary of Agriculture with regard to wheat, and if he accomplishes that he certainly will have his hands full without talking about hogs and corn and sheep and cattle. It will be up to him to get us a good price in Liverpool.

This export bill takes care of that. There is not any surplus; that is simply to scare children and deceive farmers in June—the Government will have to buy and carry abroad the exportable wheat. We will do like they do with coffee in Brazil, where they made money for 20 years. When that time comes the Government has got to buy the exportable wheat and none of it allowed to come on the market till the sign is right, and then the Government goes to Europe with a third to one-half of all the exportable wheat. Suppose the Secretary of Agriculture is a shrewd, good business man and finds himself in Liverpool with one-third or one-half, perhaps, of the wheat of the world. Who will fix the price at Liverpool? Why, the Secretary will if he has good common sense. Suppose he says to Europe he will not let anybody buy wheat if it does not bring enough; that he will not export any in three months. Suppose you keep off the market a third to a half of the wheat for a period of three months. Why, everybody here who thinks a minute would know that wheat would shoot up like an arrow. Two hundred million bushels would be about the limit and cost about $1.10.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Who would fix the price in Liverpool? I ask for two additional minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. The Secretary. He fixes the price in Liverpool, and says what is a reasonable price. It seems to me it is common sense—

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The gentleman called attention to Brazil and the great success it has had in its valorization scheme with reference to coffee. Is it not true that at three different times Brazil has been in great distress through that process? Is not the process to which the gentleman refers exactly the same—

Mr. LITTLE. It is not exactly the same.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. In principle the same?

Mr. LITTLE. No; it is not. From 1907 until now Brazil has been trying the valorization of coffee, with some difficulties and with wonderful success all told. In 1901 and 1902 the price of coffee in Brazil fell from 75 to 50 francs per bag. In 1906 the world had on hand 11,000,000 sacks of coffee, nearly a year's product, and in 1906 and 1907 big crops added 20,000,000 bags. The coffee industry was thus confronted with absolute ruin. In 1907 they actually began the valorization plan. They sailed the ship with difficulty over the rocks until in 1910 they reached victory and big prices and control of the world market.

Mr. KINDRED. Was not the Brazilian law unwholesome in respect to its restriction of the production of coffee?

Mr. LITTLE. The Government maintains eight great warehouses in the interior, in which it stores 4,500,000 bags of coffee. They allow each day only, Sundays excepted, the shipment of 35,000 bags to Santos and 12,000 bags to Rio Janeiro, the seaports, and this is all the coffee exported, and thus they restrict the trade and secure good prices. The crop of 1923 was nearly ruined by torrential rains and the conditions have been very unfortunate for that crop. They have had ample market for all the real good coffee they could export, but great difficulty in handling the rain-soaked coffee. Commencing in three States, they now have the Government with a department for coffee behind the valorization plan with the announcement that it shall continue. For 17 years they have weathered it through, generally with great success, assisted by the export taxes, by Government loans sometimes, and sometimes by issues of bank notes, but with the result that Brazil leads the world's markets. They have tried many experiments and had many new ideas which failed to materialize.

Gentlemen, there are many theories they talk to you about they never put into force. [Applause.]

ARGUMENT BEFORE AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE.

In accord with leave given me to revise and extend my remarks and insert my argument to the Committee on Agriculture March 5, I present following this the argument made then to that committee in favor of H. R. 8330, formerly 78, by its author, including the bill:

LITTLE EXPORT BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Little, we will be glad to hear you now on H. R. 78.

The bill is as follows:

"[H. R. 8330, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"A bill (H. R. 8330) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase, store, and sell wheat, and to secure and maintain to the producer a reasonable price for wheat and to the consumer a reasonable price for bread, and to stabilize wheat values.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to buy wheat of such grades and quality as he designates, at such times and places as he directs, at not to exceed $1.25 a bushel and at not to exceed the market price at said times and places, except when wheat is being sold there, and then at less than $1.10 a bushel, when he may pay $1.10 a bushel for said wheat if he deems best; and an appropriation of $60,000,000 is hereby authorized for the purchase, transportation, storage, and insurance of said wheat.

"Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has accumulated in elevator storage 1,000,000 bushels of wheat or more, Treasury certificates shall be issued to the Secretary of Agriculture at such interest and for such times as the Secretary of the Treasury shall name, but with authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to pay them prior to their expiration if he shall see fit. They shall be issued in such amount as the Secretary of the Treasury shall hold to be properly secured by the wheat then in storage. But whenever the wheat on which these certificates are issued is sold, that money shall be applied to the discharge of that particular indebtedness and to pay off those certain certificates, and this process may continue whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has a million or more bushels of wheat in storage on which no certificates have issued.

"The wheat he buys shall be stored in elevators under warehouse receipts. When any 2,000 bushels or more of wheat shall have been held by the Secretary for more than 30 days, thereafter it shall be stored in bonded elevators.

"The Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time sell wheat at not less than the market price in Minneapolis; Buffalo; Kansas City, Kans.; Chicago; and New York City, as he shall deem to best interests of the Nation.

"Whenever wheat of the aforesaid grades and quality can not be bought in Chicago and New York City for less than $1.85 per bushel, the Secretary of Agriculture shall proceed to sell as much of the wheat he holds in storage as he deems wise, at such prices as shall be considered proper by him, and so continue as in his judgment such sales shall be to the best interests of the Nation.

"The $60,000,000 first appropriated, the money derived from the sale of the certificates authorized, and the money derived from the sale of wheat by the Secretary as hereinbefore authorized, or for this fund from any other source, shall constitute a revolving fund for carrying out the provisions of this act. If the sale of any wheat made security for any given certificates shall not be sufficient to take up those certificates, the balance may be discharged from the said revolving fund.

"The President of the United States shall appoint, for a term of four years and subject to removal by him, an officer in the Department of Agriculture, to be known as the superintendent of grain and bread, at a salary of $10,000 a year, who shall maintain in Washington an office as his headquarters, employing, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, such assistants in said headquarters and such agents for the purchase and sale of wheat as shall be appropriated for. The bonds of all bonded elevators in which wheat shall be stored shall be subject to approval by the superintendent of grain and bread.

"Subject to the provisions hereof, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and shall enforce suitable regulations for the exercise of the powers and the performance of the duties hereby authorized."

Mr. LITTLE. Apropos of Mr. TINCER's instructions, Hon. SYDNEY ANDERSON, who was president of the National Wheat Conference and has given a great deal of study to the matter, has instructed me to say to this committee that if any one of these bills is to be reported he prefers the Little bill. He was chairman of the Joint Agricultural Commission and has given as much attention to the subject as anybody, and I guess represents as many people.

Mr. CLARKE. We deny that he has given any more attention to it than has this committee.

Mr. LITTLE. I did not say he had. I said as much.

Mr. CLAGUE. He does not represent the wheat farmers.

Mr. LITTLE. I don't know the details of all national organizations. They had a meeting up here and Mr. Jewett, president of the American Wheat Growers' Association, spoke the other night, and at the National Conference, over which Congressman ANDERSON presided, at Chicago last June; so they have been active. I just speak of that incidentally.

As far as I can learn, this bill of mine was the first bill ever reported favorably from a committee to this Congress, authorizing the Government to buy wheat and pay certain amounts for it. As far as I know, this bill is the first instance in which a bill has been introduced to enable the Federal Government to conduct the exports beneficially for the farmers. There is, in this connection, another thing that I want to call your attention to. The only instance in the world where a government has been successful in handling crops that I know of is that of Brazil. I have given considerable study to that. It is very difficult to secure from the Department of Agriculture or any source any definite information about it. What I learned I got from the Department of Commerce.

Gentlemen, I think that Brazil's method should have been the first thing that we should have studied. There should have been a committee sent there to get the facts. As near as I can figure it, the gist of it is this: The Government of Brazil puts an export tax on coffee. In that way nobody else can afford to export coffee. The Government can then buy all the coffee. That gives them control of the export of coffee from Brazil, and eventually of the world market. It has been very successful.

The Assistant Secretary of Commerce told me that it was a total failure. He had no information. It has been a great success, as his department's figures show, and I want to say to you gentlemen that I am not familiar with the facts for a year or two, but in 1921 they made a great deal of money out of coffee, more than they ever did in Brazil, and I can assure you that that is the best possible basis to work from.

Mr. CLARK. Let me ask a question there. You are familiar with the fact that they came very near going broke in 1920, and had to be refinanced through a loan of millions of dollars?

Mr. LITTLE. No; not in 1920, but some 10 years before that they did. They accumulated so much coffee that they did not know what to do with it, but things broke right for them and went over, and they have been making money ever since.

Mr. SINCLAIR. How long has this coffee embargo been in existence?

Mr. LITTLE. The Government has been at this since about 1905. I want to call attention to that for the simple reason that my bill is, I think, the first bill that undertakes to follow that proposition. If my bill prevailed, the Government would buy 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. That would mean that the Government would control the shipment of wheat to Liverpool, and in my judgment it would then control the world market. That is really the principal thing in my bill, except one more, with which the older Members are familiar. If my bill had become a law in the Sixty-seventh Congress, the Government would have been authorized to pay a dollar a bushel at the man's home town for his wheat. They would have been able to go right there and give that to him. My theory was, and JOHN TILSON and MARTIN MADDEN both joined me in it, among others; TILSON spoke to the committee and MADDEN authorized me to say that last year. I haven't talked with him lately; but my theory is that if you are a farmer at Abilene, Kans., and the Government informs you that it is going to buy your wheat at a dollar, you won't sell it for any less, and that is all there is to it. Then a buyer comes there buying wheat for a big mill, and he finds the Government and the farmer standing there, and he will pay a dollar, because the miller must have the wheat. That is all there is to that. My theory is, agreed to by Colonel TILSON and other men, that it would not be necessary for the Government to buy any wheat at all, that the result would be that the farmer would not sell for less than a dollar because he knew he could get a dollar, and the wheat buyers would have to meet the Government competition and pay a dollar.

If that had happened last year, if my bill had passed, or the bill which the committee reported out had passed, you would have gotten a dollar and a half, and that would have made 50 cents a bushel on 700,000,000 bushels of wheat and the farmers would have made $350,000,000 above what they did.

The trouble was that when you got it up to $1.50 Mr. Tilson and these other men wouldn't stay by me and I did not have a chance to pass it. I do not believe anybody else will ever pass any bill to make it $1.50 in the House. You can't get by long with a pretext of $1.50 and drawbacks and rebates. If they had taken my bill and made it a dollar, I could have put it through, and the farmers would have made at least 20 cents more a bushel on the average last year. I had considerable conservative support, and if the farmers had stayed with me they would have gotten 20 cents a bushel more on the wheat; and $1.10 to $1.25 in cash is better than $1.50 in soap bubbles in the sun. The lawyers who make fortunes collecting overpayments of taxes will soon have a lifetime job here collecting the claims wheat producers will have against a corporation for the farmers' share of the wheat sold in Europe if you are not careful in your legislation. Come, gentlemen, be sensible, and pay the farmer for his wheat at his home town.

There was not any wheat west of the Mississippi that sold for a dollar. Some of you people said that that wasn't enough to encourage the farmer. It would have gone up to $1.10, too. If that bill had gone through they would have gotten 20 cents a bushel more and they would have made $150,000,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR. You speak of the Government paying the farmer $1.25 or whatever it is.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR. At Abilene, Kans., you use that point as a citation.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Would you pay that at Fargo, N. Dak.?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; anywhere.

Mr. SINCLAIR. And Helena, Mont.?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; anywhere.

Mr. SINCLAIR. That is the reverse of the usual order.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; I know it.

Mr. SINCLAIR. You don't take into consideration the freight?

Mr. LITTLE. You are making a market for the farmer in Chicago. That is one of the things that is breaking him up. The market, under my plan, would be at the home of the farmer, at the farmer's town, and one farmer would get as much as another. There are some arguments against that, of course. I see your point.

Mr. SINCLAIR. You are not taking into consideration the cost of freight?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; I have.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The cost of shipping to the consuming centers?

Mr. LITTLE. If a man wants to buy a bushel of wheat, he will have to pay at least $1.10 under this bill, no matter where he gets it. He can look after the freight himself. Now, we make a market in Chicago or Minneapolis, but the farmer has got to have a market at home, because that is where he sells his wheat. When you pay a certain amount at Chicago or terminal market, the farmer don't get it. The reason we never helped the farmer is because we never legislate for him. We only legislate for the man in Chicago, Minneapolis, or Kansas City.

Mr. SINCLAIR. No; the amount of freight is off.

Mr. LITTLE. The only bill that I know anything of that has been offered that gives the farmer anything is my bill. The rest of you are talking about Chicago or Minneapolis. If I give him a home market instead of a Chicago market, I will make more money for the farmer than has ever been made for him by any one man except Joe Lelster one season.

Now, the wheat would have been sold for 20 cents a bushel more if my bill had gone through, and 50 cents more if the bill you made out of my bill had gone through. I want to bring before you the fact that my bill follows the Brazilian plan, and in my judgment would throw the control of the American wheat markets abroad into the hands of the Government and give them control of the world market.

Mr. Atkeson, who supported this bill last year, will be here this morning to speak again for it.

Prior to every harvest the grain exchanges of London, Liverpool, Chicago, and elsewhere raise the cry of an enormous crop and bring their energies to bear on forcing the farmer to sell his wheat at a sacrifice. The bill I am discussing provides that the United States shall be ready to pay from $1.10 to $1.25 a bushel as soon as the harvest begins. That immediately disposes of any dangerous attack by the predatory wheat speculators on the impecunious wheat farmer. The bill I introduced at the last Congress, and which this committee, with some amendments, reported favorably for passage, provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should be authorized to pay at least $1 a bushel at the farmer's home town for the farmer's wheat and to the farmer. If that bill had gone into effect just as I introduced it there would have been no marketable wheat sold west of the Mississippi or anywhere else in this country for less than $1 a bushel and it would have gone, probably, to fully $1.10. I think that every man who is familiar with that bill and the facts will so concede. No wheat west of the Mississippi ever sold the last year even for the minimum of what my bill provided.

The committee was afraid that $1 a bushel would not be enough to please the farmer and amended it by making it $1.50, which at once, of course, made it impossible of passage. If that bill had become a law the 780,000,000 bushels of wheat we raised would have averaged 20 cents a bushel more than it has been sold for. If my bill had been made a law the wheat farmers of this country would have enjoyed an income of $150,000,000 more for their wheat this year than they are now receiving and all the great West and Northwest would have been in prosperous condition. If my bill becomes a law the Government will be prepared by a $30,000,000 appropriation and other available resources to buy wheat from the farmer at his home town all over the country at $1.10 a bushel, and to keep up with competition, at $1.25. If the Government announces that it will pay $1.10 for wheat no farmer will sell his wheat for a penny less.

When the farmer demands that for his wheat every miller and every grain buyer will necessarily meet the Federal competition and pay that price for wheat. As long as there is an American market for wheat that will continue. The buyers buy all the wheat every year, and they would any year whether the Government bought any or not, and they would pay that price because they must meet the Government competition. On the front page of these bills that I am handing around you will find the statement that every bushel always sells, all over the world, and that was always so and always will be so. There is not any question about there being an ample market always.

If in the course of the year it developed that the United States would not utilize all this wheat, as is probable, and the buyers decline to purchase any more because they did not need it for home consumption, the Government would take up the purchase of the export wheat and handle it abroad, as I shall explain to you.

If you and I were buying wheat at a certain point—we will stick to Abilene, Kans.—the Government of the United States says that it will pay $1.10, here is what would happen. We have got to have so much wheat for the millers, and we would buy each day whatever wheat we wanted. The Government buyer would not buy any as long as we were buying. At 4 o'clock you and I might quit; we have got all the wheat we want at $1.10, and if there was any more wheat then the Government buyer would be expected to buy it. He would buy each day, at $1.10 a bushel, if any, the surplus that they had at that particular place. The result of that would be that at the end of the year the Secretary of Agriculture would have gradually accumulated all the exportable wheat from all over the United States. They would have to export it month by month as they got it.

That is the thing the Government might and could do. This thought has occurred to me, that a great deal would depend upon the shrewdness of the Secretary. If we had as good a trader and as good an agricultural man as Mr. Haugen, with all his successful experience in farming and in business, our surplus wheat, as you gentlemen call it, would be taken care of abroad at a good price. I admit that the success of my proposition depends upon the keenness of the Secretary. All we need is a man who is as smart as John D. Rockefeller, or some one like him, to handle it. I don't know whether we could get him or not. There would never be any time or place that the Government would be compelled to purchase this wheat except when it became settled that we did not need it at all for home use. The exportable wheat would, as will be explained by me, all be handled by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Thirty years ago at Luxor, Egypt, Abdul Karim, a very successful farmer, told me about the wheat conditions in Egypt. Taxes all fall due in June, and every wheat farmer was compelled to sell his wheat at about 50 cents a bushel instead of $1, as it generally is sold at Cairo. Abdul Karim managed to get by without selling at a sacrifice, and when Christmas came he was able to sell his wheat at $1 a bushel instead of 50 cents, and maintained that system and became wealthy. This bill of mine will take every American farmer past the harvest crisis and put him on his feet face to face with the world. They learned those wheat tricks in Egypt in Joseph's time, for the wheat trade is the oldest international commerce, and these fellows at Liverpool and Chicago have inherited all the tricks that have encumbered it and grown up with it from the beginning of time. That is the backbone of this whole business. Every time we begin a harvesting season they tell us that the wheat isn't worth anything, that there is too much of it. If you put my bill through at the time the harvest begins, we will be right there with the money to put it down, and he will get $1.10 there, and there isn't going to be much four-fushing.

Mr. VOIGT. Do you care if I ask you a question there?

Mr. LITTLE. No, sir.

Mr. VOIGT. The theory of your bill is that the Government shall buy this wheat at not less than $1.10. Suppose the Government buys 100,000,000 bushels or more at that price; there would be some loss in the export, wouldn't there?

Mr. LITTLE. I do not think so. I am prepared to answer that a little later, if you will permit me to do so. I think I can make it clear. Last spring they were heralding abroad the announcement of a tremendous wheat crop, when we raised some 81,000,000 bushels less last summer than we did the summer before. The world wheat buyers have more tricks than the gypsy horse jockeys, and have inherited them from a time before the gypsies left their primeval homes in the Orient.

If in the course of the year it developed that the United States would not utilize all this wheat, as is probable, and the buyers declined to purchase it because they didn't need it for home consumption, the Government would export the wheat and handle it abroad, and I will explain why what you people call the surplus is not a surplus.

Mr. PURNELL. I have never been able to get fixed in my mind your theory upon which you make the statement that there is no such thing as a surplus of wheat.

Mr. LITTLE. I have convinced the Secretary of Agriculture and the Wall Street Journal and Mr. SYDNEY ANDERSON and a great many other people.

Mr. PURNELL. Then I suppose I might just as well give up.

Mr. LITTLE. I will come to that question.

Mr. KETCHAM. I think perhaps you had better spend a little time on that. You use the word "surplus" in connection with the world production of wheat instead of in connection with our own production?

Mr. LITTLE. There is in the world no surplus of wheat.

Mr. KETCHAM. You say there is no such thing as a surplus. Is there any surplus in the United States?

Mr. LITTLE. None at all. There is exportable wheat, but the wheat we sell in London is just as much sold as if we sold it in Cleveland.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am not arguing it. I simply make the statement.

Mr. LITTLE. I admit that there is an exportable amount of wheat, but the wheat that we sell abroad is not a surplus. We sell it every year. We have sold a billion and a half bushels since the war.

On July 1, 1922, we had on hand 78,000,000 bushels of wheat carried over from the crop grown in the summer of 1921. In the summer of 1922 we raised 856,000,000 bushels of wheat. This makes 934,000,000 bushels of wheat on hand after the threshing in 1922. Beginning July 1, 1922, and ending June 30, 1923, we imported 20,000,000 bushels. In other words, we had opportunity to dispose of 954,000,000 bushels of wheat during the year beginning July 1, 1922, and ending June 30, 1923. At the end of that year, on July 1, 1923, we had on hand 101,000,000 bushels carried over into the next year.

Mr. ASWELL. I thought you said awhile ago that all the wheat there is is always sold.

Mr. LITTLE. They always dispose of it.

Mr. ASWELL. Where was that 101,000,000 bushels?

Mr. LITTLE. It was carried over.

Mr. ASWELL. Had that been sold?

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, yes. The farmer had 35,000,000 bushels on July 1, 1923.

Mr. ASWELL. He hadn't sold it?

Mr. LITTLE. He hadn't let it go, because he didn't want to. He just wanted to speculate a little.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Do you know what the average carry over is for a series of years?

Mr. LITTLE. It has been up as high as 163,000,000 bushels and down to 58,000,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It ranges between 58,000,000 and 160,000,000?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; 163,000,000. It gets a little bigger every year—gradually, I rather think. As I say, we had on hand 101,000,000 bushels carried over into the next year. During the year beginning July 1, 1922, and ending June 30, 1923, we disposed of 853,000,000 bushels of wheat. Of this we exported 222,000,000 bushels—

Mr. SINCLAIR. We did not dispose of all of it. We had 101,000,000 left. You only disposed of 700,000,000?

Mr. LITTLE. No; we had 934,000,000 and we kept 101,000,000, because the speculators and farmers wanted to keep it. We disposed of 853,000,000. Of this we exported 222,000,000 bushels, which leaves us 631,000,000 bushels of wheat utilized at home for food, stock feed, and seed.

Mr. PURNELL. The farmer carried 35,000,000 of that himself. Who carried the other?

Mr. LITTLE. The big millers, the terminal elevators, and elevators. The big mills have got to hold over a certain amount of wheat to make good flour. The June wheat is too fresh and soft. Every big elevator has a stock every year, which is a carry over. The world needs it for famines, droughts, and other emergencies. We don't have to take care of that because that carry over goes on all the time; it keeps right on, and it will go on forever. Have I made myself clear on that, Mr. Purnell?

Mr. PURNELL. I think I understand your position.

Mr. ASWELL. All of the bills pending before this committee speak of a surplus.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are not in harmony with the others, then?

Mr. LITTLE. I do not like to speak about that surplus business. I am trying to be polite. You will see that the United States during that year disposed of all the wheat raised, carried over, and imported, and had no wheat left on July 1, 1923, except a very ordinary carry over, only 35,000,000 bushels of which was in the barns and bins. The farmer could have sold that without any trouble at all, but preferred to carry it over.

Let me say here that I prepared, at the request of the Review of Reviews, in December, an article covering all these figures. A gentleman told me the other day that my figures in that article had been challenged. He said there was an associate editor of that paper here who said that he had gotten a thousand kicks on my figures. I wrote to the editor in chief, and let me tell you what he said. He said, "I have yours of February 26. There is no such office as that of associate editor on the Review of Reviews. No member of our editorial staff has recently been in Washington." (I am reading from his letter in my hand.)

Now, gentlemen, I would be glad if you would listen to this letter, because I place a good deal of importance on it. "I have been there once or twice myself, but I have said nothing about wheat statistics.

Any such letters that have come here criticizing the figures in your December article are neither numerous nor important." Then he goes on and speaks very nicely further. I just want to say to you gentlemen that the figures I present are from the Department of Agriculture, or as good a source. Nobody has ever challenged any figures that I have presented.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Little, we ship out of this country every year about 150,000,000 or 200,000,000 bushels more than we use, don't we?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. What do you call that surplus or excess supply of exportable wheat, or whatever it is—

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Voigt asked me that same question; and I think I have the answer here, if you will wait a moment.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. In other words, in the year from July 1, 1922, to June 30, 1923, the people of the United States entirely disposed of their wheat crop. The people of the United States and of the world every year dispose of all the wheat they raise. They always have done so and always will. The suggestion that there is a surplus in the world at any time is pure imagination, without any foundation whatever. The hue and cry is raised by the grain exchanges of Liverpool, London, Chicago, and other places for the purpose of bluffing the farmer into selling his wheat at a small price. As long as legislators allow themselves to thus be fooled by such fakes we can never get practical, beneficial results.

Mr. PURNELL. Do you agree with the position taken by many—in fact, I think it is the general belief—that this exportable surplus of 200,000,000 controls very materially, in fact, determines the price we get for the other 750,000,000 or 800,000,000?

Mr. LITTLE. To some extent that is true, and I am just going to approach that matter. During the year from July 1, 1922, to June 30, 1923, we exported 222,000,000 bushels of wheat. It makes no difference to a farmer whether they sell his wheat in Liverpool or Cleveland. In either event he has none left. But we have heretofore confused the export wheat with the alleged surplus.

Mr. PURNELL. It makes no difference where he sells it, but it does make a great difference to him if the part of the wheat that is sold abroad fixes the price here.

Mr. LITTLE. I am coming to that. It is true that we must take into consideration the wheat that we export when we consider our sales and prices, but before we do so let us remember that the export is just as sure a sale as any other. It goes on all the time and always will. In order to reach a satisfactory conclusion we must figure on the amount of wheat we export and the price it brings, because without doubt the export price of our wheat does to some extent determine the home price of our wheat.

Mr. ASWELL. If you fix the price at $1.10, would you get that much for that which you exported?

Mr. LITTLE. I think I will answer that in a moment. The world's annual average crop of wheat during the years 1910-1915 was 3,855,600,000 bushels. The Wall Street Journal only claims that the world's total crop for the season of 1923 was 3,343,000,000. The crop we are now consuming is 500,000,000 bushels less than the average crop during the six normal years before the war. In order to induce an American farmer to sell his wheat for less than it cost him, the grain exchanges of London, Liverpool, and Chicago have told us over and over that the present supply has produced a tremendous surplus of wheat. Instead of there being a big surplus crop, as they have been telling us, we are 500,000,000 bushels of wheat behind the average world crop in the years before the war. We had one year of 4,250,000,000 bushels, and another year we had 4,100,000,000, and if it wasn't for the war this world would be now producing annually 4,000,000,000 bushels of wheat or more. We are 500,000,000 or more behind.

Mr. CLARKE. Do I understand that the market for wheat the world over is 400,000,000 bushels greater than the amount produced?

Mr. LITTLE. No. What I said was this: The average wheat crop before the war was 500,000,000 bushels of wheat more than the crop of this year.

Mr. ASWELL. We sold it all then?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; we got rid of it.

Mr. PURNELL. Of course, you must take into consideration the fact that the world is not able or in a position to buy now what it was able to buy then.

Mr. LITTLE. That is a very great mistake. During the year beginning July 1, 1918, immediately after the war, we exported 287,000,000 bushels; from July 1, 1919, 220,000,000 bushels; from July 1, 1920, 386,000,000 bushels; from July 1, 1921, 279,000,000 bushels; and beginning July 1, 1922, 222,000,000 bushels.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Do you know anything about the price of that wheat?

Mr. LITTLE. It isn't a question of price, but they will buy the wheat and eat it.

Mr. SINCLAIR. They paid at least a dollar more a bushel in 1918 than they are paying for what we export now.

Mr. LITTLE. Beginning July 1, 1923, up to February 15, we exported 112,000,000 bushels of wheat without including the flour for the last two weeks. At this rate, by the conclusion of this present wheat year we will have shipped abroad 193,000,000 bushels of wheat if the present rate continues. I say that that is the greatest and most remarkable wheat market the world ever saw. Never at any time did this country ever sell so much wheat, but yet Mr. PURNELL asks me if I think they still use the wheat.

Mr. PURNELL. I know they will eat it if they can get it. My question is, Are they able to pay for it?

Mr. LITTLE. I guess we don't ship it abroad for nothing. There never was a bigger lie than the statements in the papers that the European people can not pay for wheat. I have shown right here that they have paid for it, since the war, to the extent of a billion and a half bushels, and they never did that before. It was many millions less in the preceding years. The European market for wheat during the six years since the war terminated is by far the greatest market for wheat the world ever saw. In order to keep our wheat prices down and to lead the Government to purchase the speculators' wheat at fancy prices and shipped without expense to him, we are told that the Europeans are starving, that they can not buy wheat, and that our European market is wrecked.

I don't want to characterize things, yet with regard to these wheat speculators there never was a more nefarious attempt to force the Government to purchase the wheat from these wheat speculators that they had on hand and did not know what to do with and to send it to the starving Europeans. They bought a billion and a half, and they paid for it, too.

On November 22 last, Secretary Wallace wrote me, "of course, every bushel of wheat can be sold at some price." On November 26, 1923, SYDNEY ANDERSON, chairman of the Joint Commission of Agriculture Inquiry, wrote me, "Our own surplus, in my judgment, is very small; and, indeed, I do not think we have any surplus of good milling wheat." On November 29, 1923, Mr. ANDERSON said, "The American farmer can sell every bushel of wheat he produces this year or any other year."

On December 14, 1923, the Wall Street Journal wrote me, "The Wall Street Journal has never said that the farmer will not be able to sell all his wheat. He always has been and always will be able to dispose of his wheat." Of course these gentlemen continue to say that he will not be able to sell it at a sufficiently high price. Well, that depends on who is the better trader, the buyer or the seller.

There is another universally admitted incorrect assertion that we can not meet foreign competition. In order to substantiate the incorrectness of that assumption, and the lack of any serious danger, I want to call your attention to some figures furnished by the Department of Agriculture and the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome. These figures give the value of wheat at different foreign ports on certain dates, and the cost of transportation as compared with that here in America.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that table may be inserted in the record.

Cost price at Liverpool of wheat from New York, Buenos Aires, and India.

Seaport	Price	Ocean freight	Cost at Liverpool
August, 1922:
Karachi, India.....	$1.27	$0.108	$1.378
Buenos Aires.....	1.23	.132	1.362
New York.....	1.295	.064	1.349
1913 average:
Karachi, India.....	.91	.12	.03
Buenos Aires.....	.100	1.08	1.108
New York.....	.97½	.06	1.03½
July, 1923:
Karachi, India.....	1.08	.168	.248
Buenos Aires.....	1.10	.132	1.232
New York.....	1.22	.042	1.262
August, 1923:
Karachi, India.....	.96	.15	1.11
Buenos Aires.....	1.01	.12	1.13
New York.....	1.11½	.042	1.157

Mr. PURNELL. According to that table, wheat sold in this country in 1923 at $1.11. That was the New York price.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; $1.11½.

Mr. CLAGUE. In 1923, in August, you say the price at New York was $1.11?

Mr. LITTLE. $1.11½.

Mr. CLAGUE. Suppose your bill was in effect, and it was $1.25 at Minneapolis. The freight to get it from Minneapolis to New York is 15 cents a bushel, a charge of 4½ cents to get it across, and under your bill they would have had to have $1.44. Now, how could they have sold that wheat in Liverpool at $1.44 when they could buy all they wanted at $1.11 or $1.13?

Mr. LITTLE. They could not; but it wasn't that way. I am just taking the world the way it is made year in and year out. Under every bill but mine you all concede you will lose money on every shipment. Suppose the Haugen bill or Sinclair bill were in effect, and you shipped $1.50 wheat from Minneapolis to Liverpool for 19½ cents, your wheat in Liverpool would cost $1.69½. Suppose you had to meet their Argentinian competition of wheat that is laid down for $1.11. They would undersell you 58½ cents a bushel, and in a year you would lose nearly $120,000,000. So what difference would it make, as compared to my bill, when you might occasionally get a small loss which the Government would bear, while every shipment under the other bill gives a loss which the farmer himself must pay.

Mr. CLAGUE. How could they have done it the year before?

Mr. LITTLE. I think I can meet that point, and it is a very pertinent question.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It is the whole problem.

Mr. LITTLE. It is the whole problem for the gentleman's bill, which takes a loss on every shipment, which loss must be paid by the farmer, while it is practically certain under H. R. 8330 that year in and year out the Secretary would make money for the department by his export trade. Just now I am undertaking to prove to you that we are in excellent shape to compete in Liverpool. I know what you mean, and you are right, but what I am now showing you is that year in and year out we have been competing on even terms and sometimes underselling them. On November 27, 1923, the Department of Agriculture issued a statement, which was reprinted in the Kansas City Times, with regard to freight rates to Liverpool. Examining that, we find that the freight rate from McPherson, Kans., to Galveston, Tex., was 27 cents a bushel, and the rate from Galveston to Liverpool was 8.6 cents, making a total from McPherson to Liverpool of 35.6 cents per bushel. However, the rate from Larimore, N. Dak., to New York was 22.6 cents, and from New York to Liverpool 4.8 cents, a total of 27.4 cents from Larimore, N. Dak., to Liverpool.

These figures are deduced from those given by the Secretary of Agriculture. He says:

"ARGENTINA WHEAT RATES—SHORT HAUL TO SEAPORTS SAVE TRANSPORTATION COSTS—OCEAN FREIGHTS TO LIVERPOOL ARE HIGHER AND RAIL RATE PER MILE IS MORE THAN IN THE UNITED STATES.

"Washington, November 26.—The ocean freight rate on wheat from Rosario, Argentina, to Liverpool, in the period from January 1 to September 30, this year, averaged 14.7 cents a bushel, while in the same period the average rate from New York to Liverpool was 4.8 cents a bushel, and from New Orleans, 8.6 cents a bushel." His figures show that it costs 18 cents to reach the seacoast from the Argentina wheat fields, which, added to the ocean rate of 14.7 cents, makes 32.7 cents a bushel from the wheat fields of Argentina to Liverpool, while the total from Larimore, N. Dak., to Liverpool was 27.4 cents, 5.3 cents a bushel less than the Argentina rate. In other words, the wheat fields of Larimore, N. Dak., can ship wheat to Liverpool 5.3 cents a bushel cheaper than Rosario, Argentina, or could last year when the Secretary of Agriculture figured it.

In other words, we can deliver wheat to Liverpool and beat Buenos Aires and Argentina on equal terms, and the Indian wheat, whose export is comparatively very small, anyway, can generally outsell us a little at Liverpool, though it is a different kind of wheat. In other words, this story about cheap wheat from cheap lands and cheap people is just a greatly exaggerated bugaboo that has been worked to death. Our wheat can compete in Europe all the time with any wheat exported to Europe from anywhere. You will notice that we have undersold the Buenos Aires wheat 7½ cents a bushel, but we could have run them off the market—

Mr. CLAGUE. That is, for low-priced wheat?

Mr. LITTLE. That is for the best wheat.

Mr. CLAGUE. I do not mean poor wheat, but I mean low-priced wheat.

Mr. LITTLE. I think I will cover that point in a moment. You will see, gentlemen, that when the Department of Agriculture takes over the export business of this country it will have no difficulty in the world in competing in the Liverpool market, and it never at any time can be swamped by other supplies.

I call your attention to the fact that in Brazil the Government has been handling the coffee crop for nearly 20 years with wonderful success. The Government controls the export trade of the country, because they levy an export tax on all coffee that private individuals export. The Government, then, is able to buy coffee according to its own estimate of world conditions, and is able to go to the European market and decide the price at which coffee can be sold.

As you have seen, we export about 200,000,000 bushels of wheat annually.

The sale of that wheat in Liverpool or elsewhere will be controlled largely by the Secretary of Agriculture in Washington. He can meet any competition.

Mr. ASWELL. That is true only as long as the price of wheat stays down as low as it is. That means we have got to keep wheat down to compete with the world price.

Mr. LITTLE. If my bill passes the price of wheat in this country will be decided by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ASWELL. But how can he compete?

Mr. LITTLE. He can meet any competition. He can, if he wishes, undersell any foreign competitor.

Mr. ASWELL. That means the price is low here.

Mr. LITTLE. No; under my bill the farmer would get at least $1.10 a bushel for all his wheat and the Government would lose nothing on home consumed wheat. The department might have to take a loss sometimes on wheat exported, but that would not touch the farmer. The other bills that have been offered admit a loss of $75,000,000 annually, anyway, which will always be borne by the farmer. Under my bill there will be no loss possible except on exports, which will be borne by the department, of course.

The Secretary can, if he wishes to, undersell any foreign competitor. If he wishes to drive Argentina out of the Liverpool market he can do so any week he desires. He will handle the American export wheat crop. No American exporter will contend with him. He will name the price in Liverpool on American wheat. Suppose for six months we did not ship any wheat to Liverpool at all? The world would be starving to death. The rest of the world can not meet it.

Mr. CLARKE. You say as far as the United States is concerned he would have no competition in the Liverpool market. But what about Canada?

Mr. LITTLE. I have figures on that. He can sell his wheat at any port where people eat flour. He can have his wheat manufactured into flour and exported as flour whenever he sees fit. If H. R. 8330 becomes a law, gentlemen, the wheat prices of the world would be made in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture in Washington. I want to leave that thought with you. It is an assertion, an estimate, but he sits here in Washington and controls every bushel we export and he can undersell them when he is willing to lose a little money. We are losing money all the time; we are not getting the money in the foreign market that we ought to get, and we are not getting what we would like to have, and that interferes with the home market, as you have all suggested. You see by this time, of course, that it would not interfere with the home market at all under my bill. The only question remaining would be whether the department could gain or lose in Europe. My contention is that under these other methods you are simply going to take the loss and let the farmer pay it until your corporation goes into bankruptcy, as it will. At the worst I could not do any worse than that. I concede that there may be times when the Government will be up against it, but I have shown that we could meet them on equal terms at Liverpool, except in a few bad years, and those bad years will come anyway. Suppose, Mr. CLARKE, that you were Secretary of Agriculture, and suppose you had 200,000,000 bushels to export, and you would see that Argentina was going in, and you would say, "Let them go in," and lay off for 60 days. If you did that, the rest of the world could not feed Europe, but they would have to wait for us. When you stayed out for 30 days you would see the wheat going up and you would quit selling when they didn't buy it at the increased price. I contend that Joe Leiter is the only man in the world that ever did anything for the American farmer. He gambled in wheat and raised the price of it. That is one reason why I started this. I don't believe Joe Leiter knew any more about the business than I do, and I tackled it.

Mr. CLARKE. But Joe Leiter went bankrupt, didn't he?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but no American farmers went into bankruptcy while he was raising the price. I don't care anything about Joe Leiter.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If it went on long enough probably the Federal Government might go into bankruptcy.

Mr. LITTLE. There isn't a chance on earth of that; no. The Government can withdraw from the business any year they see fit. These other plans evidence that they expect to buy wheat and export it and lose money. They estimate that they will lose $75,000,000 a year. They explicitly state that they do not expect to have anything to do with the price of wheat in Europe. Gentlemen, what is the use of playing around the edges of this proposition? Let us put the American Department of Agriculture in such shape that it can have more to say about Liverpool prices than anybody else, which it could under this bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Have you ever consulted the present Secretary of Agriculture about that bill?

Mr. LITTLE. I should say so.

Mr. KINCHELOE. What does he have to say about your bill?

Mr. LITTLE. He didn't find any fault in it, and I haven't heard from him since.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am sure he did not express himself to any extent here the other day, and I was wondering whether he had talked to you.

Mr. LITTLE. Last year he told me that he could see no flaw in it and no reason why it should not succeed, but declined to give a final opinion on short notice. I have had a great deal of correspondence with him, and, if he wishes it, I will print it.

Under this bill the department is not required to buy wheat. If it were, it could be urged that we would raise the price of wheat and greatly increase the production. This bill is so drawn that, whenever the people of the United States should undertake to plant speculative crops on the theory that the Government would protect them, the department could simply decline to buy or decline to pay the price anticipated.

Last year the Government informed the cooperative-marketing people that they could borrow money to carry on their business in an orderly way, but if they undertook to borrow money and hold their crops for speculative advances they would not get the money. This bill presents the same situation.

The Secretary is authorized to buy their wheat at such prices as he sees fit within certain limits. He is not ordered to do so, and it would ruin the whole proposition if he were so ordered. I undertake to say that no proposition that undertakes to fix a high price for wheat and meet it and guarantee it can by any possibility be a success. The value of this proposition lies in the fact that it simply makes the Secretary of Agriculture powerful enough to do what he sees fit. Beyond that I do not undertake to go.

I can not guarantee that the Secretary of Agriculture will handle this business always correctly. He is governed by the same limitations as other men meet; but if this bill becomes a law, a level-headed Secretary of Agriculture will always be in position where the American farmer can be assured of not losing money on his wheat. I do not believe anybody can go further than that with such, though if a very good business man were Secretary he could undoubtedly go far to assure our people of reasonable profits.

Now, I have a little table here of figures secured from the Department of Commerce on exports of wheat and wheat flour in millions of bushels, which I would like to place in the record:

Exports of wheat and wheat flour, in millions of bushels.

If you undertake to pass a bill to pay a man a lot of money, he will plant more wheat; and you will be up against it worse than ever.

Mr. ASWELL. Won't he do it under your bill?

Mr. LITTLE. No. What I undertake to do is to give him a normal cost so he won't lose any money. Then he will have to take care of himself. I do not believe any bill that you undertake to pass will amount to a row of pins if it undertakes to give him a fancy price for his wheat. In the first place, the wheat eaters won't vote for it, and, in the second place, it won't work.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will this price give him the average cost of production?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SINCLAIR. You think it will?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; I do.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The testimony seems to be against that.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, the Secretary of Agriculture asked 4,000 men about that and got an average of 94 cents for production, not counting the land value. That was the figure, wasn't it?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Yes; but the land value and taxes are a very material part of the cost.

Mr. LITTLE. Somebody could tell us what that average was. I think about $1.20.

Mr. JOHNSON. He now figures that it ought to be worth about $1.58.

Mr. LITTLE. It ought to be, but it is not, and it isn't ever going up there except now and then. It would be too expensive for the world to use generally.

Now, I think the table I put in is an answer to the Canadian wheat question. I realize that this proposition will be enfolded and environed by many difficulties, but it can be handled with practical business men, and all I am asking you is that you give it careful consideration. I am as anxious as any man here to do something for the farmer. I am the seventeenth in direct descent from farmers who lived on their own farms. In 1406, 517 years ago, Simon Little bought a farm in Scotland, and I can tell you the farms that my people have owned and lived on ever since down to me. There is no man here that has more sentimental interest or more practical interest. I began my life sowing wheat and the grasshoppers came along and ate it as it came up, and I said to my dad:

"This wheat business is just a gamble, and I am going to town and go to work."

That is the reason I am here.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Little, I have a great deal of confidence in your judgment about wheat. I think you have studied this legislation probably as much as any man in Congress. I think you have studied all the bills before us here, and if you do not mind I would like to have your opinion of the two bills, the McNary-Haugen bill and the Sinclair bill, now pending before this committee.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not think you are quite fair to me. Here is a committee, most of whom have made up their minds.

Mr. ASWELL. But he has already intimated how he stands, Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to remind you that we have a Constitution; and if you pass a bill that won't stand up under it, it won't do any good. You had better hire a lawyer. I don't mean that unkindly at all, because the probability is if you put a bill out I would probably vote for it. I am in favor of doing something for the farmer, and if we get off on the wrong foot and go too far, I shall be very sorry. If you don't want to do something reasonable for the farmer, you can expect it isn't going to be long before he will do something unreasonable.

Mr. KINCHELOE. What is the difference in principle between your bill and the Sinclair bill?

Mr. LITTLE. Now, gentlemen, I think very highly of the authors of the Sinclair-Norris bill and of the Haugen bill, but if you want to start a socialistic government I do not believe you could find any better way in the world to do it easier than under the Sinclair bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR. There is no difference between your measure and the Sinclair bill. The Sinclair bill simply puts a commission in charge of the exportable surplus.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR. And the Haugen bill sets up the same kind of a proposition.

Mr. LITTLE. My bill doesn't put the Government into the wheat business. If my bill is right in theory, the Government won't buy much, if any, wheat. Under your bill it has got to buy.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Under your bill who would stand the loss?

Mr. LITTLE. The Government would lose it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is the same thing as in the Sinclair bill, and that is the reason why I asked you what the difference was in principle.

Mr. LITTLE. My theory, which I enunciated before you came in, Mr. KINCHELOE, is that when the Government announces that it is going to give a dollar a bushel for the wheat, that the farmer won't sell for any less, and the wheat buyers competing with the Government will have to pay that price. The result of that will be, I think, that the Government will not have to buy much at all, except the export wheat.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How would you take care of the export? Who would buy that?

Mr. LITTLE. Sell it abroad. I called attention to that. I said if they started under my plan the home buyers would buy wheat until they got all the country would use, and when they got all the country would use then the Government would have to buy it, buy what you people call the surplus. It would, in a sense, become a surplus. I do not use the term "surplus," because that is the term with which they have beaten us out of our money.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The exportable surplus proposition is the whole problem that we are trying to solve.

Mr. LITTLE. Under my plan if wheat was sold at $1.10 it would go up, wouldn't it?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. And it would stay up until you got to that so-called surplus.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Until the domestic consumption was satisfied.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; if they had followed my theory last year they would have made $150,000,000 more, Mr. SINCLAIR.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I believe so if the price had been 10 or 15 cents higher.

Mr. LITTLE. They would have. I was perhaps weak beyond that point. I neglected to figure out what would happen. But I think, Mr. KINCHELOE, when I raise the proposition that the Government shall handle all of the export that it answers your question, don't you think so? If my bill had been in effect at $1 to $1.10, the farmers would have received $150,000,000 more. If this one becomes a law, it will add $200,000,000 to their income next year, and the export provision will bring us also a profit from Europe instead of a loss.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was trying to take it back to your proposition of fixing it at $1.10 on the domestic wheat, and if that was higher than the world price there would be an import of wheat into the country.

Mr. LITTLE. No; because of the tariff—

Mr. KINCHELOE. That drawback tariff is a miller's tariff, anyway.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the tariff?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Thirty cents.

Mr. LITTLE. They wouldn't bring in the wheat. We have only imported 19,000,000 bushels since last harvest, 8,000,000 from Canada only.

Mr. ASWELL. I am very keenly interested in all you have said, but I can not quite grasp the difference between your bill and the Sinclair bill. The loss will be sustained by the Government in the Sinclair bill if we export the wheat, and it seems to me it will be necessarily sustained by the Government under your bill. I do not see the difference.

Mr. LITTLE. You are right, in a sense, but the loss would be sustained by the Sinclair corporation, would it not?

Mr. ASWELL. You ask for $30,000,000 and he asks for $100,000,000. It is just a difference in amount.

Mr. LITTLE. Under his bill he has got to begin to buy the wheat, and under my bill we wouldn't buy it at all except for export.

Mr. ASWELL. You think it is simply a question of changing the word "authorize"?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Why won't that theory, created by the Government's statement that it was prepared to buy, work just as well under my bill and fix the price just the same as it would under your bill?

Mr. LITTLE. My idea about that is that under your bill it wouldn't have any such result.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It isn't contemplated that the corporation would buy all the wheat. It might have to buy but very little of it.

Mr. LITTLE. Pardon me; I didn't come here to get into a controversy.

Mr. SINCLAIR. No. I am just asking for information, Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. LITTLE. There is a good deal of information I haven't got. I have never studied the Sinclair bill as I have my own. I think I could give quite an extended review of the other bills after I had time to read them and study them. I do not think I am a very good witness as to just what would happen with that bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I can not understand that it makes any difference how the Government takes care of the surplus, whether it is taken care of by the Secretary of Agriculture or through a grain commission or corporation.

Mr. LITTLE. The biggest steal we ever had in the world was our shipbuilding corporation in this country, and, with all due respect to the authors of these bills, I think that is just what would happen.

Mr. CLARKE. There are others who think that about the grain corporation.

Mr. LITTLE. I think that putting this in a big corporation would be a wonderful mistake. Your bill would require a whole lot of high-salaried men and my bill would require but a few clerks. You suggest that they are in principle the same. Let me point out to you that the Sinclair bill calls for a big corporation and for a lot of money to be paid by the Government. There is no telling what would happen.

We have not yet thoroughly discussed the Canadian proposition. They claim that Canada is liable to invade us with cheap wheat. The figures of the Department of Commerce show that in the seven months after July 1 last we imported, in round numbers, 8,000,000 bushels of wheat from Canada and exported 16,000,000 bushels into Canada. Their competition does not amount to a row of pins in this country this year.

The figures of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome for August, 1923, show that at that time New York was landing wheat in Liverpool at $1.157. On that day No. 2 northern wheat in Liverpool was $1.15. At the same time No. 1 northern, a better wheat, was selling at Port Arthur at $1.10.

Mr. PURNELL. Of course that wheat which was landed in London at $1.11 was produced at a very decided loss in this country.

Mr. LITTLE. This legislation is not responsible for that. We are trying to meet that.

Mr. PURNELL. I understand, but I am not able as yet to get over the one big proposition in my mind, namely, that if, under your bill or any other bill, we shall increase the price in this country so as to give the farmers a reasonable return for their investment and a profit, I can not understand how, with that added cost, you can lay it down in Liverpool and hope to in any way compete with the Argentine and some of the other countries.

Mr. LITTLE. All I am undertaking to do is to show you that we can, always have been, and always will be, under the present conditions, able to meet foreign competition in Liverpool. Mr. PURNELL, I concede, of course, that if I am able to increase the home market for wheat to $1.10 or more we will have to get more than we are getting in Europe now in order to meet competition there or make a profit there. Many here will now admit that if my bill had become a law in the Sixty-seventh Congress the farmers would have received on the average 20 cents a bushel more for their wheat, a total of $150,000,000.

What I claim now is that if my plan for export by the Secretary of Agriculture is adopted he will not only get us a fair price in Europe but will practically be able to dominate the wheat markets of the world and decide their prices as the Brazilians control the coffee markets. My suggestion is that we adopt the Brazilian method of controlling exports, and the Secretary will have to go into the wheat markets of the world and control those markets as Brazil does the coffee markets.

Mr. ASWELL. You delivered wheat at $1.15 in Liverpool in August, and if your bill were in force, giving the $1.10 to the farmer, with your transportation, etc., the Government would have to pay that $1.10 and lose at least 50 cents a bushel.

Mr. LITTLE. We couldn't sell the wheat in Liverpool at what we get now.

Mr. ASWELL. They would lose at least 50 cents a bushel, and would lose $100,000,000 the first year.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, under present conditions; but they admit that they will lose $75,000,000 now or under any circumstances or under any plan they suggest. My answer to that is that we allow the Government to buy the export wheat and to handle it. If the Secretary controls all the export, he will be able to take care of that, and himself name the price of wheat in Liverpool. Instead of a scattering bunch of discordant, conflicting exporters we will be represented by the Secretary of Agriculture with all our wheat shipped across in American Government vessels.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Little, you have given a very interesting statement here, but there are a number of other people who desire to be heard.

Mr. LITTLE. I am almost through, Mr. Chairman. I think I have been very patient. I have not bothered this committee for weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but you have exceeded the time asked for. We want to give you all the time you want, of course.

Mr. LITTLE. I will be through in a few moments. On March 4 the Department of Agriculture informed me that the average price for No. 1 northern wheat at Port Arthur in August, 1923, was $1.10. Added to this, 20 cents for freight from Port Arthur to Liverpool, Winnipeg laid down No. 1 northern wheat in Liverpool at $1.30. At the same time New York was landing No. 2 winter wheat at Liverpool at a cost of $1.157. Winnipeg was not making real healthy competition in Liverpool for New York City.

Mr. ASWELL. That is just the point I can not grasp. You succeeded in the Liverpool market because of the prices the growers in this country were getting for their surplus wheat—

Mr. LITTLE (interposing). The prices they always have been getting and always will get if you don't legislate for them.

Mr. ASWELL. I don't know about that.

Mr. LITTLE. I don't know, either; but we will have to do the best we can. The people who are scared to death of Canadian wheat in Liverpool are laboring under a hallucination. They see the northern lights and think it is Canadian wheat headed for Liverpool. That is the stuff dreams are made of.

The United States and Canada combined raised 14,000,000 bushels less last year than they did the year before. The "vast wheat territory" they talk about in Canada is mostly peopled by the Rocky Mountains and glaciers and bounded by the North Pole. There never will be for any long period serious or dangerous competition from that country. Last fall Governor Leedy wrote me, "We have all the wheat we claimed, 467,000,000 bushels," and he says, "Half of it is unthreshed and mostly in the shock; if the snow does not fall by November, we will be in fair shape."

If you observe the above figures, you will see that for those five years, approximately, those five countries exported 3,528,000,000 bushels, and that of this the United States exported 1,374,000,000. In other words, of the world's exports the United States exported about two-fifths last year. Years before a much larger proportion. You have already noted that in ocean freight rates the United States has a very great advantage. You have noticed that the United States gets to the seacoast at more reasonable rates than other countries, so far as we have the figures. You see, therefore, that we are in excellent condition to meet anybody and fight it out at Liverpool. Let us suppose, for example, that for the first two-fifths of the year the United States exported no wheat. The world would be short two-fifths of its eating supply for that time and wheat, of course, would greatly increase in price. The United States would then be in a position to go into a high market and sell its wheat and receive the high prices. In other words, the Secretary of Agriculture could control the Liverpool market at any time he saw fit. The Secretary, in full control of all our exports, could readily make a combination with the bulk of the Canadian exporters, for example, and they could work together to fix the price at Liverpool, or they could combine with the Argentinian exporters. The pleasant dreams of a big wheat pool and a combination of wheat growers could round out into practical common sense under the leadership of the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States of America.

This would especially be true because he would have absolute control of two-fifths of the world's wheat supply. Being a governmental proprietor and responsible only to his Government and not to some copartners, he could, if he saw fit, go in at any time and undersell the rest of the world and name the subsequent prices. He would, possibly, lose some money at that time, but it is now conceded by all rival propositions that they expect to lose many millions of dollars a year anyway and make no pretense that they could ever make a nickel by export business. If we have to take a loss the Department of Agriculture could take it and it would not go to the farmer. He would be receiving his home prices. This is the only plan offered which makes it possible for the American farmer to get the maximum price for wheat, whatever it may be. Every other plan devolves upon him, just as the present situation does, the loss, if any, due to the low prices in Liverpool and Europe.

Our manufacturers in New England found themselves unable to compete with European factories. The rest of us established a tariff bounty for the manufacturers at our expense. They found themselves able to compete with European labor on American soil by reason of our tariff bounty. We now ask that you reciprocate the bounty of a hundred years and enable the wheat farmers of America to have the same golden bounty that you have showered on the factory owners and workers. If you do not do so they will be forced out of business just as New England shoemakers would a hundred years ago but for the tariff. We can sit here patiently at the end of the world taking the worst of the battle, or we can thus assert ourselves and control the markets of the world and be sure that no American wheat farmer ever again sells his wheat for less than it cost him.

Mr. ASWELL. But those other bills include many other agricultural products. This touches only on wheat.

Mr. LITTLE. You will remember last year I told you that in my judgment wheat could easily be handled because the system was such that we could put it in the elevator, and we could do the same thing with cotton. But I don't know what to do with the hog. Do you? What can they do with hogs?

Mr. ASWELL. I don't know.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not think anybody who wrote that bill ever seriously intended buying hogs and cattle. Of course, if all the hog, cattle, wool, and cotton people will vote for the bill, it will go through. We can handle this wheat in the elevators. We do not have to build sheds for wheat anywhere we have elevators. The same is true with cotton, barley, and rice. I earnestly hope you may be able to find some way to get a reasonable price for hogs and cattle, but I can not. My proposition is very simple and practical and very inexpensive. If you had adopted it last summer several on this committee have confessed that the farmer would have been $150,000,000 better off.

I can tell you about wheat, and I believe that I am right.

I would like to arrange that Doctor Atkeson should be heard on this. He is and for years has been the national legislative representative of the National Grange. Can he come back to-morrow? He is perhaps the most conservative of all the national farm leaders.

The CHAIRMAN. We will have to give that consideration.

Doctor ATKESON. Mr. Chairman, may I state that I think Mr. LITTLE has said about all that I could possibly say in support of the bill, and if I may be excused, I would like to save my time and the time of the committee. I think Mr. LITTLE has completely exhausted the subject.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to have put into the record what Doctor Atkeson said last year. Will that be satisfactory, Doctor Atkeson?

Doctor ATKESON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DOCTOR ATKESON'S TESTIMONY BEFORE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, JANUARY 9, 1923.

On page 15, Doctor Atkeson, legislative representative of the National Grange in Washington, said:

"I have read all these bills, so far as I know, that have been introduced in both Houses of Congress. I have read Mr. LITTLE's bill both ways, and I am thoroughly convinced if we are going to try this experiment that it is the most defensible and less objectionable than any other bill.

"But if you fix the price of wheat—say you fix the price of wheat at $1.50; Mr. LITTLE's bill undertakes to stabilize it at $1—I say it is the most defensible and least objectionable of any of the measures, to my mind.

"Mr. KINCHLOE. Doctor, if I understand your position, which is personal, you are against all this legislation; but if the committee and Congress are determined to enact some of it, we should choose the one with the least evil in it, to wit, the Little bill.

"Doctor ATKESON. Yes; as an experiment.

"Doctor ATKESON. . . . That is one objection to Mr. LITTLE's bill, which tends to stabilize wheat at $1 a bushel.

"The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, is not the object of this bill to stabilize the price of wheat at $1 a bushel? I am referring to Colonel LITTLE's bill.

"Doctor ATKESON. As I have said two or three times, as an experiment I prefer that to any and all of the other measures.

"Doctor ATKESON. Undoubtedly it is not high enough to pay the present price of production.

"Mr. SINCLAIR. Then why should you be in favor of that?

"Doctor ATKESON. As an experiment, to see how it will work; to see what the effect will be. As I interpret the Little bill—I think it is a fair interpretation—to take care of the surplus and stabilize the price of wheat to at least $1 a bushel. The Secretary, at his option, might continue to buy it up to $1.10. That means a price of $1.10. If the Secretary did what he would do under the circumstances—that is, if he buys all the wheat that is offered up to $1.10—anybody else that wanted to get it would have to pay $1.11 or $1.12, or something more.

"Doctor ATKESON. No human being knows certainly what the effect would be or how well satisfied the consumers of farm products or the producers would be after an experiment of a year or two; the Little bill is the most defensible and less objectionable than any of the others."

At the conclusion of his evidence, page 133, Doctor Atkeson says:

"I have only attempted to call attention to one solution. If price fixing is the way out, why let's experiment with it. We can quit if it doesn't pay. I want to repeat that of all the bills I have read I am partial to Mr. LITTLE's bill."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as one born in old Kentucky, as a loyal American citizen, as a friend to the valiant sons of America who defended its honor during the World War, and as an ex-service man of that war, I rise to enter my voiced protest against the condition which confronts us in respect to the proposed legislation that goes to the country as a so-called adjusted compensation legislation.

Back in Kentucky I practice the profession of the law. And early in the game I learned that in the trial of a case either by court or jury it is better to rest your case upon the merits involved rather than be controlled by technical legal construction. In days gone by more rigid use of technicalities were invoked than in this modern age. But in the consideration of the bonus legislation which confronts us we find that the bill which the Ways and Means Committee of this House approved, upon which we vote next Tuesday, was not released and was not obtainable by the Members of this body until 12 o'clock noon to-day (Saturday). The bill sponsored by the committee aforesaid comes to us under suspension of the rules, without right of amendment and with debate limited to 40 minutes of time.

I had hoped to be able to be permitted to cast my vote for a bonus bill which carried an option whereby those who so desired might receive cash. In lieu of such cash option, the bill presented comes to us under a suspension of the rules, which prohibits amendments to the reported bill, and we view the spectacle of being forced to accept this bill or have no legislation upon the subject. With this alternative confronting us, I support the measure and, while I will support the measure, I do not impugn the motive of any ex-service man or any Member of Congress who in principle and good conscience opposes this pending legislation, or bonus legislation in general.

I have the honor to represent the ninth district of Kentucky, composed of 19 counties, aggregating 5,490 square miles in area, with a population exceeding 272,725. For approximately 167 miles its northern and eastern borders are washed by the waters of the Big Sandy and the mighty Ohio; its northern county reaches to within 30 miles of Cincinnati, Ohio. The world-renowned blue grass, which peeps its head through the famous soil of the western counties of the district, extends into the mountain regions of Kentucky an approximate distance of 100 miles. The southeastern county, as well as the southwestern county of the district, is only removed from Virginia, the Mother State, by two intervening counties. In many ways it is cosmopolitan in nature. Not in the sense of a commingling of foreign blood, for there is none of perceptible consequence flowing through the veins of my people; but it is a district of diversified nature in respect of the topography of the country, soil of the land, the means of livelihood of its people.

In the creation Kentuckians fondly believe that God favored their nativity. It has been scientifically demonstrated that in the soil of the blue grass there are food values derived therefrom producing energy, speed, and stamina in the horses bred and reared upon it—unsurpassed the world over. Undoubtedly God favored this spot in its creation; well could it be said that it was His playground. But, when He created the blue grass, and smoothed out the rolling, undulating levels upon its bosom, methinks He tired of the monotony of the plains, and in the execution of His divine plan He caused mighty explosions in the bowels of the earth and upheavals consequent therefrom, and thereby brought into existence the further evil dence of His mighty power, the mountains. It has always occurred to me that the mountain districts of the world received a special touch from the hands of the Omnipotent Creator, for, when He molded the hills and carved out the valleys, He made of the mountains a depository for His jewels and treasures in the form of minerals; and to further safeguard these valuables in the mountains of Kentucky He caused to be reared a people of strong, sturdy stock, with minds clear and visions unimpaired.

Now, with a district of such character, it would be strange indeed if its people did not respond to the call of country with the offering of its young manhood. More than 10,000 of her sons served their country in the World War and, although here and there in this large district an ex-service man gives voice to opposition to a bonus measure, I confidently assert that I speak for 98 per cent of the soldiery of my district in voicing these sentiments that the Nation give recognition for the service of these valiant sons.

The pending legislation is commonly known throughout the country as "a bonus bill." Some of its friends take issue with such designation, but I do not. The word "bonus" comes to us from the Latin, in which language its meaning is "good." It is a good bill. Taking the definition of the word, that it is something in addition to regular pay, it occurs to me that it is just that; it is the gift of the Nation; it is the token of the country; it is a symbol of appreciation of the wealthiest country in the world to its defenders.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that the ex-service men will agree with my colleague in calling this a bonus bill, because they asked the Congress for meat and this committee has given them a bone. Naturally it is bon-us.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Very good.

In their efforts to organize such veterans of the World War opposing the bonus bill, the moneyed interests of this country sent a man by the name of Brinkerhoff into Kentucky to effect an organization that is known as the Ex-Service Men's Antibus League. From his own lips I heard Mr. Brinkerhoff state that he was a broker of stocks and bonds in the city of New York; that his opposition to the bonus was of such nature that he was contributing his time to the effort to organize Kentucky's soldiery against this measure.

To this date, according to my information, he has been able to form one club of men looking toward the defeat of the bonus legislation. In this chapter there are men whom I have known from early boyhood; there are men of splendid character; men who are honest in their opinions upon this subject, and I do not impugn the motive of anyone who, in virtue of his conscientious scruples, opposes this bill, but I do wish to go upon record against the moneyed interests represented by this man Brinkerhoff and others of like nature in attempting to organize the soldiery of my district against this recognition of their services.

Dealing with the total amount to be expended under this act, the amount is inconsiderable as compared to the total amount of this country's vast wealth, which authoritative statistics estimate to be $350,000,000,000. The expenditure under this bill aggregates $2,000,000,000. Upon that basis it is fifty-seven one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the total wealth of America. From these figures it is easy to ascertain that it is of no particular moment in respect of its being a tremendous financial burden.

Viewing it from a practical viewpoint, it occurs to me that it is a question that should be settled. I heard no lamentations from the representatives of the moneyed marts of this country in accepting the retroactive provision in the revenue tax measure, which recently passed this House, by which the income-tax payers for 1923 of America received a "bonus" of approximately $250,000,000. It was not called a bonus in the bill, but it was as truly a bonus as that which will be granted unto the soldier heroes of America. This bonus to said income-tax payers of America came about in this wise: A surplus of $600,000,000 was found to exist in the Treasury, and it was realized that the administration had placed an improper and a too weighty burden upon the people of America in 1923 by way of income taxes, and it was deemed fit and proper to provide for a 25 per cent reduction in the income taxes for 1923. I protest not against such measure. I voted for the amendment and for the bill, to the end that the tax burden of our people would be alleviated. But, nevertheless, it was a bonus, a good thing, an allowance over that to which they would have been entitled under the then-existing law. The number of persons directly affected by this tax reduction is approximately the same number that will be directly affected by the passage of this measure.

To the contrary, and as a matter of fact, the business interests of America should favor it; it is a question that should be settled, to the end that the business affairs of the country will not be injured by the circumstances surrounding the situation. Among the more than 4,000,000 soldiers of the World War this question is a tender spot, not only affecting the soldiers but reaching out into many millions more among the families of soldiers. It has gotten to be a sore upon the body politic of America. Permitting it to remain in this condition, I assert that it would fester, to the detriment of the very interests that are now opposing the measure. I submit that as a business proposition it is better to get this question settled, and settled right, than to let the soldiers, their families and friends in this generation, and the children of the soldiers in the next generation, hold in their hearts canker against the business interests of our country.

Most everyone has a cure for the diseases that prey upon the body politic of our country. I do not essay to prescribe for the ills that seem to hold our country in its grip, but were I to attempt such a thing I would lay at the door of the turmoil, strife, lack of faith, instability, trembling conditions of our affairs the old homily: "Money is the root of all evil."

It causes men to forget obligations with which they have been imposed; it causes men to forget the duties of official trust; it causes men to lose their position in society and their honor and esteem among men; it is causing our great business men and institutions to forget the saviors of freedom in government—the ex-service men of the World War.

In the hurly-burly of our modern life our old globe is spinning so rapidly that man has eaten up the distance intervening between the rise of the sun in the bustling east and its setting in the golden west. Soon it will be an accomplished fact that in the morning time man will view the appearance of Old Sol stretching its radiant head above the waters of the Atlantic and, at the eventide, watch its golden glow disappear into the mighty vastness of the Pacific.

No wonder, in an age of such speed men forget their obligations to their fellow men; no wonder that the country, to a large degree, has forgotten the splendid service of its manhood in standing between the purpose of a war-mad Kaiser and its successful termination. But our country, to a large degree, has forgotten.

LEST WE FORGET.

I would ask you to go back with me to the early days of 1917 when the Kaiser of that militaristic country, calculating to a nicety that he could throttle the Allies with his iron fist before America could emerge from her condition of peace and appear upon the battle fields of Europe; calculating to a nicety, in my judgment, that there was no longer need of his haughty self to respect the rights of this country relative to the war zone limits then existing, flung defiance to the wind and gave notice that no longer would he consider the rights of neutrals.

LEST WE FORGET.

Recall to your mind the scene when our late lamented war President, Woodrow Wilson, appeared in this very Chamber and with breaking heart delivered the war message to our Congress. Recall to your mind the stirring scene in which a state of war was declared to exist between your country and the foes of democracy. With what deep feeling of solemnity did you cast your vote plunging your country into a just war!

LEST WE FORGET.

Bring back to your mind's eye the hurried preparedness for this world struggle; conjure up in your memory the scenes that obtained in the departure of your sons and neighbor's sons; bring back into your memory the tears and heartaches which were involved in the sacrifices of the womanhood of America.

LEST WE FORGET.

It is needless for me to ask those who experienced the home leaving to renew that picture. The kiss of my aged mother, coupled with her half-stifled cry of anguish as I turned away from her, and the cold, death-like lips of my sweetheart's kiss can never be erased from my memory. Others will recall farewells with the picture of a sweet, babbling baby prominent in the foreground. It is needless to remind the soldier of those days in the training camps, in the hospitals, where death stalked unseen and took as its victims 62,106 of America's noble sons; it is needless to remind the overseas veteran of the experiences that confronted him upon foreign soil, of the hardships of camp life and the privations necessarily endured; it is needless to remind him of the damnable weather, of the muck and mud of the trenches, the chill of the night, and the hell of battle.

Do you think that they can forget the fall of a comrade by their side writhing in pain or silent in the stillness of death; here the trunk of what was once a man; there the body of what was once a living being, possessed of the same desire to live and to love as is possessed by the moneyed interests of America now opposing the effort of a grateful country to pay her debt of honor.

LEST WE FORGET.

Time was when the ex-service man, offering his all, withstanding the onslaughts of the greatest military machine that history ever witnessed and breaking into disorder its famed storm-division troops was proclaimed the hero of the Nation, and now, in time of peace and security, the moneyed interests of the East object to the country giving evidence of its appreciation for the services of its soldiers in the time of the Nation's greatest peril.

In conclusion, I desire to reiterate that it has not been my purpose to impugn the motive of any ex-service man of the World War with whom I may differ in views upon this subject. I accord him the same right to his views upon this or any subject as I claim for myself.

I have stated the conclusions of my own mind, and I respectfully submit it to the conclusions of practically the unanimous soldiery of my district; and further, respectfully, submit that I give voice to the desire of my people that the Nation's gratitude should be expressed in some substantial form. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CRAMTON, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 6820) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE SO-CALLED GASOLINE BILL.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I obtained permission to extend my remarks on the gas tax bill a short time ago, and I desire to date them as of to-day, because I want to bring in some matters that have come up later on that bill. I ask unanimous consent to date it to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the remarks he referred to may be dated to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for permitting me to discuss the so-called gasoline tax bill. Apparently it is of local importance only, but when all facts connected with it are fully analyzed, it forms a vital issue of principle that affects every man, woman, and child in the United States.

INESTIMABLE VALUE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Were it not for the publicity afforded nationally by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it would be impossible to get certain facts before the people of the country.

There was a time when editors reserved only one portion of their newspaper—the editorial page—for disseminating their own views, and the columns of the other pages were devoted to news items, to chronicle what happened to their readers without bias or prejudice. But no part of any column of any page of any daily in any of the big cities now belongs to the readers, for in this modern day the editors of the big metropolitan newspapers leave out what they don't like and color all news items to suit their own views. When Members of Congress fight for things the editors don't want, or fight against things the editors do want, such editors are not content with roasting such Members in editorials, but they go further, and either make no mention whatever of the facts brought to light by such Members or else twist same into some ridiculous meaning neither intended nor warranted. Thus the facts are not given to the people.

The unpurchasable country press is the people's only salvation. This country press published in towns and in the smaller cities is uncontrolled by ulterior interests, and its policies are not for sale. Just as far as circumstances will permit, it gives the uncensored news to its readers. But the country press is handicapped, for the only means it has of obtaining news beyond its immediate locality is what is sent by the big metropolitan press and the news-reporting agencies, which unfortunately are controlled and influenced by the big newspapers. So in the Nation's Capital there exists but one true source of news, giving uncensored to the people the happenings of Congress and the respective views of its Members, and that is the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

WHY BIG NEWSPAPERS DO NOT LIKE IT.

Naturally, big newspapers do not like it. When they treat Members of Congress unfairly the RECORD reveals it. When the press twists or colors the facts the RECORD shows it. When the press forms a dislike for a Member and punishes him with the "silent treatment," which means never to mention his name unless in a derogatory way, no matter how closely connected he may be with important legislation before the House, the RECORD discloses such discrimination. When the press purposely misconstrues and misstates the position of a Member, the RECORD demonstrates such unfairness to the reading public. For about 40,000 copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are mailed from Washington by the Government Printing Office the next morning after each day's session to the remotest parts of the United States into every State of the Union. They are read by the people at home and by the fair, honest editors in the towns and smaller cities, who ultimately find out first-hand when they have been bunkoed with false news sent them by news-reporting agencies and the big papers. Thus concerning the happenings of Congress the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has become the monitor of the monopolistic press, tending to keep it in line when it would distort the facts. Naturally the press is restive under this restraint. It does not like to be kept in line. It does not like a news medium with a daily circulation of 40,000 copies which can not be controlled by the combined press interests. This is why the big press constantly pokes fun at the RECORD. This is why the big press tries to incite the country press to poke fun at the RECORD.

RECORD CONTAINS VALUABLE INFORMATION.

Valuable information on practically every subject imaginable is disseminated in the RECORD, and it is now being read closely by the people at home. Only a few days ago appeared an editorial in the daily paper of my home city, written by the distinguished editor, Mr. Frank Grimes, who, by the way, had four brave brothers who valiantly served our flag during the recent war, and who for several years himself has ably edited the Abilene Daily Reporter, a newspaper that would be an honor to Washington, wherein Editor Grimes said that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was well worth reading, and that all people who had access to it were now reading it closely, and to advantage.

WELL WORTH ITS COST.

No money spent by the Government is better spent, for otherwise there would be no uncensored record of what daily happens here. It is a protection to every Congressman. For sooner or later the people will eventually find it out when either the big press or the news-reporting agencies discriminate against any Member. And American people will not stand for anything but fair play. And the people can afford to pay for its cost, for some facts they are not able to get through any other source. And I am now forced to use the RECORD in order to get before the American people the real facts connected with the so-called gasoline tax bill, so that they may see just how vitally affected they are by it, for the big press, controlled by Washington influence, has failed to relate such facts.

CHRONOLOGICAL SITUATION.

When this Congress met, the District of Columbia had auto reciprocity with every State in the Nation except Maryland, and Maryland had auto reciprocity with all the States, but not with the District of Columbia. Each had to procure licenses from the other.

Under the present law in the District of Columbia automobiles have to pay a property tax of $1.20—the regular tax rate—per $100 on the valuation of the car, and a license-tag fee as follows: Three dollars for cars not over 24 horsepower; $5 for cars between 24 and 30 horsepower; and $10 for cars over 30 horsepower. Virginia, on one side of the District, has a much larger registration fee and a much larger property tax on automobiles, and in addition has a gasoline tax of 3 cents on the gallon. Maryland, on practically the other three sides of the District, has a much larger registration fee and a much larger property tax on automobiles than has the District, and in addition has a gasoline tax of 2 cents per gallon.

Maryland proposed to the District that if Congress would pass a law placing a tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline, which would abolish incentive for motorists to buy their gasoline in the District rather than in Maryland, that Maryland would then agree to auto reciprocity with the District.

And to meet such proposal of Maryland this so-called gasoline tax bill was designed; but when they framed it, instead of merely providing for a gasoline tax of 2 cents on the gallon, as demanded by Maryland, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia sought to abolish the present registration license fees and also sought to abolish all of the present property tax on motor vehicles, and framed the bill so that the only tax hereafter to be paid on motor vehicles from Rolls-Royce and Pierce-Arrow limousines on down should be the nominal sum of $1 on each car, and said commissioners sent such bill to the House District Committee, requesting that it be passed immediately, in order to obtain reciprocity with Maryland.

CLEARLY A TAX-DODGING SCHEME.

In my minority report filed against this bill I stated that instead of calling it "the gasoline tax bill" its proper appellation was "the commissioners' latest tax-dodging scheme." Their selfish plan would not have looked so crude if their existing taxes had been high. But, as a matter of fact, they were paying less than half what people both in Virginia and Maryland were paying. Under the present law a $15,000 new Rolls-Royce limousine here in the District has to pay a registration fee of only $10 and a property tax of only $1.20 on the $100, while in Maryland it has to pay a registration fee of 32 cents per horsepower and a property tax of $2.70 on the $100, and in addition a 2-cents-per-gallon tax on gasoline; and in Virginia, say in the city of Alexandria, it has to pay a State registration fee of 60 cents per horsepower and a State property tax of $1.50 on the $100, and also an additional municipal registration fee, and a municipal property tax, and then in addition pay a gasoline tax of 3 cents on the gallon. Thus the people, both of Maryland and Virginia, and everywhere else in the United States, are now paying over twice as much taxes on automobiles as are the people of the District of Columbia. Yet the Commissioners of the District of Columbia sought by their bill to permit a $15,000 Rolls-Royce limousine to escape all taxation except a nominal fee of a pitiful little $1 besides the gasoline tax, and to permit the owner of 500 valuable taxicabs, running on the streets day and night, to escape all taxation except to pay a pitiful little $1 on each car.

WHAT THE COMMISSIONERS HAD IN MIND.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia knew that under what was known as the outrageous half-and-half system that prevailed here until changed in 1921 to the 60-40 ratio the whole people of the United States through the general Treasury had paid half of all the general running expenses of the District of Columbia, including all improvements of the city, and are now permitting the nearly 500,000 citizens of Washington to pay a ridiculously low tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100, on both real and personal property, with a personal property exemption of $1,000 free from all taxation, and assessed at about half of the real valuation, and a tax on intangibles of only one-half of 1 per cent, and that since the change from the 50-50 system in 1921 the whole people from the Government's Treasury have been paying 40 per cent of all of such improvements and city expenses. And the commissioners knew that through the many department supply bills passed by Congress every year several million dollars more are spent on various local civic matters here in Washington for which Washington people would have to provide, but for which the Government has furnished the full 100 per cent. And the commissioners therefore reasoned among themselves about as follows: "We should worry! Why should we tax ourselves to raise money? Have not we the Government Treasury here in our midst, from which we have always gotten what we wanted?" And they saw a fine opportunity to lower the expenses of Washington people very materially, by getting Congress to abolish all property tax on their automobiles and reduce their registration fees down to a nominal $1 per car. They knew that the Government had already provided the necessary money to pave the hundreds of miles of streets and boulevards, the million-dollar bridges across the Potomac, the several bridges across the Anacostia River, the numerous city street bridges in Washington, including the fine tiger bridge on Sixteenth Street, and the "million-dollar bridge" on Connecticut Avenue, and the 100,000 street lights all over the District of Columbia, the traffic policing of such streets, and the street-cleaning, snow-removing, and rainfall disposition, and that each year the Government was continuing the appropriating of huge sums of public money out of the Treasury for repairs, upkeep, maintenance, and replacement. So why should not the commissioners make the effort to still further lower their taxes and pass the burden over on the waiting Government?

The commissioners knew that if any Congressman or Senator dared to object, they had the Washington Post, owned by Mr. Edward B. McLean, the Washington Herald, owned by Mr. William Randolph Hearst, the Washington Star, controlled by Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, the Washington Times, owned by Mr. William Randolph Hearst, and the Washington News, owned by the Scripps syndicate, besides the many other publications of local organizations in Washington, to center their combined attacks upon such obstreperous Congressman or Senator and punish him until he got himself back in line. They could give him "the once over" by publishing ridiculous news items about him. They could punish him by misconstruing his every act and word. They could attack him editorially. They could give him "the silent treatment" by making no reference to any work performed by him in committees or in Congress. They could so influence the press reporting agencies in the press gallery to punish him, and thus hamstring the recalcitrant Congressman in his home State and the counties of his district through the censored news items sent to his home papers. And they knew that they could make it very unpleasant for any Congressman who stood in the way of their plan. And these tax-dodging commissioners thought that they would be able to get away with it.

ACTION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE.

After due consideration, the House committee placed back into the bill the property tax the commissioners had left out. But through the continued insistence of the acting chairman, Mr. ZIEHLMAN, the committee by a compromise vote agreed upon an amendment that exempted all motor vehicles from the property tax up to a valuation of $1,000, and by a vote of 7 to 6 the amended bill was reported to the House for action. This would have given the people of the District of Columbia a personal-property exemption of $1,000 from taxation, and an additional exemption of another $1,000 on automobiles, with the balance of the personal and real property taxed at the rate of only $1.20 on the $100.

ACTION BY HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Upon consideration the House of Representatives, by practically a unanimous vote, turned down Acting Chairman ZIEHLMAN's proposal, and decided that the property tax on motor vehicles should remain. And in lieu of the $1 per car registration fee proposed by the commissioners, the House by a decisive vote provided that there should be a registration fee of 15 cents per horsepower on motor vehicles, in lieu of the $3, $5, and $10 fees now charged. And the bill was thus passed and sent to the Senate.

UPROAR BY WASHINGTON NEWSPAPERS AND PEOPLE.

That afternoon Mr. Hearst's Washington Times (February 12, 1924), at the top of the Washington page, in huge box-car letters, carried the startling headline

D. C. reciprocity gas bill is dead, and then in a subhead typed in letters over half an inch high said:

Personal levy in cause.

And as a reason for the bill becoming "dead" within just an hour after being passed by the House, the Times thus proclaimed:

The 2-cent gasoline tax bill, establishing automobile reciprocity between the District and Maryland, is virtually in the scrap heap, so far as its chances of passage at the present session of Congress are concerned.

The action of the House in enacting the bill with the personal-property tax included kills the measure in the Senate, according to those in touch with the situation. The Senate will never accept the bill in its present form.

But in the next column the Times disclosed the real secret in the following statement:

When the commissioners first sent the gas tax bill to Congress they proposed a 2-cent gas tax and a $1 registration or tag fee. They asked for the elimination of the personal-property tax on automobiles. . . .

But when the bill passed the House yesterday it was changed considerably. The 2-cent tax was retained, the personal-property tax continued, and an additional tax of 15 cents per horsepower included as a substitute for the $1 fee.

MAY CUT STREETS BUDGET.

The House bill also provides that all automobile taxes be used to maintain the highway system of Washington. This will undoubtedly at first meet with general approval. However, if this is done Congress will probably withdraw its annual 40 per cent appropriation and tell the District to raise all of the money it needs for streets through automobile taxation and without the help of Congress. Congress now pays about $600,000 as its part for street improvements, and it would probably cease this payment if the bill in its present form is approved.

And that same afternoon, February 12, 1924, following the passage of the bill by the House, the Washington Star predicted that the people of Washington would kill the bill, carrying the following in unusually large headlines:

FIGHT GAS TAX BILL IN SENATE AFTER PASSAGE BY HOUSE—MAY CUT TAX FEATURES.

It is almost certain that the committee will decline to accept the House bill and will report the measure in its original form, without the personal property tax included.

As to the amendment offered by Representative CRAMTON, of Michigan, specifying that money raised from automobiles be used for street improvements, fear was expressed at the District Building that it would lead the Appropriations Committee of Congress to eliminate the funds appropriated each year on the 60-40 basis for street work.

The current appropriation act carries a total of $1,448,300 for new paving and maintenance of existing streets. If Congress continued to make these regular allotments for streets on the 60-40 basis, and also made automobile taxes available for street work, the engineer department would have just twice as much money with which to give Washington good highways.

But if, as some city officials fear, the gas tax bill in its present form would merely lead to the elimination of street paving funds from the appropriation act, the District would be the loser, for the reason that the Federal Government would thus be relieved of the 40 per cent it now pays toward street improvements. For the current year the Federal Government's proportion of the $1,448,300 street appropriations is $579,320.

You will note that it was the fear that Congress would not continue to furnish the $600,000 each year for the repair of Washington streets, and also the fact that they were not relieved of the property tax and registration fees that caused the Washington commissioners to declare the bill "dead." And note that the Times tried to make it appear that the registration fee of 15 cents per horsepower was an "additional" tax, when it was not, but was in lieu of the present $3, $5, and $10 registration fees, and on small cars would not amount to more than the present law.

TIMES STARTED ITS ATTACK.

And in this same issue the Times made a dig under my belt simply because I had contended that the people here should pay a fair rate of taxation, just as all other people in the United States pay, and should not have their expenses paid by the Treasury. It said:

The flat $1 registration fee came under fire, and Congressman BLANTON, of Texas, leader of the fight to increase the tax burden upon the District motorists, proposed a fee of 32 cents per horsepower. Congressman J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, of Maryland, had this cut to the present rate of 15 cents.

BLANTON PLEADED.

As the last of these amendments was adopted, Congressman BLANTON took occasion to thank the House, stating:

"I now think I can vote for this bill; this is what we have been trying to do ever since it came in committee."

Now, what is there about this bill that is such a terrible nightmare to the Washington people, commissioners, and newspapers? Its registration fee of 15 cents per horsepower is very small. The people of Maryland, around three sides of the District, pay a registration fee of 32 cents per horsepower, which is more than double. The people of Virginia, on the other side of the District, pay a State registration fee of 60 cents per horsepower, which is four times as much as that provided in the bill passed by the House, and in addition the Virginia people living in cities pay a municipal registration fee.

What is there unreasonable about the property tax of $1.20 on the $100 left in the bill passed by the House that should cause the commissioners, people, and newspapers of the District to throw spasms? That is the present tax. There is no change. It is merely left as it is now. Is it high? Why, the people of Maryland are paying a property tax of $2.70 on the $100, or double the District property tax. The people of Virginia are paying a State property tax of $1.50 per $100 on the valuation of the car and, in addition, are paying a municipal property tax. And, as said before, the people of Maryland are paying a gasoline tax of 2 cents per gallon, and the people of Virginia are paying a gasoline tax of 3 cents on the gallon. Upon what meat have our favored people of Washington been feeding, that they should not be taxed as other people of the United States are taxed? They have been petted and pampered and provided for so long out of the Public Treasury that they are spoiled.

HEARST'S PERSONAL INTERESTS.

William Randolph Hearst owns the Washington Herald morning newspaper plant. He owns the Washington Times evening newspaper plant. If he can keep the tax rate in Washington at only $1.20 per $100 and have the Federal Treasury pay all of the balance of the local expenses when people in all other cities in the United States have to pay a total tax of at least $2.75 on the $100, and some as high as $6, $7, and even $8 on the $100, it, of course, means quite a lot of tax money saved for Mr. Hearst, and, in addition, he makes his two Washington newspapers extremely popular with the nearly 500,000 people of Washington, who want to pay just as little taxes as possible.

HAS HIS TEXAS PAPERS ATTACK ME.

So on February 13, 1924, one of Mr. Hearst's hirelings, Hugh Nugent Fitzgerald, who makes his pen write the kind of stuff he is told to put in his editorials, made a very unfair and wholly unwarranted personal attack on me in a double-column editorial in the Austin American criticizing my stand on this gasoline tax bill and bemoaning me personally. He headed the article "Texas Tom on Deck" and begun by saying:

Texas TOM BLANTON is raising hell again in the national halls of legislation—and throughout his misleading article, written specially in an attempt to belittle me, he continually refers to me as "Texas Tom." A number of Austin citizens have sent me copies of the attack, and assured me that even if Mr. Hearst and his "hireling" do advocate the ridiculous tax rate of $1.20 on the $100 here in Washington, with the Government paying the balance of expenses, that the people of Austin who are posted do not, and that because of just such uncalled-for attacks as the one Mr. Fitzgerald made on me, and the kind of yellow-journal stuff he fills the American with, that many Austin people are reading San Antonio, Dallas, and Houston papers to escape it.

And when not long ago an honest reporter, working for Mr. Hearst here in Washington, fairly reported an address made by me just as it occurred, it was handed back to him by one of Mr. Hearst's editors and he was told to rewrite it and to "jazz it up," and when it appeared in the paper it was so jazzed up that one who had been present would not have recognized it. And with the exception of the Washington Star, which is one of the best and fairest newspapers in the United States, all the other Washington papers almost daily misquote, misinterpret, misrepresent, and attack my position on all questions arising. This is the penalty I have paid for several years and am still paying for fighting here for a just rate of taxation in Washington. But I am willing to pay the penalty, and I am going to keep up the fight until there is a fair rate of taxation.

CONTINUED STRENUOUS EFFORT TO OMIT TAX.

The Washington Board of Trade and the various citizens' organizations of Washington are now making an organized fight against the bill to strike out the property tax and also the 15 cents per horsepower registration fee. There has hardly been an issue of any paper that has been free of propaganda against such taxes. In reporting the proceedings before the subcommittee of the Senate on this bill, the Times of February 23, 1924, said:

REPLIES TO BLANTON.

Answering heated statements by Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas, who appeared before to-day's subcommittee and urged inclusion of the property tax, that this city enjoys the lowest tax rate of any city in the United States, Chairman BALL reminded him that the District must not be criticized for this, inasmuch as Congress fixes the rate and is to blame.

Immediately after the subcommittee meeting the local representatives, headed by Edward F. Colladay, president of the Washington Board of Trade, held a closed conference in the Senate Office Building to thrash out the merits of the substitute or compromise gasoline tax bill submitted to them to-day by Chairman BALL.

Those who appeared as members of the District citizens' committee at to-day's subcommittee hearing follow:

Washington Automotive Association, Paul Lum, Stanley Horner, and W. D. Guy; American Automobile Association, M. O. Eldridge, George Offut, and A. M. Loomis; Washington Board of Trade, Edward F. Colladay, W. P. Rayner; Federation of Citizens' Associations, Charles Baker, W. S. Torbett; National Motorists' Association, Jesse Suter; Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, R. F. Andrews, Charles J. Columbus; truck interests, L. E. Smoot; and a representative of the Northeast Citizens' Association.

CLINGING TO THE GOVERNMENT TREASURY.

In passing this so-called gasoline tax bill the House of Representatives provided that all registration fees, gasoline tax, and property tax on automobiles in the District should constitute a special fund to repair and maintain the streets of Washington. But Washington people feared that it might be adequate to keep up the streets, and that they would not get the $600,000 per year from the Federal Government, which they have been enjoying so long, paid into their general funds. So in the Washington Star of February 24, 1924, Chairman Colladay, of the Board of Trade, thus expressed his fears:

Fear that the special fund would be the entering wedge for Congress to avoid contributing its share to the District was expressed by Edward F. Colladay, chairman of the special committee and its spokesman.

"This plan of yours," said Mr. Colladay, "is a new thing to me, and I don't feel qualified to give our final opinion on it until all members of the committee have been allowed to express their opinion in a conference of the committee. I will say that I view with alarm any attempt on the part of Congress to violate the fixed proportionate contribution principle which has been laid down for the fiscal relationship between the Federal Government and the District."

And on February 25, 1924, the Washington Star, on its front page, in large headlines, heralded the following:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LEADERS BACK ORIGINAL GAS TAX BILL IN CONGRESS—SPECIAL JOINT CIVIC COMMITTEE AGAINST ANY CHANGE IN PRESENT 60-40 RATIO—EDITORIAL IN THE STAR IS READ TO MEETING—REPRESENTATIVES OF BUSINESS AND MOTORING BODIES GATHER IN BOARD OF TRADE ROOM.

Decision to reject any proposal for a gasoline tax for the District of Columbia other than that originally proposed by the District Commissioners was reached by the joint special civic committee at a meeting this afternoon in the board of trade rooms.

Following the reading of an editorial in the Evening Star touching on all phases of the proposed gas tax, the committee took immediate action.

STAND BY PRESENT RATIO.

It was the consensus of opinion that no plan which violated the 60-40 fiscal relations plan between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government should be accepted by citizens of Washington.

TRADE BOARD HITS BILLS—PREFERS NO RECIPROCITY TO PROPOSED MEASURES.

Better no automobile reciprocity between the District of Columbia and Maryland at all than under the terms of the two pending bills or the Ball substitute.

It was the contention of the committee that the passage of any such measures as those proposed would mark an entering wedge for the destruction of the 60-40 fiscal relationship between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government.

The committee in a formal resolution announced its opposition to the pending measures, and particularly on the substitute proposed by Senator BALL; said that it would prefer to have no reciprocity rather than this substitute, because it is an infringement upon the principle of fixed proportional contribution between the Federal and District Governments.

And on February 26, 1924, the Washington Times published the following:

RECIPROCITY BILL FACES VETO MOVE—TRADE COMMITTEE TO SEEK DEATH OF ANY BUT ORIGINAL MEASURE.

The committee unanimously opposed the House reciprocity bill, the Senate reciprocity bill, and the substitute bill which will be presented to the Senate subcommittee to-day by Senator BALL. Approval of the original bill drawn by the District Commissioners was reiterated.

Infringement on the principle of the 60-40 agreement is seen in Senator BALL's substitute bill, it was pointed out. The bill provides all the money collected from the gasoline tax shall go exclusively to the District and be appropriated at will of the District Commissioners for traffic improvement.

"But why should the people of the District pay this whole amount?" Edward F. Colladay, president of the Washington Board of Trade, asked the committee, "when Congress is agreed to furnish 40 per cent of all our expenses? It is just another trick."

BALL DETERMINED.

Senator BALL told the citizen representatives that he was greatly disappointed with the attitude taken, and that he proposes to stand by his substitute. He said he would place it before the Senate District Committee at the meeting to-morrow morning, and indicated he felt certain that the committee would accept it. He expressed his regrets that the local citizens would not accept his substitute, because he felt it was a fair bill and one which imposes no discrimination upon motorists here.

WASHINGTON PEOPLE DECLARED SELFISH.

The Washington News for February 27, 1924, said:

Senator EDWARDS, New Jersey, called attention to the difference in the tax rate paid in Washington and other cities. Here the basic tax is $1.20, while in Baltimore, at a similar valuation, $3 is paid; in New York, $5.40; in Jersey City, over $4, and in Chicago, $9.50. BALL and Senator JONES, Washington, said it would be unfair not to have a personal tax on autos.

SELFISH.

"It is truly a selfish proposition with District people," Senator WELLER, Maryland, said. "People here do not want to pay fair taxes."

WASHINGTONIANS UNWILLING TO PAY THEIR JUST SHARE. The Washington Post for February 27, 1924, said:

SENATOR BALL REPLIES.

"I am extremely sorry that the citizens of Washington have taken this position," Senator BALL replied. "It is a position that Congress can not support. It takes a stand that exempts you from taxation. There is no excuse upon which a fair-minded man can exempt you from this taxation that is paid in other States."

"There is a lower tax rate here than in any comparable city, Maryland and Virginia each pay personal-property taxes. Why shouldn't you? One pays 2 cents a gallon gasoline tax and the other 3 cents. The money so raised goes to the highway improvement. That provision is in my proposed substitute."

"On what ground can I, or anyone else, stand now? Washingtonians are not willing to pay their just share of taxes, as evidenced by the decision of this committee. I can not go to Congress now and say that the people here are willing to pay their full share and that funds should be appropriated for improvement of the city when it is evident that they are not."

Senator BALL warned the civic and trade representatives that there is a growing belief in Congress that the taxpayers of the District should contribute more than 60 per cent for the maintenance of the municipal government.

ACTUATED BY PURELY SELFISH MOTIVE.

In addition to the above, the Washington Star for February 27, 1924, carried the following:

BALL SAYS TAXES LOW.

"I am extremely sorry," replied Senator BALL, "that the citizens of Washington have taken this position. It is a position that Congress can not support. It takes a stand that exempts you from taxation. There is no excuse upon which a fair-minded man can exempt you from this taxation that is paid in other States."

"There is a lower tax rate here than in any comparable city, Maryland and Virginia each pay personal taxes. Why shouldn't you? In these two States one pays 2 cents a gallon for gasoline tax and the other 3. . . ."

MUST PAY FAIR TAX.

In support of his contention that his substitute bill, which carries the 2-cent tax on gasoline, $1 license fee, and the present personal-property tax, was fair, Senator BALL pointed out that the personal-property tax on automobiles paid in Baltimore is $3 a hundred, while here it is $1.20. He insisted that the taxes paid on automobiles in Washington are very much lower than in Delaware, New York, Maryland, and other States. He declared that the people of the District can not expect Washington to become a really big city unless the people here are willing to pay fair taxes.

Senator WELLER, of Maryland, said that the matter was of interest to the people of Maryland, who also want their reciprocity with the District in the matter of automobile licenses. He, too, argued that the taxes paid on automobiles in the District, even under the proposed gasoline tax law, would be much lower than in Maryland. Senator COPELAND suggested that the tax on automobiles in New York was higher still than in Maryland; that he paid, he thought, $5 a hundred personal-property tax on automobiles there.

Senator WELLER declared that the people in the District in opposing the gasoline tax bill, which would lead to reciprocity with Maryland, were actuated by a purely selfish motive; that they did not want to pay a fair tax.

COMMISSIONERS' BILL NATURALLY PREFERABLE TO CITIZENS.

Naturally the bill specially prepared by the commissioners, which sought to abolish the $3, $5, and $10 registration fees now paid and permit all cars from Rolls-Royces and Pierce-Arrows down to pay merely a nominal fee of $1 each, and which also sought to abolish all property tax on motor vehicles, was preferred by Washington citizens, as such measure reduced their taxes immensely. Very naturally they would make a fight for the commissioners' bill.

It was no worry of theirs that the Government would have to pay a correspondingly greater amount in liquidating the balance of their expenses; and so the various citizens' associations began to meet all over the city, and they sent their delegates to the meeting of the Federation of Citizens' Associations to make a concentrated fight against the bill as passed by the House and to have substituted for it the original commissioners' bill. The following is from the press report of such meeting:

RENEW OPPOSITION TO GAS TAX BILL—CITIZENS' FEDERATION MEMBERS FEAR UPSET OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FISCAL ARRANGEMENT.

The Federation of Citizens' Associations last night renewed its opposition to any automobile reciprocity legislation except the bill as originally drafted by the District Commissioners.

The delegates adopted a resolution calling the attention of all Washingtonians to the dangers which the federation believes lie in the substitute reciprocity measure proposed by Senator BALL.

Most of the discussion centered on that part of the Ball substitute which provides that approximately a million dollars, to be raised by the 2-cent tax on gasoline, shall be made available as a special fund for street paving, lighting, and upkeep of bridges.

William S. Torbert and Jesse C. Suter told the delegates of the determined stand taken against the Ball plan by a joint committee representing various civic and trade organizations.

ENDANGERS TAX BASIS.

They emphasized the point that the Ball measure endangers the time-honored system under which the Federal Government has contributed a fixed proportion of the expenses of the Capital City.

Mr. Torbert stated that while the Ball measure stipulates that the special gas-tax fund is not intended to interfere with the regular annual appropriations, if the commissioners were given a million dollars of gas-tax money to spend on streets there would be no assurance that Congress would continue to make the usual 60-40 appropriations for street improvements.

AND WASHINGTON CITIZENS WON—SO FAR.

The following excerpts are taken from the article appearing on the first page of the Washington Star for March 12, 1924, to wit:

ORIGINAL GAS TAX BILL GETS SENATE COMMITTEE O. K.—HOUSE RECIPROCITY MEASURE AMENDED TO CONFORM TO COMMISSIONERS' PLAN.

The gasoline tax bill, virtually in the form recommended by the District Commissioners, was ordered favorably reported to the Senate to-day by the Senate District Committee.

The committee acted upon the House bill, amending it to conform to the plan suggested by the commissioners.

ONE DOLLAR REGISTRATION FEE.

The bill as reported also provides for a registration fee of $1 each year for each motor vehicle operated in the District except for motor vehicles propelled by steam or electricity.

The action of the Senate committee to-day was a victory for the citizens of the District, who have protested vigorously against the introduction of the personal property tax on automobiles along with the gasoline tax.

It will be noted from the last paragraph of the above article that the representation is made that there was an attempt to add a personal-property tax on automobiles. This is not correct, for under the present law there is a personal-property tax of $1.20 on the $100. The commissioners' bill sought to abolish this self-same property tax, and the House of Representatives refused to let them do it. And the commissioners also sought by their bill to abolish the present registration fees of $3, $5, and $10, and let all cars pay only a nominal $1 each, and the House of Representatives refused to let them do it.

It was the commissioners who were seeking to abolish present taxes now existing. It was not the House of Representatives seeking to increase taxes. Maryland proposed reciprocity if a tax of 2 cents per gallon was imposed on gasoline. By paying such tax of 2 cents on gasoline the District of Columbia would gain reciprocity with Maryland and cease having to pay registration and license fees in Maryland. The House of Representatives decided by a decisive vote that Washington people should pay such tax, especially in view of the fact that Maryland paid 2 cents and Virginia paid 3 cents per gallon on gasoline, and practically all other States had a gasoline tax in addition to their registration fees and personal-property tax on automobiles. It is my purpose in this discussion to fully apprise the Members of the House and of the Senate of the real situation concerning taxation now existing in the District of Columbia, so that when this bill is finally agreed to in conference justice may be done to the people of the United States.

RECORD MUST BE KEPT STRAIGHT.

Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, editor of the Washington Star, in his issue of February 24, 1924, used two whole columns and a half of page 3—not the editorial page—in trying to defend the $1.20 on the $100 tax rate in Washington, D. C. Likewise in his issue of February 26, 1924, Mr. Theodore W. Noyes devoted parts of four columns of page 3 of said Washington Star in another attempt to defend the $1.20 on the $100 rate of taxation here in Washington; and he also devoted more than a column of his editorial page in such defense. And in his issue of February 29, 1924, Mr. Theodore W. Noyes devoted practically another column of his editorial page to this tax defense. The fact remains, however, that the people of the District of Columbia are paying a total tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100, with property assessed far below real value, and that the Government is paying all of the balance of their local city expenses, and has been doing it for years, when there is not another city, large or small, in the whole United States with a tax rate nearly so low.

JUST HOW IT BENEFITS MR. NOYES.

Up to and including the year 1922 property here was supposed to be assessed at two-thirds of actual value. Since 1922 it is supposed to be assessed at full value. Mr. Theodore W. Noyes owns a fine residence at 1730 New Hampshire Avenue NW., on lot 133 in square 153, which for the last five years has been assessed as follows:

Year—
1920	$51,500
1921	51,000
1922	54,700
1923	82,050
1924	82,200

I am reliably informed that this property is easily worth $125,000 and could not be bought for that sum. Mr. Noyes's fine business property, known as the Evening Star Building, at the corner of Eleventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, has for the last five years been assessed at the following valuations:

Year—
1920	$505,226
1921	556,649
1922	947,649
1923	1,685,400

I am reliably informed that this property is worth about $3,000,000, and that little less than that sum would buy it, since the substantial improvements were made upon it in 1922-23.

Very naturally Mr. Theodore W. Noyes is much interested in keeping the tax rate down to $1.20 on the $100 and the assessed valuation down as low as possible, for if he had to pay a rate of $2.40 or $4.80, as people in most cities are paying, it would mean just double or treble the amount of taxes he is now paying, and if his assessment was raised to full value it would mean just that much more.

WHAT IT MEANS TO EDITOR McLEAN.

Mr. Edward B. McLean owns the Washington Post. His splendid business property, the Post Building, practically fronting on Pennsylvania Avenue, is situated in the central business section of Washington. It is assessed far below real value. And it means much to Mr. McLean that he has to pay a tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100. Editor McLean also owns a fine residence in the heart of the city at 1500 I Street NW., which is assessed at only $600,004, and at the $1.20 rate pays a tax of only $7,207, when this property is easily worth double that sum. Editor McLean also owns a magnificent country estate, "Friendship," on Wisconsin Avenue NW., which is assessed at only $492,944, and, at the $1.20 rate, pays a tax of only $5,915, when such property is easily worth $1,000,000. Hence the low tax rate means a great deal to Editor Edward B. McLean.

WHAT IT MEANS TO WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

Mr. William Randolph Hearst owns the Washington Morning Herald newspaper plant. He also owns the Washington Evening Times newspaper plant. If these plants were assessed at their real value, and if they paid the rate of taxation that Mr. Hearst pays in New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and other cities of the United States where he owns papers, instead of the ridiculous tax rate of $1.20 on the $100 that he pays here his taxes in Washington would amount to several times what he now pays.

NOW ASSESSED FAR BELOW REAL VALUE.

Let me again call attention to various pieces of property scattered over Washington, showing that property here is under-assessed.

I have secured from the Rent Commission, the offices of the tax assessor and tax collector, and other reliable sources in Washington the facts concerning the rendition of numerous pieces of property which prove conclusively that property in the District of Columbia is assessed far below its value.

The Bradford apartments is assessed at $229,407, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $2,752. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $450,000.

Tudor Hall apartments is assessed at $266,653, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $3,190. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $362,576.

The Argyle apartments is assessed at $207,437, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $2,489. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $344,000.

The Alabama apartments is assessed at $219,870, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $2,638. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $305,000.

The Imperial apartments is assessed at $207,500, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $2,490. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $350,082.

The Pelham Courts apartments is assessed at $192,760, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $2,313. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $250,000.

The Riviera apartments is assessed at $124,709, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $1,496. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $240,000.

The Earlington apartments is assessed at $151,793, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $1,821. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is from $225,000 to $240,000.

The Savoy apartments is assessed at $218,000, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $2,616. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $250,000.

The Lonsdale apartments is assessed at $160,233, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $1,922. The owner of this property claimed before the Rent Commission that its value is $240,000.

The residence of Mr. E. F. Colladay at 3734 Northampton is assessed at $14,356, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $172, when it is reliably estimated to be worth far in excess of double that sum. It is to be expected that through the Washington Star he would lead the fight for this system of low taxation in the District, when the whole people of the United States pay the balance of the expenses.

The magnificent residence of Mrs. Marshall Field on Sixteenth Street NW. is assessed at $139,722, and pays a tax of $1,676. It is reliably estimated to be worth double that amount.

The magnificent Belmont residence at 1618 New Hampshire Avenue is assessed at $472,502, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $5,670. It is reliably estimated to be worth double that sum.

The New Willard Hotel properties is assessed at $2,594,705, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $31,136. This is the most valuable location in Washington, and is reliably estimated to be worth nearly double that sum.

The Raleigh Hotel property is assessed at $1,972,200, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $23,666. It is reliably estimated to be worth at least half a million dollars more than that sum.

Hotel Washington is assessed at $1,951,605, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $23,419. It is reliably estimated to be worth far in excess of that sum.

The magnificent, semicircular Wardman Park Hotel, covering quite an area of ground and housing many wealthy families, is assessed at $3,105,346, and at $1.20 pays a tax of only $37,264, and I am reliably informed that you could not buy this property for much under $5,000,000. The annual receipts paid this fashionable family hotel by its patrons would astonish any Member of this Congress.

The residence at 1835 Irving Street NW. is assessed at $10,416, and at the $1.20 rate pays a tax of only $125, while it could be sold at any time for as much as $22,500, a similar residence in the same block having recently sold for $25,000.

The residence at 3100 Sixteenth Street NW., which recently sold for more than $40,000, is assessed at $15,181, and at $1.20 pays a tax of $182.

Garfinkle's department store is assessed at $420,975 and pays a tax of $5,051. Woodward & Lothrop (whole block) department store is assessed at $3,468,833 and pays a tax of $41,626. You could not purchase either of these properties for double the amount at which they are assessed.

The residence which I am renting at 1929 Kenyon Street NW. has recently sold for $11,750. It is assessed at $6,486 and pays a tax of $77.84.

A distinguished southern Senator told me recently that for several years he had been trying to sell his residence in his home town for $7,000, and that he pays more taxes on it in his home State than he pays on his residence in Washington, which under any condition is worth $22,500 but which could be sold for $25,000.

The Meridian Mansion at 2400 Sixteenth Street NW. is assessed at $1,481,960, and at $1.20 per $100 pays a tax of only $17,783. When this property was before the Rent Commission for hearing its owner claimed that its real value was a little less than $3,000,000, and admitted that its gross receipts from its rentals aggregated $281,532.20 annually. When this property was sold on January 13, 1923, the revenue stamps on the deed, coupled with the trust therein assumed, indicated that the consideration was $2,250,000. I have a statement signed by Mr. E. Kirby Smith, who then bought this property and now owns it, in which he says:

The usual assessment on property is 50 per cent of its valuation. This property could not be replaced for less than $3,000,000 in addition to the land. I have spent quite a fortune refurnishing and building over the place to make it attractive.

That comes from the owner himself. He admits just what I have been contending, that property is assessed far below its real value in the District of Columbia.

In the RECORD for February 26, 1924, beginning on page 2944, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] placed reports of various sales of property and assessments given him by Tax Assessor Richards in an attempt to prove that property was, not underassessed. His list embraced only five sales made in 1923, notwithstanding that there were hundreds of sales of very valuable pieces of property made in 1923. His list embraced sales made in 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922, as against the present assessment. This, of course, was manifestly unfair, for it is well known that property has been gradually going up all the time, and is much higher now and in 1923 than it was in the years he gave. But let me point out some of the pieces of property reported by him in such list. And at the same time I want it to be remembered that it is impossible to get the real value from the consideration shown in deeds, for a practice has grown up here in the District of Columbia of not stating the real consideration in the deed. For instance, when the magnificent Argonne Apartments on Columbia Road were sold on November 10, 1923, to Stacy M. Reed, the revenue stamps and recitations in the deed indicated that same was sold for $1,730,000, plus accrued interest due on one trust for $1,250,000 and another trust of $225,000. But who knows exactly how much interest was due. And then, later, when this property was sold to C. A. Snow at quite an additional consideration, Mr. William S. Phillips, who arranged the sale to Mr. Snow, very frankly told me that he had agreed with Mr. Snow to keep the real consideration price secret, although he would say that the amount of revenue stamps on the deed would indicate within $50,000 of the real consideration. Yet, this magnificent Argonne Apartment property is assessed at only $1,523,154, and at the $1.20 per $100 rate pays a tax of only $18,277.

So it may be seen that you must have information other than the bare recitations in a deed to ascertain what the real consideration was when property is sold and what its real value is; and Mr. Richards can not cite sales prices from considerations stated in deeds to prove value. But even citing sales made in years preceding 1923 did not prove his point, for many pieces of such property cited by him to Mr. ZIHLMAN were underassessed, according to his own figures.

Now let us examine some of the properties which the gentleman from Maryland has placed in the RECORD as coming from the assessor's office in an attempt to prove that property is not underassessed in the District. I quote:

Lot 39 in square 220 at 1413 H Street NW. sold in August, 1922, for $165,000 and is assessed for $132,700. Thus, according to his own statement, the owner of this property is assessing it at $32,300 less than its value, for all property here is worth just as much now as it was in August, 1922.

He cites lots 8 and 9 E in square 223, at the southeast corner of Fifteenth and New York Avenue NW., which in December, 1922, sold for $900,000 and is assessed for $635,200. Thus, according to his own statement, the owner of this property is assessing it at $264,800 less than its value.

He cites lot 82 in square 247, at 1319 L Street NW., which in April, 1922, sold for $45,000 and is assessed for $19,723. Thus, according to his own statement, the owner of this property is assessing it at $25,277 less than its value, which shows that same is not assessed even at half value.

He cites lot 87 in square 247, being rear of 1347 Massachusetts Avenue NW., which even as far back as December, 1920, sold for $7,500, is assessed at $4,825, which is assessed at less than two-thirds of its former value, which has greatly increased since 1920.

He cites lots 805 and 807 in square 247, at 1349 L Street NW., which in April, 1920, sold for $85,000, and are assessed for $64,629. Thus the owner of this property is assessing it at $20,371 less than its value, according to his own statement.

He cites lot 820 in square 247, at 1133 Fourteenth Street NW., which in March, 1922, sold for $45,000, and is assessed at $32,100. Thus, according to his own statement, the owner of this property is assessing it at $12,891 less than its value.

He cites lot 828 in square 247, at rear of 1318 Massachusetts Avenue NW., which in April, 1922, sold for $4,000, and is assessed at $1,486, which is considerably less than half value.

He cites lot 830 in square 247, at rear of 1123 Fourteenth Street NW., which in April, 1920, sold for $2,000, and is assessed at $775, or considerably less than half.

He cites lot 831 in square 247, in rear of 1314 Massachusetts Avenue NW., which in October, 1920, sold for $10,000, and is assessed at $5,255, or practically at half valuation.

He cites lot 834 in square 247, at 1120 Thirteenth Street NW., which in March, 1922, sold for $18,000, and is assessed at $11,541, which is less than two-thirds valuation.

He cites lot N in square 247, at rear of 1110 Thirteenth Street NW., which in June, 1922, sold for $9,500, and is assessed at $3,405, or just a little more than one-third of its valuation.

He cites lot 27 in square 285, at 1227 I Street NW., which in January, 1922, sold for $55,000, is assessed at $33,234, and according to his own statement is underassessed $21,766 below its value.

He cites lot 807 in square 248, being the Dewey Hotel, at 1330 L Street NW., which in January, 1919, sold for $200,000 (and now worth a great deal more), is assessed at $154,193, or an underassessment of $45,807 less than its value.

He cites lot 37 in square 248, at 1316 L Street NW., which in April, 1922, sold for $23,500, and is assessed at $14,273, or an underassessment of $9,227 less than its value.

He cites lot 38 in square 248, at 1314 L Street NW., which in September, 1922, sold for $22,500, and assessed at $13,173, or an underassessment of $9,327 less than its value.

He cites lot 17 in block 250, at 1336 I Street NW., which as far back as April, 1920, sold for $250,000, and assessed at $195,970, which is $54,030 less than its value was in 1920, and it is worth considerably more at this time.

He cites lot 35 in square 250, at 1332 I Street NW., which in April, 1921, sold for $300,000, and assessed at $237,316, or an underassessment of $62,684 less than its value in 1921, and it is worth much more now.

He cites lot 826 in square 250, at 832 Thirteenth Street NW., which in September, 1922, sold for $22,500, and assessed at $12,108, or an underassessment of $10,392 less than its value.

He cites lots 40 and 832 in square 253, at 1337-9 F Street NW., which in August, 1922, sold for $299,000, and assessed at $203,675, or an underassessment of $95,325 less than its value.

He cites lot 803 in square 253, at 1307 F Street NW., which in May, 1922, sold for $175,000, assessed at $138,236, or an underassessment of $36,764 less than its value.

He cites lot 35 in square 285, at 1219 I Street NW., which in April, 1921, sold for $23,000, and assessed at $15,008, or an underassessment of $7,992 less than its value.

He cites lot 47 in square 288, at 729 Thirteenth Street NW., which in April, 1922, sold for $260,000, and is assessed at $215,170, or an underassessment of $44,830 less than its value.

He cites lot 823 in square 288, at 740 Twelfth Street NW., which in April, 1920, sold for $100,000 and is assessed at $60,950, or an underassessment of $39,050 less than its value.

He cites lots 811 and 812 in square 289, at 612-614 Twelfth Street NW., which in December, 1921, sold for $160,000, and are assessed at $131,771, or an underassessment of $28,229 less than their value.

He cites lot 813 in square 289, at 610 Twelfth Street NW., which in December, 1921, sold for $90,000, and is assessed at $67,238, or an underassessment of $22,762 less than its value.

He cites lot 821 in block 290, at 1210 F Street NW., which in November, 1921, sold for $125,000, and is assessed at $100,494, or an underassessment of $24,506 less than its value.

He cites lot 39 in block 290, at the northeast corner of Thirteenth and E Streets NW., which, according to his own statement, is underassessed $25,560 less than its value, according to the cited sale in December, 1922.

He cites lot 10 in square 293, at 321-325 Thirteenth Street NW., which in September, 1921, sold for $41,500, and is assessed for $17,968, or an underassessment of $23,532, showing that it is assessed at much less than half valuation.

He cites lot 17 in square 319, at 733 Twelfth Street NW., which in April, 1921, sold for $35,000, and is assessed at $17,955, or just about half valuation.

He cites lot 800 in square 319, at 1107 G Street NW., which in October, 1921, sold for $97,818, and is assessed at $64,045, or an underassessment of $33,773 less than its value.

He cites lot 801 in square 319, at 1109 G Street NW., which in July, 1919, sold for $100,000 (probably worth double now), and is assessed at $67,235, or an underassessment of $32,865 less than its value was back in 1919.

He cites lot 813 in square 319, at 723 Twelfth Street NW., which in March, 1922, sold for $60,000, and is assessed at $32,632, or an underassessment of $27,378 less than its value.

He cites lot 814 in square 345, at the southwest corner of Tenth and H Streets NW., which sold in December, 1921, for $96,000, and is assessed at $71,829, or an underassessment of $24,171 less than its value.

According to his own statement, lots 18, 19, 818, and 819 in square 347, which he cites as being sold in November, 1922, are underassessed $41,642 less than their value.

He cites lot 20 in square 372, at 940 K Street NW., which in May, 1921, sold for $10,500, is assessed for $4,880, or at much less than half of its valuation.

He cites lot 800 in square 372, at 903 New York Avenue NW., which as far back as April, 1919, sold for $50,000, is assessed at $35,000, or $15,000 less than its value in 1919, which has about doubled.

He cites lot 807 in square 372, at 923 Tenth Street NW., which in April, 1922, sold for $6,000, is assessed at $2,317, or a little more than one-third of its value.

He cites lots 812 and 813 in square 373, at 930-941 I Street NW., which in September, 1922, sold for $36,500, is assessed at $19,570, or an underassessment of $16,930 less than its value.

He cites lot 1 in square 373, at 945 I Street NW., which in March, 1922, sold for $20,000, is assessed at $12,000, or an underassessment of $7,900 less than its value.

He cites lot 804 in square 381, at 921 Louisiana Avenue, which in October, 1920, sold for $55,000, and assessed at $43,043, or an underassessment of $11,957 less than its value way back in 1920.

He cites lot 18 in square 382, at 931 B Street NW., which in May, 1920, sold for $28,500, and assessed at $18,205, or an underassessment of $10,295 less than its 1920 value.

He cites lots 800 and 801 in square 429, at 700 Seventh and 707 G Street NW., which in March, 1921, sold for $140,000, and assessed at $50,000, or just a little more than one-third valuation, and this property is worth far more now than in 1921.

He cites lot 823 in square 429, at 708 Seventh Street NW., which in December, 1921, sold for $78,000, and assessed at $54,245, or an underassessment of $23,755 less than its value.

He cites lot C in square 429, at 728 Eighth Street NW., which in July 1921, sold for $20,000, and is assessed at $9,416, or less than one-half of its valuation.

He cites lot 23 in square 431, at 400-404 Seventh Street NW., which is assessed at an underassessment of $65,660 less than it sold for in January, 1923, according to his own statement.

He cites lot 807 in square 431, at 432 Seventh Street NW., which as far back as November, 1920, sold for $100,000, and is assessed at $56,100, or at $43,900 less than its value.

He cites lot 809 in square 453, at 623-625 H Street NW., which in May, 1920, sold for $25,000, and is assessed at $12,557, or at just about half valuation.

He cites lot 826 in square 454, at 612 H Street NW., which in April, 1922, sold for $14,500, and is assessed at $7,568, or just a little more than half valuation.

He cites lot 42 in square 455, at 635 F Street NW., which in February, 1920, sold for $200,000, and is assessed at $126,614, or an underassessment of $73,386 less than its value.

He cites lot 36 in square 456, at 628-630 F Street NW., which in July, 1919, sold for $90,000, and is assessed at $65,815, or an underassessment of $24,185 less than its value way back in 1919.

He cited lot 827 in square 457, at 626 E Street NW., which in May, 1922, sold for $29,000, and is assessed at $16,996, or an underassessment of $12,004 less than its value.

He cited lot 13 in square 459, at 619 C Street and 628 Louisiana Avenue, which in May, 1922, sold for $15,000, and is assessed at $8,892, or a little more than half valuation.

He cited lot 804 in square 461, at 607 B Street and 604 Pennsylvania Avenue, which in April, 1922, sold for $26,000, and is assessed at $18,357, or just a little over half valuation.

He cites lot 407 in square 289, at 1212 G Street NW., which in February, 1923, sold for $115,000, and is assessed at $99,170, or an underassessment of $15,830 less than value.

VALUATION AND ASSESSMENT SHOULD BE FOR SAME YEAR.

You will note that in the data furnished by Tax Assessor Richards to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. ZIEGLER) he has cited sales of property during the years 1918, 1919, 1920, and so forth, and then compared same with the assessment of such property for the present year. He should have given the assessment for the year when the sale was made.

I challenge both Mr. Richards and Mr. ZIEGLER to cite any property or properties in the District of Columbia that were assessed in 1918 for anything like the value they sold for in 1918, or that were assessed in 1919 for anything like the value they sold for in 1919, or that were assessed in 1920 for anything like the value they sold for in 1920, or that were assessed in 1921 for anything like the value they sold for in 1921, or that were assessed in 1922 for anything like the value they sold for in 1922, or that were assessed in 1923 for anything like the value they sold for in 1923. If he will ascertain the real consideration value and not merely the camouflaged one expressed in the deed, he will find that he can not give such a list. From the House floor on January 30, 1924, I said:

And I have received an insolent note through the mail, stating:

"You needn't kick, for you Members of Congress and Senators get the benefit of this tax rate of $1.20 on the $100, and it makes that much less expense you have to pay out on your fine residences."

I do not own a residence here. If I did, I would be willing to pay the same rate of taxation on it that citizens of other cities have to pay. And all of you colleagues who are fortunate enough to own property here in the District of Columbia know full well that it is not rendered at anything like its full value. And I challenge Assessor Richards and Commissioner Rudolph to name the residence of one Congressman or of one Senator that is assessed for as much as 75 per cent of its real value. They can not do it. And if they can not, then will they contend that they permit Congressmen and Senators to render their property under a lower system of assessment than they do other people of the District? Surely they would not contend that.

I REPEAT THE CHALLENGE.

I again challenge Tax Assessor Richards to name the residence of even one Congressman or of one Senator here in Washington that is now assessed for as much as 75 per cent of its real value. He can not do it, and he knows it.

THE OLD SLOGAN HAS WORN THREADBARE.

Whenever a Member of Congress seeks to change the unjust system of allowing the people of Washington to pay the ridiculous tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100, the newspapers and citizens' associations immediately resort to their old battle cry:

That Washington is the Nation's Capital and must be made the most beautiful city in the world; that the Government should pay a big part of the local city expenses because it owns so much property here.

Washington is the Nation's Capital and should be made the most beautiful city in the world, and I will go just as far as any other man through all legitimate and proper means to make it the most beautiful city in the world. Before the Government built all of its fine institutions here Washington was a mere village. Property here was of little value. It is because of the fact that the United States has spent its millions here that has caused some lots to jump in value from $100 to $100,000. Every piece of property owned by the Government in Washington is daily enjoyed by the people of Washington.

The local pay roll of the Government is a bonanza to the merchants and business enterprises of Washington. The Government pays its nearly 100,000 employees in Washington their wages promptly every two weeks in new money that has never been spent before. Chicago, or any other big city in the United States, would gladly exempt the Government from paying all taxes on its property to get it to move its Capital to such city.

Because we want to make it the most beautiful city in the world is no reason why the Government should pay for building million-dollar school buildings and employing 2,500 teachers and buying the school books for the 70,000 school children of the thousands of families living in Washington who have no connection whatever with the Government except to bleed it on all occasions and to grow rich on the Government pay rolls expended here. Because we want to make Washington the most beautiful city in the world is no reason why the Government should pay for the army of garbage gatherers, the army of ash gatherers, the army of trash gatherers, the army of street cleaners and sprinklers, the army of tree pruners and sprayers, and the street lighting system for the several hundred miles of private residences owned by rich tax dodgers who have no connection whatever with the Government; nor is it any reason why the Government should pay for their water system, their sewer system, their police protection, their fire protection, for playgrounds for their children, for parks for their enjoyment, for their municipal golf grounds, for their numerous public tennis courts, for their bathing beaches, for their skating ponds, for their cricket grounds, for their baseball and football grounds, for their horseshoe riding paths, for paving the streets in front of their residences and maintaining and keeping them in repair, for building their million-dollar bridges, furnishing million-and-a-half-dollar market houses, their municipal, trial, and appellate courts, their jails and houses of correction, their municipal hospitals, asylums for their insane, special asylum schools for their deaf and dumb, asylums for their orphans, a university for their 110,000 colored people, their municipal libraries, their municipal community-center facilities, salaries of all their municipal officers, employees, buildings, furnishings, equipments, sanitary and health departments, and the hundreds of other things that all other cities of the United States must furnish and pay for themselves, but a very substantial part of which the people of Washington have been getting out of the Federal Treasury for years.

The magnificent Capitol and its beautiful grounds are daily enjoyed by Washington people. The Congressional Library, which cost $6,032,124, in addition to the sum of $585,000 paid for its grounds, and for the upkeep of which Congress annually spends a large sum of money, is daily enjoyed by the people of Washington. The Government furnished and maintains the magnificent Botanic Gardens here for the pleasure and enjoyment of Washington people. The Government furnished and maintains the wonderful Zoo Park with all of its interesting animals for the instruction and amusement of Washington children. The Government furnished and maintains the extensive and most beautiful Rock Creek Park, with its picturesque picnic grounds, its miles of wonderful boulevards, its incomparable scenery, all for the pleasure of Washington people. Congress has spent millions of dollars reclaiming and purchasing the lands now embraced in the Potomac Parks and Speedway, daily used and enjoyed by Washington people. The Government has spent several million dollars building the various bridges spanning the Potomac River, and huge sums for the bridges spanning the Anacostia River, and spent $1,000,000 building the beautiful "Million Dollar Bridge" on Connecticut Avenue. The Government has spent millions of dollars on the Lincoln Memorial, grounds, and reflecting pools, the Washington Monument Grounds, Lincoln Park, on East Capital Street, and the numerous beautiful little parks scattered all over the city, all for the pleasure and benefit of Washington people. Let me again repeat:

TAXATION SYSTEM HERE IS CRIME UPON WHOLE PEOPLE.

Prior to the fiscal year of 1915, when the Borland Act became effective, all of the streets within the District of Columbia had been paved upon the 50-50 basis, half the expense being paid by the District and the other half by the Government of the United States. The District auditor advises me that when the Borland Act became effective fully 90 per cent of all the streets within the old limits of the city of Washington had already been paved, the Government of the United States paying for half of all of same. Under the Borland Act each abutting property owner now pays for 20 feet and excess is paid for by the District and Government 50-50 up to June 30, 1921, and 60-40 since that date.

Congress made the following appropriations for repairs and maintenance of streets since the 60-40 plan became effective, to wit:

Fiscal year 1921	$575,000
Fiscal year 1922	575,000
Fiscal year 1923	460,000
Fiscal year 1924	550,000

And the Government of the United States paid 40 per cent of all of the above.

Congress made the following appropriations for repairs to suburban streets and roads within the District, to wit:

Fiscal year 1921	$250,000
Fiscal year 1922	250,000
Fiscal year 1923	225,000
Fiscal year 1924	275,000

And the whole people of the United States paid 40 per cent of same.

Congress made the following appropriations for the paving and grading of streets:

Fiscal year 1921	$614,200
Fiscal year 1922	144,840
Fiscal year 1923	233,500
Fiscal year 1924	573,300

And the whole people paid 40 per cent of same.

Congress made the following appropriations for the construction and maintenance of sewers:

Fiscal year 1921	$515,000
Fiscal year 1922	523,000
Fiscal year 1923	502,000
Fiscal year 1924	690,000

And the whole people of the United States paid 40 per cent of same.

Until the Borland amendment became effective in 1915, the whole people paid 50 per cent of the expense of paving all the streets and thoroughfares of Washington and of their repair and maintenance, without abutting property owners paying any part of same, and the 50-50 basis continued to 1921, the Government paying 50 per cent, but since then only 40 per cent of all of the above. Prior to 1915, to secure sewer service, the owner was charged $1 per front foot, and never thereafter did he have to pay anything additional. But since 1915 he is now charged $1.50 per front foot, and thereafter he pays no annual assessment whatever for such service. In other words, where the owner's lot was 20 feet front he paid $20 before 1915 and $30 since then, for service, and all of such expense of making his excavations and furnishing him sewer connection for all time thereafter without further charge, is borne by the District and Government, 50-50 before 1921 and 60-40 since 1921.

For water connection the owner is charged $2 per front foot, which covers less than 66 per cent of the cost of making the connection for him. And the charge thereafter is illustrated as follows: The residence rented by me at 1929 Kenyon Street NW, has 20 feet frontage, a basement, two stories, and an attic. There are seven members in my family. I am charged $7.65 per annum. This is a lower water rate than any other city in the whole United States enjoys.

And the District gets several extra millions annually from the United States Treasury where the whole people pay the full 100 per cent. The Washington Times for Thursday, January 10, 1924, on page 2, in an article headed "District given $1,647,700," mentioned the several local institutions here in the District which are given the sum of $1,647,700 direct out of the Treasury concerning which there is no division of 60-40, but all is paid by the whole people, for said items are in the Interior Department appropriation bill, now before the House, all of which comes out of the people's Treasury.

This system has prevailed here simply because the 437,000 people in Washington are organized with citizens' associations, who will attempt to ruin any Congressman who fights the situation, and because the people of the United States do not know about the situation. Whenever the people find it out they are going to have it stopped.

What particular halo is there about the head of the rich tax dodgers living in Washington that they should be permitted to pay a total tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100, assessed at about half valuation, while the people of every other city in the United States have to pay all the way from $2.75 to $6.50, and the balance of the local expenses of the people of Washington has to be borne by the whole people? Why should it be continued? Why should Washington people be more favored than all of the balance of the people in the cities of this Nation?

Yet, because so much of their expenses have been paid out of the Treasury in the various supply bills that all of the revenue resulting from their little tax of $1.20 on half valuation has not all been used, because the Government was footing the bills, an effort is now being made by the District Commissioners to have such balance of nearly $5,000,000 declared a surplus to the credit of the District and they be permitted to spend same. It would be a crime against the whole people to let them touch one dollar of same.

During the recess of Congress I wrote to the mayor of every city of any size in the United States and asked them to advise us of their local tax rate, of the charges for water, sewer, paving, and so forth, and what rate, in their judgment, they thought Washington people should pay as a minimum. I want to insert just a few in this report. The consensus of opinion was that the rate here should be at least $2.50 per $100, and there was a large per cent who were in favor of it being much higher, and the rates for taxation ranged from $2.75 to over $6.50, and in all these cities the people were charged more for water, sewer, and paving.

Let me again quote a few excerpts from the letter sent me by the mayor of the city of Peoria, Ill.:

NOVEMBER 1, 1923.

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

Representative, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering your questionnaire of October 15 concerning relative tax rates of the cities of Washington and Peoria:

The tax rates on each $100 taxable valuation levied against the real and personal property of the citizens of Peoria for the year 1922 is itemized as follows:

City corporate tax, including library, tuberculosis, garbage, and police and fire pension fund.....	$1.94
Street and bridge.....	.24
School district.....	2.70
Park district.....	.41
	$5.29
State.....	.45
County.....	.59
County highway.....	.25
Total, all purposes.....	6.58

Unless there is a tremendous revenue derived from sources other than from taxes, the rate of $1.20 for Washington is ridiculous. While I have never had my attention called to this disparity, I am amazed that the light has not been let into financial affairs of the Capital City long before this time.

You should be supported by every colleague in your effort to compel the citizens of Washington to do theirs, even as every citizen outside the District is doing his.

Wishing you success, I am,

Very truly yours,

E. N. WOODRUFF, Mayor.

The foregoing statement from the mayor of Peoria, Ill., fairly indicates the sentiment of the people over the United States. It might be enlightening to quote from a few of the letters received the tax rate of some of the cities over the United States as certified to me by the mayor of such cities.

The tax rate paid by the people in Baltimore, Md., $3.27 on the $100; in New Orleans, La., $3.16½ on the $100; in Portland, Oreg., $4.52 on the $100; in my birthplace, Houston, Tex., $4.29½ on the $100; in Ogden, Utah, $3.33 on the $100; in Cheyenne, Wyo., $3.75 on the $100; in Fort Smith, Ark., $3.32 on the $100; in New Bedford, Mass., $3.13; in Burlington, Vt., $3.10 on the $100; in Pittsburgh, Pa., $3.22 on the $100; in St. Louis, Mo., which is a distinct political subdivision of the State, the city tax is $2.43 on the $100; in Boston, Mass., $2.47 on the $100; in Rochester, N. Y., $3.36 on the $100; in Portland, Me., $3.40 on the $100; in Boise City, Idaho, $4.29 on the $100; in Mobile, Ala., $3.40 on the $100; in Detroit, Mich., $2.75 per $100; in Duluth, Minn., $5.79 on the $100; in Atlanta, Ga., $3.15 on the $100; in Kansas City, Mo., $2.93 on the $100; in Minneapolis, Minn., $6.52 on the $100; in Salt Lake City, Utah, $3.18 on the $100; in Oakland, Calif., $4.02 on the $100; in Austin, the capital of Texas, $3.54 on the $100; in Denver, Colo., $2.76 on the $100; in Trenton, N. J., $3.22 on the $100; in Racine, Wis., $2.87 on the $100; in Nashville, Tenn., $2.80 on the $100; in Charlottesville, Va., $2.85. And let me illustrate as the tax rate runs generally over Texas: In Paris, Tex., $4.10 on the $100; in Port Arthur, Tex., $3.54 on the $100; in Tyler, Tex., $4.61 on the $100; in Denison, Tex., $3.32 on the $100; in Waco, Tex., $3.63 on the $100; in Amarillo, Tex., $3.55 on the $100; in Temple, Tex., $3.15; in Wichita Falls, Tex., $5.05 on the $100; in Beaumont, Tex., $4.04.

Mr. Edward F. Bryant, tax collector for San Francisco, Calif., has sent me a statement certifying that the following is the tax rate paid by the citizens in the following cities: In Seattle, Wash., $8.80 on the $100; Chicago, Ill., $8 on the $100; in Reno, Nev., $7.38 on the $100; in New York, N. Y., $5.48 on the $100; in Philadelphia, Pa., $6 on the $100; in Detroit, Mich., $4.48 on the $100; in San Francisco, Calif., $3.47 on the $100; in Los Angeles, Calif., $3.89 on the $100.

What excuse have we to offer to our constituents back at home who are paying the above tax rates for permitting by our votes here the 437,000 people in Washington, D. C., to continue paying the measly little pittance of only $1.20 on the $100, based on a half to two-thirds valuation, when our constituents have to pay all the balance of the expenses of this great city?

WASHINGTON PEOPLE NATURALLY THRIVE.

Why, of course, under such a system it is but natural that the people of Washington should thrive and accumulate property. When a man, whose fine residence fronts 30 feet on some fashionable street now has to pay only $45 to have sewer connection; the Government paying 40 per cent of all the expenses of excavation, connection, and maintenance, and he having such service free thereafter until eternity; and he having to pay only $60 for getting water connection, the Government paying 40 per cent of all excavation, connection, and maintenance, besides owning the main water conduit, and the owner having to pay thereafter only a nominal amount each year for water, it constitutes such a very desirable arrangement with the Federal Treasury that the newspapers and citizens' associations here fight for its continuance.

FROM POVERTY TO MULTIMILLIONAIRE.

When our now distinguished citizen, Mr. Harry Wardman, left England and first came to Washington, he asked the hardware firm of Rudolph & West to credit him for a saw and hammer, but they demanded the cash. Since then he has built 4,000 residences in Washington, some of the finest in the city, and he has built 300 apartment houses, embracing the largest now in the city, and he now owns more improved real estate than any other man in Washington. While his own energies and qualifications figure largely in his success, still what the Government has done for Washington has made his wonderful success possible.

WASHINGTON MUST PAY A REASONABLE TAX RATE.

The people of Washington must become reconciled to having their present ridiculous tax rate of $1.20 on the $100 raised to a reasonable rate, proportionate with what the people of other cities in the United States have to pay. The Government must stop paying for their running expenses such as are paid by the people of all other cities. The Congress must continue making this the most beautiful city in the whole world, but the people living here and enjoying the most beautiful city in the whole world must be willing to pay at least the minimum that people pay in the city where there is the lowest tax rate in the various States. They must do their part. They can not afford to be tax dodgers. They can not afford to be selfish. They can not afford to ask Congress to bear their ordinary civic expenses. And when this so-called gasoline tax bill is finally passed, it must contain a registration tax and property tax reasonable and in proportion to what other people pay elsewhere. Otherwise Congress will hear from the tax-burdened American people in the 48 States of this Union.

A PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I will say that if the Speaker were in the chair he would rule against me; but for the purpose of keeping the record clear I want to ask if the Chair can or will entertain a motion to take from the Speaker's desk Senate Resolution 72 and substitute it for House Resolution 191, reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs and now on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain that request at the present time.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday, March 17, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

403. A letter from the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, transmitting a statement showing, by location, salary range and bureau designation of employees receiving an aggregate annual salary of $2,000 and over as of March 1, 1924, for central office, and as of February 1, 1924, for the field; to the Committee on Appropriations.

404. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Cowlitz River, Wash., with a view to preparing plans and estimates of cost for the prevention and control of floods (H. Doc. No. 225); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

405. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Niagara River, N. Y.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

406. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation "to validate an agreement between the Secretary of War, acting on behalf of the United States, and the Washington Gas Light Co."; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois: Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. H. R. 579. A bill providing for the appointment of a superintendent and two assistant superintendents of delivery in certain post offices of the first class; with amendments (Rept. No. 311). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

ADDRESS BY FRAU ADELE SCHREIBER, OF THE GERMAN REICHSTAG.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record an address by Frau Adele Schreiber, member of the German Reichstag, before the Luncheon Forum of the National Popular Government League at Washington, D. C., January 8, 1924.

Mr. SMOOT. Has not the address already been printed in the Record? I remember that one address she delivered was so printed.

Mr. DILL. No; this address has not been printed in the Record.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

BETWEEN FRENCH MILITARISM AND GERMAN JUNKERISM—THE PLIGHT OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE.

[Address by Frau Adele Schreiber, member of the German Reichstag, before the Luncheon Forum of the National Popular Government League, New Ebbitt Hotel, Washington, D. C., January 8, 1924.]

The Forum was presided over by Senator ROBERT L. OWEN, of Oklahoma, president of the league, and was attended by over 300 guests, including several Senators and Congressmen, and many prominent officials and civilians, of every party, race, and creed.

Senator OWEN, in introducing Frau Schreiber, said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the great World War, which devastated human life beyond anything which has ever occurred in the history of the world, in which 37,000,000 men were killed, wounded, or lost on the battle field, sweeping over Europe, entirely changed the conditions there. The great military dynasties have been destroyed, and there has arisen in Germany on the ruins of the old government a new democratic government.

"In my judgment one of the greatest of the future republics of the world has been established within the boundaries of the old German Empire. The first article in the new constitution of the German Republic declares the same American principle on which all the work of the National Popular Government League is based, namely that the sovereignty of a nation is vested alone in the people. [Applause.] And when this principle is recognized, when the exercise of sovereign power comes from the people, representing in truth the heart of the people, the will of the people, it will be found that peace will reign on earth for all time. [Applause.]

"The women and children of Germany must be acquitted of the crime of having caused the war. They had no political power, they were the victims of war, they are to-day suffering; they are to-day paying the penalty of war in hunger, in poverty, in lack of housing, in physical and mental and moral weakness. I saw where were housed 11 human beings in a little bit of a damp room, without heat and with the rain trickling down the walls. I saw very many undernourished children there myself, and went into the hospitals and looked at them; saw children who had not been able to get milk on which to live; I saw them, myself, nothing but skin and bone, lying trembling between life and death—a part of the heritage of war.

"There comes from Germany a notable woman, Frau Schreiber [applause], who all her life has shown her love for human beings and love for women and children. She has been at the head of the Mother and Child Division of the Red Cross of Germany. She has long advocated the cause of women and has taken part in the woman suffrage movement that has at last enfranchised the women of the world, and of Germany. She has been for four years, nearly, and is now a member of the Parliament, or the Reichstag of Germany, honored by her own people; she is regarded as the Julia Lathrop of Germany.

"She comes to tell you something about the human element in Germany, and I know that you will receive that message with the sound, warm hearts which dignify and make honorable the great American people, hearts of sympathy, loving honesty, and loving justice, and loving mercy.

"I present to you Frau Adele Schreiber, of Germany." [Applause.]

ADDRESS BY FRAU ADELE SCHREIBER, MEMBER OF THE GERMAN REICHSTAG.

I shall try to speak clearly enough to be heard in this large room, but you will understand under what emotion I am at this moment. It is certainly one of the greatest days of my life—to be allowed to address here such a large audience, composed of some of the most prominent people of this great country; to come here as a woman of Germany, that country which is now suffering and on which for all these years has been put the blame for the war; to feel that in the interests of international peace and right understanding between peoples you are ready to welcome me as one of the citizens of that country and a woman of that country.

In introducing myself I want first to tell that I came to America as an individual, on my own account; that I am neither subsidized nor sent by any government, organization, or party. If you have anything to blame about what I do or say, it is myself as an individual that is to be blamed. I am not a propagandist. I am not a German by birth. I am an Austrian. I was born in Vienna. I did not go to Germany until I was fully grown up and was able to judge Germany more impartially. I became a German by the nationality of married women and I am now a member of the German Parliament. So I may say that I have two countries, and I hope I can be fair to both.

THE GERMAN LABOR PARTY.

I belong to the German Labor Party. The social democrats elected me to the Reichstag, and I trust I may make you understand that it is a party opposed to anything in the nature of hatred or militarism. The German Labor Party, like the English Labor Party, is not one of revolution by force. It calls itself the "Social Democratic Party," thus emphasizing that it believes in education, in democracy, in constitutional government; it is the strongest party in the new Germany, and without its support Germany can not continue as a Republic.

The German Labor Party, at that time split into two factors, was the largest party in the National Assembly of Weimar. It is now united and the strongest party in the actual Reichstag. It did not instigate the revolution which took place in 1918. However, when the change came, I think it is greatly to the credit of the leaders that they took the Government into their own hands and succeeded. Our revolution was not a wild revolution; very few acts of violence happened; even the great masses of our soldiers came home in perfect order. Twenty-two more or less big or little monarchies (comprising the German Kaiser's throne) were overthrown without harm done to anybody, and government of the people and for the people was established in accordance with the very principles your chairman, Senator OWEN, has so admirably spoken of here to-day.

The first act of the six "representatives of the people" intrusted with the provisional government after the revolution was to decline dictatorship, to call for a national assembly legalizing the Republic. For this national assembly the freest system of franchise was granted by an emergency law giving all men and women above 20 equal suffrage. Thus it was through labor the women of Germany gained the vote, and no government will dare take it from us! [Applause.]

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

It certainly is a unique fact in history that 41 women, elected to a national assembly, helped to make a constitution. And this new German constitution, one of the best and freest constitutions in the world, embodies the principles which your own Nation has given the world and many new features made necessary by modern development.

It was this idea of reconstruction, of building something new, of a great chance of freedom for the common people, that kept hope alive and the people courageous during that long period between the armistice and the signing of the treaty of Versailles. Starvation has been upon us for years. It continued even after the armistice, yet the suffering people did not despair. You hardly can realize what peace meant, especially to the German mothers and fathers, after the dreadful slaughter stopped, with the hope that the starving of children would cease.

Therefore, if people ask, "Why did your Labor Party consent to sign the treaty of Versailles when it contained a clause which laid the sole guilt of the war on your people?" I answer that no government could refuse in such a crisis, when millions and millions of hungry mothers and fathers were yearning for peace not only for themselves but principally for the salvation of their children. Yet the fact that the Progressive Party then in power as coalition government had to submit to the so-called "peace treaty," and that they did it by the signature of a man of labor who was compelled to sign, has militated against the success of the Republic. The reactionaries and monarchists, who dislike the new order of things, at once began to say to the people, "See what your new Republic has done. It has signed that clause putting the whole guilt of the war upon German people." This was the first blow against the new democracy, the beginning of the growing wave of reaction under which we had to suffer so much and are still suffering.

I trust you will understand and believe that if there ever was a nation mature for self-government it was Germany. While the old class system had kept down democratic forces, they were in active existence and developed quickly. Even under the old Germany we had many advanced institutions which were studied and copied by other nations. Our big system of social insurance tended to prevent pauperism, to develop independence and self-reliance. Old-age pensions, insurance against accidents and illness, allowances for mothers during their confinement—all this accustomed the working people of Germany to provide themselves in time of work for the time of need. For it must be understood that our so-called "State pensioners" had themselves greatly paid toward the funds out of which they draw. The people of Germany abhorred reliance upon charity; starvation alone has made them ask for relief and accept it with gratitude.

Our trade-unions were long before the war the most advanced and best disciplined in the world. Our schools, though we greatly complained of having too little liberalism, too little education for citizenship, and far too much drill, provided a decent basis of knowledge, and illiteracy was completely unknown. I do not believe the masses of any nation were better educated than those of Germany.

WHAT THEY HOPED FOR.

This had even been brought about at a time when progress went very slowly and had great difficulties to overcome. You will understand in what expectation and hope the people now welcomed self-government as an instrument to build up a far better country. It was our ideal to make Germany a leading democratic republic, right in the heart of Europe; to promote the progress of the world by making model laws and institutions in our country. They had told us over and over again there was no enmity against the German people, so we earnestly believed we would be permitted to play a part in the reconciliation of the nations. To establish our sincerity we were willing to make up whatever we could of the damages of war. But all our hopes failed; no reconciliation came; conditions went from bad to worse; many people, utterly discontented and disappointed, lost their faith in the new democracy, and starvation and sufferings paved the way for the return of reaction and junkerism.

I do not want you to believe Germans are angels; they are not and probably never will be. I do not want to shield the sins of the old régime and the old caste spirit. If I admired the bygone monarchical system I would not be in the Labor Party. Sensible people have always been very much opposed to a Godlike "Kaiserism," to court customs reminding one of old China before the abolition of the Chinese Wall. As far as permitted, it was joked about the Imperial family having itself called the "Allerhöchsten Herrschaften," which means the superhighest family, so that the papers reported of "the superhighest family having been to church to thank the highest." [Applause.] And the idea of "Godlikeness" had to a certain extent also spread into the army—there was a type of officer pretending to be superior to any mere civilian, be he the greatest genius.

There was also a certain type of business man, traveling around the world with the airs of superiority, boasting about German business, usually not the representative of really efficient great industry, which, even if one is opposed to unlimited capitalism, had, after all, a mission to fulfill, but the type of the frog in the old fable, who tried to look like a bull until he burst. [Applause.]

All these types have done decent Germany a lot of harm in the judgment of foreign countries, and as an Austrian I can perfectly feel it. But every nation has its good and bad sides, its good and bad specimens. I do not advocate that Germans are the best people in the world—let them only be appreciated as just as good and as bad as the people of other nations. [Applause.]

When the peace treaty was signed the masses did not realize their future fate. There was hope because the blockade ceased, because sacks of flour and barrels of lard were coming in from America and could be bought, and the people at last looked forward to some improvement. Foreigners of all countries rushed in to buy German goods at very low prices—one thought trade commerce were flourishing. But as the cheap goods went out we had to replace them with new goods made out of raw material secured in foreign countries, which had to be paid for in gold, hence a portion of our gold stock went out of the country. Also a flood of profiteers from foreign countries came into Germany, and all this added to the decline of German currency.

DESTRUCTION OF USEFUL THINGS.

The saddest thing, however, was that the value of the mark was forced lower and lower from the fact that machinery and things necessary to production and to life were taken out of the country. Out went the engines, the cars, the ships, and machines. Many things had to be destroyed, not only war materials but a large amount of machinery which could have served peace purposes. Everywhere we had perfect graveyards of destruction. You can see what that meant as an economic loss to the nation.

That was not all. Out went the domestic animals, horses, and cattle, especially milch cows, when we had so little milk that our babies were dying.

MILK FOR BABIES.

I had a little personal experience, not uninteresting to tell, by a letter exchange with the French suffrage organization. The treaty of Versailles claims, amongst all the rest, also the delivery to France and Belgium of 140,000 milch cows. Now, milk was the thing hardest for us to spare; already the health of the children had suffered severely; little ones above 2 years had to go without a drop of milk. Yet until May, 1920, we had only been able to give 130,000 cows whose milk yielding sufficed to the very severe prescriptions. Then in May, 1920, the Reparations Commission urged the immediate delivery of the rest of the cows, and there was a great protest of German mothers.

Our French-suffrage friends wrote me a letter asking whether what they had heard about this protest was true, and what the German women in Parliament thought about Germany evading to send the cows, though the French babies needed the milk badly.

We had a meeting of all the women of the Reichstag, and sent a reply signed by members of six parties. We told them that as women and mothers we felt all children in the world equally dear to our hearts, and that since French children needed milk they must have it. But we hoped that sufficient cows could be found for France from countries who had a surplus, without taking them away from a country where children were already starving. We begged them to consider that it was a question of life and death for our children, not of evading payment, and we asked them to come and investigate.

Unfortunately, our French friends had been told by their press so much about the ill will of Germany that they would not even believe in our sincerity. Their reply did not go into the question of the starving children, but emphasized the legal point of view, according to which we were to "make restitution" of a definite number of cows.

This little incident just shows how even in things of detail the Versailles treaty has been driving deadly blows at the nation as such.

REPARATIONS PAID TO DATE.

As to reparations, it is constantly said that Germany has not paid anything and has constantly practiced evasion. The Reparations Commission claims that Germany has paid about 8,000,000,000 gold marks; the French Professor Gides estimates it at 14,000,000,000; our German experts, especially Prof. Lujo Brentano, says that Germany, including private property losses in other countries, has paid a value of 55,000,000,000 gold marks. I do not ask you to take German statements. Take the brilliant work done here in Washington by the American Institute of Economics, which published a book entitled "Germany's Capacity to Pay," by Profs. Harold G. Moulton and Constantine E. McGuire. They value the payments by Germany at 26,000,000,000 gold marks. [Applause.]

This is at least five times as much as France paid after the short war of 1870 altogether, but for us it means only the beginning of payments. Do you realize that 26,000,000,000 gold marks is about half as much as the world's production of gold for 20 years? If you do, you will be able to answer the question as to why the German mark has depreciated.

The worst of everything is that the amount of the debt has never been fixed. If someone asked you to pay a bill, you would say, "Very well, how much is it?" But suppose the person should say, "Oh, I am not going to tell you that. Pay what I say and then I will tell you how much more you will have to pay." That is our situation. Read the documents of our foreign office and you will find a large collection of offers, offers, and offers made by our Government at different times in an attempt to find a settlement that would be acceptable, but our offers have always been rebuked and we do not know to-day what the bill is to be.

WHAT GERMANY HAS LOST.

We have lost by death and absolute disability in war 3,000,000 men, natives of Germany, as we could send no colonial troops into this war. We have a million and a half of crippled people. We have lost, roughly spoken, about 10 per cent of our population, 13 per cent of our continental areas, 15 per cent of our agricultural area, all of our colonies, 15 per cent of our corn, 18 per cent of our potatoes, 26 per cent of our coal, 40 per cent of iron, 30 per cent of steel, 75 per cent of iron deposits, 63 per cent of our zinc, 89 per cent of our merchant navy, etc., and still you will ask, "Why has the German mark depreciated?"

This all does not yet include our constant obligations of reparations and the loss we undergo through the foreign occupation. Fully one-fifth of the entire population within the German boundaries, over 12,000,000 people, are under the military domination of foreign troops.

CLAIMS OF REACTIONARIES.

Again, let me remind you that the militarists and reactionaries lay all the blame for our misery not upon the lost war and their own short-sightedness, but on the revolution and on the Republican Government. They work up the mind of unhappy and badly balanced young men, poison them with antirepublican and antisemitic hatred, instigate even political murder. The severest blow was the murder of Rathenau, one of our ablest statesmen, on whom we set great hopes as to leading us out of the financial chaos and finding some settlement concerning the reparations. As Minister of Reconstruction, Rathenau, before becoming Minister of Foreign Affairs, had tried his best to bring about an agreement concerning the devastated areas of France.

The French Government, however, dropped the arrangements made by Rathenau and the French Minister Loucheur. Then there was also a plan of reconstruction for a certain section of the devastated areas, agreed between the French trade-unions, the Confederation Generale du Travail, and the German trade-unions. The German delegates had been invited to France, heartily welcomed, and the reconstruction of 11 villages by German workmen had been accepted by the inhabitants. But the French Government stopped this also, because French profiteers were afraid things might be settled between the peoples of Germany and France without anybody profiteering. [Applause.]

On July 3, 1923, a French deputy disclosed before the French Parliament a whole series of the most shameless cases of profiteering going on in France as to the devastated areas. Before this, on February 29, 1923, the French Deputy Brousse also raised similar accusations.

ON THE RUHR OCCUPATION.

I have talked with very many people of foreign countries—ambassadors, business men, statesmen—and I have always been assured that the French went into the Ruhr not because they wanted payments of reparations or security; it is the Ruhr they wanted, the heart of industrial Germany, the rich coal mines which they desired at all events. I do not say the French common people wanted this. I am sure they did not; but the bad political leaders they now have want them, and they keep the truth from the French people and blindfold them in order to keep themselves in power, as bad politicians always do. [Applause.]

The Ruhr is of the greatest importance to Germany. It contains, roughly spoken, one-third of the entire goods traffic on railways, one-fourth of the boats on the rivers, three-fourths of the entire coal, 63 per cent of the iron production, and 64 per cent of the steel production. It is by far the most densely populated area in Germany, with 1,600 persons per square kilometer, and one of the most densely populated areas in the world. We did not believe until the last moment that the French would seize the Ruhr. People of the Ruhr and all Germany felt it as an unjust outrage that violated the treaty of Versailles, which it certainly did. [Applause.]

We had thought war ended, but this was war—a huge army, fully equipped, marching on an entirely peaceful populace working as hard as it could, overtime, to fulfill the coal reparations we were to give to France.

THE WHY OF PASSIVE RESISTANCE.

Why, now, did the German people, the miners and railway men, go into passive resistance? I have found that the true psychology has been understood far better in England than in America. Let me, therefore, explain.

Passive resistance was not organized by the militarists, but came right out of the heart of the people, the same people who had already proved that German militarism could no longer rule Germany. Passive resistance had already been put to the test in the short history of the German Republic on occasion of the famous adventure of Mr. Kapp, who, in 1919, tried to set himself up as a military dictator, marching into Berlin overnight, driving away the officials, and declaring himself to be the Government. The people went into passive resistance; not a hand or brain would work for him. Kapp had to quit, and the first attempt to destroy the German Republic was defeated.

I can not too strongly emphasize that the common people of Germany are not militarists but want peace with France and all other nations, as well as among themselves. And now you see we thought we could also in the case of foreign invasion demonstrate that passive resistance was a powerful thing and that the quiet will of a peaceful people would put an end to the idea of conquering. We thought this idea would appeal to the moral and liberal forces of the world, and so we Social Democrats stuck to the idea, which was a new one in history, and did all we could to give it practical application. We still believed that the democrats of the world would not be willing to see the German people become slaves, and you Americans can understand the Germans' desire for liberty at least. [Applause.]

Unfortunately this passive resistance, which might have succeeded had the nations of the world helped sooner, was broken down after nearly a whole year of unbearable sufferings by the pressure of starvation and the disorganization of German industrial life. This period left us, at least for the moment, practically ruined.

THE OCCUPATION.

And how did the invading armies behave? Naturally armies of occupation are never welcome anywhere. Yet remember—the people of the Rhineland never complained about the conduct of the American or English occupation armies. They did not want them withdrawn, for fear of being utterly at the mercy of French militarism—that shows the difference. And the splendid example of General Allen taking the leadership in the collection for the German children proves that even military occupation need not destroy human relations.

But the French troops and their commanders have inflicted upon the unhappy people of the Rhine and the Ruhr every humiliation, every suffering. They dispossessed the occupants of the houses, regardless of their fate; they took the schools and deprived many thousands of children of tuition and education; they claimed milk for officers whilst thousands of babies were doomed because they could get no milk; they forced upon the ruined country the expenses of furnishing apartments with all the luxury—carpets, pictures, crystals, leather chairs—whilst the population lacked shoes and shirts, and in this rich coal district had to go without coal or other fuel. Every place was turned also into a regular secluded prison inhabited by slaves, who had no rights, no justice. Impossible to describe their sufferings—150,000 have been driven from house and home, often at a few hours' notice; 5,000 have been imprisoned for obeying the laws of their country, not of the invaders, and over 2,800 have not yet been released. Our people have had to submit to all humiliations, especially also to outrages committed on women and children by white and African troops.

You will understand how hard it is for us constantly to be trying to soothe the people to overlook these cruel hardships and humiliations, not to cherish hatred against France, but to keep quiet, quiet, quiet, at things which make the blood of the most patient pacifist boil with indignation. All this is arousing more and more the spirit of hatred which we progressive people of Germany wanted so much to wipe out, and helps to pervert legitimate national feeling into deplorable "nationalism."

I turn now to the economic conditions. With the exception of a comparatively small class of profiteers and speculators, all Germany is in bitter need. The standard of life is incomparably lower than in pre-war time. It is not true that "Germans have done nothing to help themselves." Besides the help given to us so generously by foreign nations, especially by Americans, and for which we are deeply indebted to all who have contributed, German self-help, through State and community, organizations, and private people, is going on all over the country.

Just a few instances: Our farmers have taken 250,000 children from the industrial, mainly the occupied parts, offering them hospitality for six months, thus saving many lives. They send as gifts about 4,200 tons of foodstuffs every month to the various charity institutions of the towns. The trade-unions have done a great deal, even in giving the earnings of overtime hours, and there is a welfare organization of the working class, supported by the contributions of the laborers, extended over the whole of Germany. German industrials are giving big contributions, especially toward the maintenance of students and intellectuals; so are the members of the stock exchange. In every place there is a self-help, and neighborly help instituted by the women trying to provide free dinners, heated centers for the many people who have no fuel and light in their homes. Everywhere there are emergency actions of every type, all carried on with a true spirit of self-sacrifice and brotherhood. Poor people owning little bits of gardens in the suburbs give of the meager products they raise to the destitute old people. The German post employees have formed a charity organization and are now in Berlin alone keeping alive about 800 of the most needy inhabitants.

But all this is insufficient owing to the economic breakdown affecting so many millions. The companion of our life is hunger and despair. Hunger is with the old men and women, who faint in the streets; hunger sits at the desks of the children in the schools; hunger lingers by the babe in the cradle; hunger makes women revolt against the idea of new motherhood. Such is our tragedy.

INVERTED BOOTLEGGERS.

I know in your country it is charged that much of this misery is due to the fact that rich Germans have sent their capital out of the country. We would like this investigated so that we can know ourselves. We have strict laws against taking money out of the country. If you will tell me how much whisky is smuggled into the United States under the prohibition laws, perhaps I can tell you how much German capital goes outside of Germany under the law against the flight of capital. We are searched at the customs; our letters are opened, if they go to foreign countries, to find if we are sending money. But we have, of course, a kind of inverted bootleggers who take money out in spite of the law. We can not stop that any more than you can stop whisky bootlegging. [Applause.]

On the whole, from estimates I have seen, I do not think that the total amount could be more than from 3,000,000,000 to 4,000,000,000 of gold marks, which is only one-fortieth of the amount Premier Poincaré asks as reparations. If we took this whole amount and paid it to Poincaré, we would have no trade balance in foreign banks to carry on business. We could not buy cotton or raw materials, etc. You can quickly see that a certain amount of foreign balance is indispensable if we do not want the whole of German commerce and industry to break down completely.

DEPRECIATION OF THE MARK.

I am also asked over and over how far the German industrials have deliberately brought about the depreciation of the mark and caused the suffering of the German people. The party to which I belong has no reason to shield capitalist wrongs. Yet I do not believe that they deliberately instigated the depreciation of our currency, for which enough other reasons account for; but no doubt they took advantage of the situation which led to enriching a few already rich people whilst all the rest were impoverished. They also took advantage of the weakened position of our trade-unions to cut down wages and to lengthen working hours. Nevertheless, the disagreements between employers and employed in all countries is a question of internal politics, and, provided we could come back to a normal state, our trade-unions and our labor party would regain enough strength and influence to protect the just claims of our workmen against our own industrialists. In this case also, as you see, the French policy has been to the disadvantage of the common people and has lessened the influence of the progressive forces.

FRENCH MILITARISM.

The thing particularly bitter and hard to submit to is the fact that the money we pay for reparations is not used to promote reconciliation, but for building up a new huge militarism in the heart of Europe. France has not only built up an army in her own country, but in other smaller nations which she has financed, in such a manner that she could now at once call under arms 9,000,000 of trained men. We have had quite enough destruction in this world, and I think you Americans, who have made a war to end war, to stop militarism, can not be in favor of this new militarism in Europe. Things must again lead to war if universal disarmament can not be brought about.

WELCOME DAWES.

The German people welcome the Dawes commission. We hope it will thoroughly investigate. We know that when it investigates it will find that the German people are squeezed between French militarism and uprising German Junkerism. We hope they will find the profiteers and those who have taken money out of the country illegally and that they will devise ways to lead to a sound financial system. We do not want charity; we want to become self-dependent. We are thankful for the help you have given, but you will understand how much we desire to stand on our own feet again.

In conclusion, let me say that at least 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the German people will never revert to Kaiserism of their own wills. They have until now, suffering and destitute as they are, given in neither to monarchism nor to Bolshevism. They are looking forward to liberty and democracy and they hope the liberal forces of the world will not permit the people of Germany to be driven to despair by starvation and the entire breakdown of their industrial life. Give us the opportunity to recover and we will successfully defeat every dictatorship, be it that of the communistic Pied Piper or that of the old reactionaries and monarchists.

ADDRESS BY EX-SECRETARY DENBY.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, on Saturday last I asked unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address which ex-Secretary Denby made in his home town, and a short editorial printed by the St. Louis Star upon the matter. My colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], objected at the time. He is not in the Chamber at this moment, and therefore I want to make that announcement, for I again ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD the address which ex-Secretary Denby made on his return home, and a short editorial in the St. Louis Star of Friday last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the address and editorial will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, March 14, 1924.]

THOUSANDS CHEER DENBY IN DETROIT—FORMER NAVY SECRETARY WELCOMED HOME IN GREAT NONPARTISAN TRIBUTE.

(By the Associated Press.)

DETROIT, March 14.—"Ned" Denby, one-time gunner's mate on U. S. S. Yosemite, State legislator, Representative in Congress, three years Secretary of the Navy, a veteran of two wars, and now a major in the Marine Reserve Corps—"Ned" Denby came home yesterday.

The Edwin Denby that a nation knows was lost under a city's welcome to "Ned" Denby, who played football for Michigan in the eighties, struggled upward in the law, enlisted and served in the Navy in the war with Spain, and later enlisted and served with the marines in the World War.

THOUSANDS AT STATION.

Thousands swarmed the concourse at the Michigan Central Station as the former Cabinet officer arrived from Washington, and the route to the city hall, where the Denby party was welcomed by acting Mayor Joseph A. Martin, was lined with people. An afternoon of receptions, during which thousands reiterated to Mr. Denby their faith, culminated in a banquet in his honor at which representatives of virtually every walk of life and of all political parties were present.

It was "more like a launching than a going into dry dock," as one speaker said, noting the enthusiasm that greeted frequent mention of rumored future political activity by the former Secretary.

HONOR OF SECRETARYSHIP.

Mr. Denby said:

"When the Secretary of the Navy takes his oath of office he assumes an obligation as lofty as can be given to any citizen except the President of the United States. When he has spoken the few words embodied in that oath—to 'support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic'; to 'bear true faith and allegiance to the same'; and to 'faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God'—he has taken upon himself the burden and the lofty privilege of control and directing, under the Congress and the Commander in Chief, the first and greatest agency of defense.

"Thereafter he has no interest in life so compelling, no duty so stern, as to direct that agency so that it may always be ready to discharge its splendid mission, the defense of our country. In the Navy politics has no place. In the Navy self-seeking must not exist. To the Secretary and to all officers and men there must be but one thought—how best to make sure that our country shall be able always to repel invasion and to prosecute successful war.

"To the Navy all nations are friends and all nations potential enemies. For it must make the country safe from attack from every quarter. In an efficient navy ships and guns and mechanism must be of the latest and the best except in so far as governmental policy, evidenced by treaties, conceived in mutual confidence and respect, may limit armament. An efficient Navy must be a happy but disciplined force. Morale must be high, and the men of the service must be ready to die both in war and in peace for their country or their fellow men. And that is true of the American Navy.

TALES OF NAVY'S DARING.

"Our records are filled with tales of daring that excite the imagination and bring back the days of romance. There is not upon this earth a finer, clearer-thinking, more unselfish body of men and women. No matter what the order, whether the command of a superior or the decree of fate, it is taken with a cheerful 'Aye, aye, sir,' by the Navy. I had the honor recently, as Secretary, of conferring upon an enlisted man the medal of honor. This is what he had done:

"He was on a submarine when she sank. The men all escaped but one, who was trapped below, and would have died by the rush of water through an open hatch. This man, himself safe on the deck of the submarine, saw the danger, reentered the vessel, closing the hatch behind him, and sharing the risk of almost certain death with the comrade whose life he saved. Both, most happily, were rescued after many hours' imprisonment. He got what he richly deserved—the highest honor the Navy can confer. He is typical of the glory of the service. So much for the men.

"The women of the service are imbued with the same great spirit of acceptance of that which comes in the line of duty. Not long ago one of our ships—for as a citizen I can still say 'our' ships, though I am no longer a part of the splendid service—went on the rocks and was lost. The captain, in an effort to help some of the men, after long exposure, was beaten down by the crushing waves and lost his life. I wrote to the widow to offer her sympathy and to speak of the honor of his passing in the line of duty. This was her reply:

LETTER OF OFFICER'S WIFE.

"Letters expressing appreciation of my husband bring me deep joy, for we are comforted in knowing that the fine qualities of our loved ones are recognized by all."

"His new 'post of duty' has taken him temporarily a bit far from us, but he used to ask me not to cry when he went to sea—and so I am trying constantly not to cry now. There is so much to be very thankful for—H. G., Jr., and I try to think only of that."

"And she was only typical of the women of the service. They 'try not to cry' when their husbands go to sea, and that is morale. The Navy has it, and it is part of the Secretary's duty to stimulate that glorious spirit that puts the country first, a shipmate second, and self last.

"There is another thing a Secretary must try to do, and that is to see that proper provision be made so that the outer walls may hold—the walls of steel—against attack at any time, from any quarter. That needs thinking ahead and providing for the needs of the fleet. In trying to do that I have been overthrown. But I rejoice in the belief that the work is done. Fuel oil will be found in Hawaii for the on-rushing fleet if it ever is needed. And along the coasts, east and west, of our country great reservoirs will be found when and if the need ever comes. They will be created by exchange or sale or storage of the underground deposit, which, had it not been brought to the surface, would have been lost to the Navy forever.

NOT BOWED WITH SHAME.

"I will not mar this occasion by any argument, explanatory or defensive, in regard to the matter that has clouded my days and shadowed my nights. Only this will I say, lest you think I come home a repentant prodigal to receive your forgiveness for wrongs I may have done: I come neither asking forgiveness nor bowed down with shame, but proudly to proclaim to you that I have done no wrong nor aught that merits rebuke from you, my dearest friends, nor from them, my ruthless enemies.

"Rather let me say to you now that I have endeavored to do my duty as fully as God has given me power to do. If it be wrong to try to save that which I was charged to guard, then I have done wrong—not otherwise; if it be wrong to try to protect the homes of the American people from external attack and to place this country in a position for defense such as it has not had before, then I have done wrong—not otherwise.

"I believe that what I did was just and lawful and sound and for the best interests of the United States. It would be idle to answer those who say that I, who have loved my country and served it twice in military uniform; that I, who cherish for the great service of which I had the honor for three years to be the chief, the warmest affection and pride; that I, who look into your faces to-night and find there confidence, affection, and esteem, could have betrayed my country, the Navy, and you. There is an old verse—Byron's, I think—which I like to think of:

MANY HAVE HELPED HIM.

"Here's a tear for those that love me,
And a smile for those that hate,
And whatever sky's above me,
Here's a heart for any fate."

"So you shall not find me wearing my grievances, if I have any, upon my sleeve. You shall not be asked for sympathy, and I pray you do not give it, for I do not need it. You shall not be bored, now or hereafter, collectively or individually, with the recital of my woes, for I have none. It may be that the list of those persons whom I hold in contempt has somewhat increased in recent weeks, but you shall not know from me who those persons are. I would, were I able, however, tell of the myriads who have won into my heart by their tenderness and faith.

"Some things have been deeply impressed upon me that it is well for me to know, of my own bitter experience. We have all read and thought somewhat upon them, but not all have had the rare and great privilege of testing their truth in their own lives. Long has it been said that 'sweet are the uses of adversity.' Now I know what that strange phrase means. For from adversity has come strength to endure and courage to act—strength to endure the gibes of calumny, courage to do the hardest and, I think, the bravest thing I have ever done, to resign high office while still the malicious shafts of shame and ridicule were hurtling round my head.

TWICE WAR VETERAN.

"Twice before I have come home from war, back to Michigan, back to friendship, back to confidence and kindness. Now for the third time I come from war, made hateful by poisoned gas and base stratagems; from defeat without shame to welcome without flaw. By innuendo and even direct attack, for the first time in my life, my integrity has been assailed, vainly assailed, I make bold to believe, in the ears of those who hear me now or who will read my words in that greater voice, the press, anywhere in this well loving State of Michigan.

"But do you think I could have lived, bathed in filth from day to day, if I had not known there was no joint in the armor of my honor? We talk about good conscience, but we do not understand until the enemy is trying to crush heart and soul. Then between us and shame and despair good conscience and simple faith stand like guardian angels. These angels and a third stood ever keeping open the door of happiness and keeping out the demons of hate and bitterness. The third was my wife, born and living always in Detroit.

"When your wife can read day after day columns of abuse and denunciation and keep always a smile and never complain and never regret loss of honors, place, and position, so long as honor is unimpaired, the world has no weapon to break or embitter the soul. And from her, too, there will be no mourning or complaining of an unjust world.

FAITH IS STRENGTHENED.

"Of another thing, too, have I deep cause for sincere rejoicing—my faith in my brother men is strengthened not weakened by this political tempest which has broken down my little house and strewn it upon the ground. You can not imagine how immense the influence, the comfort of your letters and your messages; it has seemed as the letters and messages have fluttered in in a veritable storm of kindness and confidence, as though all Michigan, moved by a kindly, tender impulse, has determined to give comfort to my wife and me in the hour of our trial.

"And Michigan has not been alone in this brotherly crusade. The poison of each day has had its antidote, and through it all the star of loyalty has illumined the darkness. Thousands of whom I have never heard have voiced their resentment against the mockery of justice which has been seen in Washington.

"I am so egotistical to-night that you will scarce bear with me longer, I fear, but to-night is my night, is it not? And for auld lang syne you will let me tell you what you have done for me and how I think you have honored yourselves. Believe it or not as you will, you have made me a better man. You have strengthened my love for my fellow men. You have proved that the world is good, that the eternal verities still govern the affairs of men. From a heavy heart, laden with the joy of this home-coming, I thank you and pledge you that you will not regret your faith."

[From the St. Louis Star, March 14, 1924.]

EDWIN DENBY.

Few men have ever retired from public office in circumstances of adversity with greater honor than Edwin Denby, who was yesterday greeted by his fellow townsmen of Detroit with acclamations of the warmest affection and confidence upon his return home from Washington. On the occasion of his formal relinquishment of the duties of the Secretary of the Navy, last Monday, Mr. Denby received assurances of unqualified esteem from his immediate associates and from the personnel of the Naval Establishment. He was at once reinstated as a reserve officer of the Marine Corps, in which he served as a private in war time.

Last evening in Detroit the high regard of Mr. Denby's fellow citizens was given expression in a manner which indicates that the circumstances of his retirement from office have not lessened the admiration which is generally felt for a man who has been guided consistently in his public duties by consideration for the public welfare. Mr. Denby's judgment alone has been challenged in the course of the criticisms leveled at his part in the naval oil lease matter. His integrity has never been questioned. If the course he pursued was wrong, it was an error of understanding.

Measured against the misfortune of involvement in a procedure that, wholly without his knowledge, was tainted with fraud and corruption, the services rendered by Mr. Denby for his country are now to be recognized as worthy of the highest praise and approval. Such a measurement has been applied by the people of his home town. It is possible for them to appreciate the value of his work as the head of the Naval Establishment, into which he infused a spirit of cooperation that ranges from the humblest ranks of the enlisted force to the highest ranks of the commanding grades.

Throughout the desperately trying period of malignant attack by partisan opponents Mr. Denby bore himself with a courageous equanimity. He met the exigencies of a peculiar situation by tendering his resignation, not in acknowledgment of wrongdoing but for the sake of his chief in office, the real object of political attack. He went back to private life with no stain upon his character, with a high record of achievements for the development of the naval service, and, as yesterday's demonstration in Detroit attests, with the esteem of his fellow men. Such a demonstration may possibly be rated as an adequate compensation for the pains that have been lately suffered by a conscientious, capable citizen who accepted service in the administrative branch of the Government even as when need arose he sought and accepted service in the military ranks of his country.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have an order entered that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] be placed upon the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to take the place made vacant by the resignation of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that an order be entered to the effect that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] be assigned to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to take the place made vacant by the resignation of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH) announced his signature as Acting President pro tempore to the enrolled bill (H. R. 7039) to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved January 12, 1895, relative to the allotment of public documents.

CORPORATE PAYMENT OF EXCESS-PROFITS TAX (S. DOC. NO. 67).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 115 (submitted by Mr. Jones of New Mexico and agreed to January 9, 1924), information showing the amounts of net income and excess-profits tax, by industrial divisions and excess-profits tax brackets, reported to the Treasury Department in the corporation income and profits tax returns for 1921, which, with the accompanying data, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KENDRICK presented petitions of sundry citizens of Cheyenne, Douglas, and Glenrock, all in the State of Wyoming, praying for the repeal or reduction of the tax on industrial alcohol, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Republican Club (Inc.), of New York, N. Y., protesting against the adoption of the so-called "equal rights" amendment to the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of the Slovenke Sokolice, St. 442, S. N. P. J. (fraternal organization of Yugoslav people), of Cleveland, Ohio, protesting against the passage of selective immigration legislation, and especially against the proposal to register, photograph, and fingerprint immigrants, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the Topeka (Kans.) Federated Organization favoring the passage of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of Homer White Post, No. 66, the American Legion, of Hiawatha, Kans., favoring the passage of legislation granting adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Linwood, Strong City, and Cottonwood Falls, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CURTIS presented a resolution of the Association of Mechanical and Power Plant Employees of the Rock Island Lines, of Horton, Kans., protesting against the making of any amendment to the transportation act of 1920 at this time, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry employees of the Kansas City Southern Railway Co., of Pittsburg, Kans., remonstrating against making any change in the transportation act of 1920 at the present session of Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Reserve Officers' Association of Sedgwick County, Wichita, Kans., favoring necessary appropriations for the Officers' Reserve Corps and the maintenance and development of the organized reserves of the Army in accordance with War Department recommendations, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution of the Rice County Merchants' Association, of Lyons, Kans., favoring the passage of legislation providing a 1-cent drop letter rate, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Lawrence, Kans., favoring the passage of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial, numerous signed, of sundry citizens of Shawnee County, Kans., remonstrating against the use of the 1910 census as a quota basis in proposed immigration legislation, but praying that the quotas be based on the census of 1890, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of Clyde M. Best, commander Lawton Camp, No. 18, United Spanish War Veterans, Department of Kansas, of Wichita, Kans., praying for the passage of more advantageous pension legislation affecting Spanish War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Lawton Camp, No. 18, United Spanish War Veterans, Department of Kansas, at Wichita, Kans., favoring the passage of House bill 5034, to pension soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. LANSBOR) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Frederic, Grantsburg, and Luck, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying an amendment to the Constitution guaranteeing equal rights to men and women throughout the United States and every place subject to its jurisdiction, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of the Hartford Grade Teachers' Club, of Hartford; the Loggia Gabbrielle D'Annunzio, No. 745, Sons of Italy, of Thompsonville; of citizens of Italian descent of New Haven, Waterbury, Danbury, Meriden, and Naugatuck, and of Harmony Lodge, No. 711, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, of Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill as being discriminatory, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce, of New Haven; the Hearststone Club, of Hartford; and members of the Willimantic Ministers' Union, of Willimantic, all in the State of Connecticut, favoring the passage of the so-called Johnson immigration bill, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented petitions of Arable Temple, No. 40, A. E. A. O. Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, of New Haven, and the Hartford Branch, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of Hartford, both in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented papers and a telegram in the nature of petitions of William H. Gordon Post, No. 50, the American Legion, Department of Connecticut, of Ansonia; of sundry citizens of New Haven, and of Oscar W. Swanson Post, No. 67, the American Legion, of Thompson, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of legislation granting adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of United Spanish War Veterans, Department of Connecticut, of South Manchester, and of A. G. Hammond Camp, No. 5, United Spanish War Veterans, of New Britain, both in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Spanish War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution of Sedgwick Camp, No. 4, Sons of Veterans, United States of America, Division of Connecticut, of Norwich, Conn., favoring the passage of legislation granting a pension of $72 per month to veterans of the Civil War and $50 per month to their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Bristol, Wethersfield, Windsor, Scotland, and Waterbury, and of Mrs. Sadie C. Kimball, of Scotland, all in the State of Connecticut, praying an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of Sarah A., Reda L., and J. I. Brereton, of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of legislation establishing a permanent commission to supervise, control, and regulate the rental of real property in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HARRELD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2159) authorizing annual appropriations for the maintenance of that portion of the Gallup-Durango Highway across the Navajo Indian Reservation and providing reimbursement therefor (Rept. No. 269); and

A bill (H. R. 2876) to provide for the payment of claims of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota for back annuities (Rept. No. 270).

Mr. HARRELD, also from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 192) to provide for a girls' dormitory at the Fort Lapwai Sanatorium, Lapwai, Idaho (Rept. No. 271);

A bill (H. R. 472) to authorize the deposit of certain funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of Navajo Tribe of Indians and to make same available for appropriation for the benefit of said Indians (Rept. No. 272);

A bill (H. R. 2812) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands not longer needed for the Rapid City Indian School (Rept. No. 273);

A bill (H. R. 2877) providing for the reservation of certain lands in New Mexico for the Indians of the Zia Pueblo (Rept. No. 274);

A bill (H. R. 2878) to authorize the sale of lands allotted to Indians under the Moses agreement of July 7, 1883 (Rept. No. 275);

A bill (H. R. 2883) to validate certain allotments of land made to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin (Rept. No. 276);

A bill (H. R. 3684) for the enrollment and allotment of members of the Lac du Flambeau Band of Lake Superior Chippewas, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 277);

A bill (H. R. 4117) authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a road within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., and for other purposes (Rept. No. 278);

A bill (H. R. 4803) to authorize the sale of lands and plants not longer needed for Indian administrative or allotment purposes (Rept. No. 279); and

A bill (H. R. 4804) to authorize the allotment of certain lands within the Fort Yuma Indian Reservation, Calif., and for other purposes (Rept. No. 280).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2844) to place the agricultural industry on a sound commercial basis, to encourage agricultural cooperative associations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 2845) granting a pension to Louis O'Boyle; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 2846) granting a pension to Herschel C. Young (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2847) for the relief of Eric M. Grimsley; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2848) to validate an agreement between the Secretary of War, acting on behalf of the United States, and the Washington Gas Light Co.; and

A bill (S. 2849) to fix the salaries of officers and members of the United States park police force, District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURSOM:

A bill (S. 2850) granting an increase of pension to Ascencion Salazar de Wheeler; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DIAL:

A bill (S. 2851) to provide for the grading of Franklin Street between Rhode Island Avenue and Nineteenth Street NE.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2852) providing for the cancellation and remittance of taxes against the estate of Charles L. Freer, deceased; to the Committee on Finance.

SPECIAL ASSISTANT CLERKS TO SENATORS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 192), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That all Senators may employ during the remainder of the present session of Congress and during the next ensuing session of Congress such special assistant clerks as the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate may find and certify to the Secretary of the Senate as necessary for the prompt and efficient performance of clerical work of Senators, such clerks to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,600 per annum each.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. WILLIS. I ask that the amendment to the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The READING CLERK. In line 3 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], before the word "years," the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] moves to strike out the word "six" and to insert the word "four," so as to read:

He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection.

Mr. WILLIS. On the amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. On what are we about to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now proceeding to vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], after the words "term of" to strike out the word "six" and to insert the word "four."

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], and for the present I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], with whom I have a general pair, is absent from the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. HARRELD (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 70, as follows:

YEAS—4.
Adams	Harris	Underwood	Willis
NAYS—70.
Ashurst	Ernst	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	Ferrie	McKellar	Shields
Bayard	Fess	McKinley	Shipstead

Cummins	Greene	McCormick	Sterling
Dial	Johnson, Calif.	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Edwards	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Wheeler
Elkins	King	Reed, Mo.
Fernald	La Follette	Simmons

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May the amendment be read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, after line 3, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years; and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection.

The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] which has just been read. I am wholly unable to agree with those who insist that unless the President of the United States has the incentive of a second term he will not discharge his duties either efficiently or patriotically. That seems to be the objection to the amendment—that the only way we can get efficient and good service out of a President is to dangle before his eyes the prospect of renomination and reelection. If that kind of a man should find himself in the Presidency, it would certainly be well to have his tenure of office limited. If a President should have no interest in America other than that he might himself continue in office, he ought never to have been put in office. On the other hand, we know that if a man finds himself in the office of the Presidency he is beset and assailed by every person who hopes to influence his course of conduct for his own advantage by either holding out promises of support or threats of opposition.

We now know that at the coming Republican National Convention, which is to meet in Cleveland, there will be delegates from some of the States south of the Mason and Dixon line who are to cast their votes for the present occupant of the White House because they hope that he is to be reelected and they are to be reappointed. The present system under which the President is eligible for reelection makes possible just such things. Who believes, for instance, that the great Republican Party would submit to having all of its policies dictated by the 11 Southern States that never have and never will cast an electoral vote for its candidates if it were not for the power which the President has to reappoint them if he is reelected? It brings, I think, a threat of menace to our Government to have the President, from the day he is inaugurated, a candidate for reelection.

It is not a charge that the President is not a good man and that he does not do all that any human being can do to resist the influences that are brought to bear upon him, but the present system makes it impossible for him always to discharge the duties of his office as he would if he himself, with his own natural desire to be vindicated by renomination, if that were possible, and his party, which is always urging him so to play politics that he can be renominated and reelected, knew that he could not be chosen to succeed himself. If that possibility were removed, I take it for granted there would be a very great deal less of politics in the White House and a very great deal more of efficiency.

Though I am perfectly willing to accord to those who differ from me their full right of opinion and the honesty of their motives, it strikes me that there is not much real argument to support the theory that the President ought to be eligible for reelection. I can not think of any good purpose that can be subserved by the inevitable fact that when a man finds himself in the Presidency he must at once commence a campaign for reelection.

I know that the present Attorney General would not be in office at this minute if it were not for the fact that he has or is suspected of having certain political influence, and the present President is amenable to that influence and keeps him there. Although the party leaders in the Senate, if the newspapers may be believed—and the story has not been denied—including the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] have been pleading with the President, for the good of the party, if not for the good of the country, to drop the present Attorney General, he does not dare to do so for political reasons. If he were not a candidate, it would not take any persuasion upon the part of the party leaders in the Senate to have him change his Attorney General when the country has lost confidence in him. He would be changed, and we know it. There are dozens of such situations that might arise. Possibly they would not reflect upon the character of the President—and I am certainly not criticizing him in this particular instance—but I am pointing out a fact that everybody knows, that when a President is a candidate for reelection every sinister political influence in his party at once tries to sway his course and to dictate his policies, with the threat that if he does not yield they will hurt him, and if he does they will support him. Whether in the office of President or out of office, men, after all, are but human beings. There is a pride in a man who is in office, if he is eligible for reelection, to be renominated and reelected. It is felt a stigma if he can not be renominated and reelected, and therefore he seeks it, and sometimes plays politics, to the hurt of his country.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on Saturday made a very able argument against this amendment, and yet there is such a provision in the constitution of his own State, that a governor can not be reelected. Many of the States have that provision, and I have never yet known a State, after trying that provision, to repeal it. The State of Virginia has such a provision in its constitution. Florida has it; many other States have it.

If it be wise to limit the right of reelection of the executives in the States to one term, with no hope of renomination or reelection, how infinitely wiser is it to have the same provision in our national Constitution? I can not conceive of any man making a less acceptable President because he could not be reelected.

On the other hand, I think it is the most unfortunate argument to suggest that a President would not listen to the voice of the people, would not try to conduct his office so as to meet the approbation of the people, if he could not be reelected. In other words, that his sole idea is to be reelected. On the other hand, it would free him, we all know, from those influences that sometimes wreck administrations. I know there would be a better administration of the affairs of this Nation if a man stood face to face with this situation: "I am President of the United States. History is to judge of me and my administration by what I do during this term of office. I have nothing to fear from politicians. I have nothing to hope for but the approval of my conscience and my countrymen. I have nothing to do except to discharge my duty and leave my record to posterity."

I hope that this amendment, limiting the term of office to six years, may be agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose a President and Vice President are elected, and the President serves, say, 5 years and 11 months, and dies, and the Vice President succeeds him for the remaining month. Under the proposed amendment would the Vice President, simply because he had served the 30 days, be ineligible to succeed himself or to be elected President thereafter?

Mr. CARAWAY. Has the Senator the amendment before him?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the amendment before me. I am just asking for information. I know that the Senator is an excellent lawyer, and I should like to have his judgment about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not think it would apply to the Vice President, because of this language. The amendment says:

"He shall hold his office during the term of six years, and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection."

A Vice President who succeeds a President by reason of either death or removal has not been elected to that office, and therefore I hardly think he would come within the provisions of this amendment. I think he would be eligible for election.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the present situation, which the Senator has just discussed, the amendment would not apply?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; that is true, but I think the people will apply the rule to the present occupant of the White House; so that does not worry me much.

Mr. President, as I said, I shall support this amendment. I do it notwithstanding the plea of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NEHRG] that we refrain from incorporating it in the joint resolution because he fears that it will endanger the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment that the Senate is now considering. I do not think so. I think it will strengthen it, and with that idea in view I shall vote for it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the merits of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. I think it a subject worthy of much consideration and discussion before it is disposed of. I should prefer to have it come here as a separate proposal, and I shall vote against it for the reason that I think it ought to come here as a separate proposal and receive such consideration as a separate proposal would likely receive.

I have heretofore, when the matter has been here for consideration, opposed the proposition of limiting the term of the President to one term. I confess there are some very strong arguments in favor of the proposition, but it has seemed to me heretofore that the stronger argument was against it; but I am voting against it at this time without committing myself on the merits of the matter, for the reason that I prefer to have it come here as a separate proposition. I think it is worthy to stand upon its own merits. I think, also, that it will undoubtedly jeopardize the adoption of the constitutional amendment. I am quite sure that if it is added to the original amendment it will lead to a long discussion in this Chamber, and that it will likely lead to prolonged discussion elsewhere; and I should like, therefore, to see the two propositions stand separate and apart.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I said the other day that I felt friendly to the proposition of limiting the term of the President to six years, and making him ineligible to reelection. I do not mean to say and did not mean to say that I was definitely concluded, and had closed my mind to argument, but I feel that way. It seems to me, however, that it is a serious mistake to try to put that amendment on the pending joint resolution. We have gotten into a discussion right away that shows that the matter ought to have more consideration. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], to illustrate why this amendment should be adopted, gave the instance of the present Attorney General being held in office because the President did not dare discharge him for fear of political opposition in his candidacy; and yet it develops that if this amendment were part of the Constitution to-day President Coolidge would not be disqualified from renomination and reelection to that office, and any man will reach that conclusion when he reads the amendment.

There is, however, still another reason. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia says:

The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

And there is no "follows." If we should add it to the joint resolution just as it is, we would then have the original joint resolution adopted as the twentieth amendment to the Constitution, and after putting this in between the third and fourth sections we would have this language:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years; and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection.

The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

And that is the end of it. It would be meaningless, it seems to me, even if we wanted to add it as it is proposed to add it here. So I hope the Senate will vote down this amendment, and if we ever take it up let us take it up as a separate proposition.

Mr. McCORMICK obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCORMICK. I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask that the amendment be amended by striking out lines 5 and 6. That will meet the objection of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to join my opinion to that of these other Senators, because it seems to me that the subject of the presidential term and that of the inauguration and the first assembly of the newly elected Congress are quite separate. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska would accomplish a great reform and, for one, I shall vote for it without hesitation if it be submitted independently; but if his proposed amendment be amended to fix the presidential term at six years, for one I shall feel constrained to vote against the amended amendment, and perhaps to go further and, in so far as my little influence may carry, urge others outside of this Chamber to do likewise.

There is strong argument in favor of a single presidential term. Nevertheless, like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I am by no means convinced that we ought to establish a single term, and a term of six years, by amendment to the Constitution. Let the two proposals be separated and be considered separately and voted upon separately, not only in Congress but by the legislatures of the States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I realize that there are very strong arguments on both sides of the question of one term for our Presidents; but I am constrained to believe that six years might be entirely too long for a weak or vacillating or inefficient President, and perhaps for a strong, splendid, excellent President six years would be too short a term. So far as I am concerned, I see no real objection to the present term of office, with the unwritten law as we have it, that he may succeed himself for one term; and therefore I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as at present advised, I shall vote against this amendment. I think it ought to be a separate proposition. As a separate proposition, I do not favor limiting the term to six years and not permitting a reelection of the President.

The only object of an amendment of this kind would be to get the best administration of the presidential office. That is a purpose sought by all. I can readily see that there can be arguments pro and con. The argument for this amendment is that a President elected for six years would perform his duties conscientiously, and without any selfish desire to obtain reelection to the office, and administer it accordingly, uncontrolled by any selfish interest.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. Not right now. I will yield in a few minutes.

That is the argument presented for a six-year term; but if a man is elected for four years, he can get the office a second time only by having an administration that is acceptable to the country, that is beneficial to the country; and if his administration has not been acceptable to the country, he is not reelected.

I have an idea that when the President has a desire to be reelected, and when he knows that the only possibility of a reelection is through his giving an acceptable administration, he will have an inducement to give an administration acceptable to the country, and in accord with its views, principles, and convictions. That is the principle upon which popular government is based; that the people should have their views, their convictions, and their ideas of Government administered and put into execution. I think if the President is elected for six years, and is made ineligible for reelection, he will have no inducement to carry out any but his own views and convictions, and he would not be influenced by the popular will and desires in this country.

Who knows that the views and convictions of the President are wiser and more farseeing than the views, principles, and convictions of 110,000,000 people? I have an idea that popular government is based upon the principle that the people know better than any one man, that the aggregate wisdom of America is greater than the wisdom of any one man. Consequently, I believe that when we secure a means by which the will, desires, and convictions of the people can be executed rather than the will and desires and convictions of one man we are establishing popular government.

I believe our fathers wisely limited the Executive to four years. If the President has an acceptable administration, if it is such an administration as has been beneficial to the people, he will be reelected, and custom has so fixed it that no man has been—and I do not believe ever will be—reelected successively for three terms. With the customs and traditions which have been established I think our fathers did wisely when they gave the President four years to show that he was acceptable as an Executive, to show whether he was in accord with the views and convictions of the country, and if a President makes good he ought to have an opportunity to be reelected. There is nothing he can do to secure his reelection which would be inimical to the interests of the country. The only way he can be reelected is by having an administration acceptable and beneficial. If the President is reelected, the conditions and customs of this country limiting him to two terms, he is prevented from a long continuance in the office so as to produce any ill to the country.

I do not believe this provision of the Constitution can be improved upon, and as at present advised, and with the consideration I have given to the subject, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, and I shall certainly vote against its being added as an amendment to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the question involved in the constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has to do merely with the mechanics of governmental administration. The proposition involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has to do with a question fundamental in the structure and theory of our constitutional system.

The amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska has been before us for consideration for a long time. Most of us have been able to give thought and study to it, and we are prepared to vote on it one way or the other. The other proposition, while it is not unfamiliar to us, is a matter of academic discussion, is relatively new as a matter of concrete proposal requiring action. We have not given it the consideration which it deserves and should receive before affirmative action is taken upon it.

I have observed that in this body amendments seldom receive the degree of attention and consideration which is given to the principal proposal. Senators vote upon an amendment in some degree influenced by their desire to effectuate or defeat the original measure. It is a great public question which is advanced by the proposal of the Senator from Georgia. It is distinct in character, distinct in nature, from the principal proposal.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Is it not true, from the standpoint of general public discussion, that the proposal suggested by the Senator from Georgia has really received the attention of the country to a very much greater extent than the purely mechanical change suggested by the Senator from Nebraska? Has it not been the subject of general discussion, and, as pointed out by the Senator from Arkansas, is it not adhered to in many States through provisions in the State constitutions confining the governors to a single term? It has been a subject which has been given very much more consideration than the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, has it not?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I would answer the Senator from New Jersey by saying that I think he is right—that there has been a great deal of academic consideration given to this question and a great deal of discussion of it in magazines and the papers. It has been a matter of popular consideration for some time. I have yet to find, however, that it has received in this body the amount of consideration which it seems to me it ought to receive before we are asked to act upon it affirmatively. I wish to reserve to myself entire freedom of decision respecting how I shall vote when it is presented separately from other propositions, and in such fashion that we may focus our attention exclusively on it. But at present one great problem of constitutional amendment is all that I am capable of considering at a time, and I very much hope that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia will be defeated, to the end that we may focus our attention upon the matter which is more properly and directly before us.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, personally I am more interested in the provision to limit the tenure of office of President to one term, and to make the President ineligible for reelection, than I am in the constitutional amendment presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] has said that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is fundamental. That is true. On the other hand, it is true that it is a proposition which has been discussed by the American public for years. I believe there is a well-defined sentiment in the country to-day in favor of changing the Constitution so as to make the President ineligible for reelection.

The constitutional amendment urged by the Senator from Nebraska, on the other hand, simply provides for a change of the time of the inauguration. I do not see that it is very material. It has not appealed to me, nor have the arguments made in its support appealed to be, as being very material. I do not see that it is material whether the President is inaugurated on the 4th of March or inaugurated on the first Monday in January.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRELD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator listened to the debate which has been going on here for a week in regard to this amendment, and reached the conclusion that the only point in the amendment to the Constitution is that the date of the inauguration shall be changed? I would not snap my finger to get a change in the date of the inauguration. I do not think that has moved a single person for or against the proposed constitutional amendment. It is practically not involved, as far as that is concerned. Nobody cares about it.

Mr. HARRELD. I did not mean to say it had not impressed me, but I do say that it is not as important as this other question. What I intended to say was this, that the people are getting tired of amending the Constitution. We can not go before the people every day with a new amendment to the Constitution, and it is well that it is so. I am not complaining about it. It is a condition which we ought to expect. It ought to be difficult to amend the Constitution. There is a feeling in the country that the Constitution should be amended only occasionally, when there is a special reason for doing so. If these two propositions are separated, as has been argued, and we go ahead and adopt the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska without the amendment added to it, we will have killed the chance for getting the proposition involved in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia from being ratified by the legislatures of the various States of the Union, in my judgment. So I see no reason for separating them at all. Why not cover the whole field while we are at it?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARRELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I want to confirm what the Senator has just stated, and in reference to the observation made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] that the question has not been matured, it might be well to recall that originally, in the Constitutional Convention, when the report was made by the committee on the executive, it was recommended that there should be a term of seven years and that the President should be ineligible for reelection. That matter has been before the country almost every year in some form or other. It strikes me that it is a subject which has been very well matured, and especially in the light of the burdens of the last few Presidents, including President Wilson and President Harding. There is no doubt in my mind that the thing which wears most upon the Presidents is the burden placed upon them by party leaders to give their attention to party matters instead of being free to devote themselves to the large measures pertaining to the Government, and from that point of view alone it seems to me we ought to relieve this situation.

Mr. HARRELD. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his suggestion. I am in full accord with what he has said.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRELD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. My belief is that several of our Presidents have spent as much time in naming their successors as they spent in naming themselves the first time. Jackson spent a great deal more time in putting Van Buren into the Presidency than he did in electing himself the second time. I doubt very much if the object which we would all like to attain, relieving the President of this political obligation to look after his party, and so on, could be attained in that way. He would still be the party leader. As the head of his party he would still be interested in naming his successor.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I do not agree that the adoption of the amendment would relieve the President from the obligation of looking after his party interests. There is this restraint still left on the President: He wants to make good; he wants to carry out the platform on which he was elected. He wants the approval of the public, and that is sufficient, in my judgment, to hold him in line and cause him to give to the country the very best and most efficient service of which he is capable.

There is another phase of this I want to mention, that we have in this country now a well-defined policy, if not a law—and it is not a law—that no President can be elected for a third term. We frequently have Presidents who serve for two terms, and I believe I can say without fear of contradiction that the second terms of our Presidents are always better and more commendable than the first, because to a certain extent there is removed that feeling of obligation the President has that he has to do certain things in order to reelect himself, the very thing we are fighting against in the attempt to have an amendment of this sort adopted. I believe, I will repeat, that the second terms of our Presidents, when they know they are not candidates for reelection, will stand the test of scrutiny, will stand the test of history, better than the first terms. Of course, somebody might say that was partly due to the fact that they had had more experience and were therefore better qualified to perform the duties of the office; but it is also in part due to the fact that they have no further obligations of a political nature to serve.

So I want to say that for myself I am more in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia than I am for the original proposition urged by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] stated in his remarks that this whole question ought to be handled now, as I understand it. That gives rise to the thought as to whether or not the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia does handle the whole question. Under the Constitution as at present Senators are elected for six years, Presidents are elected for four years, and Members of the House of Representatives are elected for two years.

That spacing, as it were, of the respective terms of office was done, I imagine, with a purpose in view, and a very sound purpose. We can not proceed to change the length of term of the President without dislocating very severely the logical and normal contacts between the President and the Senate and the President and the House.

Assume for the moment that we are to have our Presidents serve for six years and that we make no change in the matter of the terms of Members of the House of Representatives. At the end of the second year of the President's term of six years a new House of Representatives will be elected. That House, when it gathers here at Washington, may turn out to be of opposite political faith from the President. That has happened many times in what we term by-elections. At the end of the fourth year of the President's term another House of Representatives will be elected. Supposing that it, too, is composed of a majority of Members opposed politically or otherwise to the policies of the President still in office and still with two years to serve, we shall have tied our Government into a hard and fast knot. Four years out of the total of the President's six-year term would be characterized by a deadlock between the House of Representatives and the President.

We have already experienced deadlocks, as it were, partial or complete, existing during the second two-year period of a presidential term of four years, and every Senator knows that such a deadlock, partial or complete, is a source of embarrassment and that the efficiency of Government is handicapped. A part of the people in the country believe that the policies of the President should still be in complete force and effect, but at a by-election a majority, and it may be a mere plurality, of the people have decreed that a House of Representatives of opposite political faith shall attempt to impose its will upon national policies for the second two years of the presidential term. Nearly all of us have witnessed that state of affairs. The Senator from Georgia proposes that such a thing shall be possible not only for two years but for four years. That is too long a period for a deadlock in the conduct of national affairs at Washington to exist or to be tolerated.

Two years for a Member of the House, four years for the President, and six years for Senators. There is a logical reason, in my judgment, for that spacing. I assume that the men who wrote the Constitution believed that Senators should outlast the President by two years in the length of their term of office.

I assume they reached that conclusion in order that the Senate, being intended as a continuing body, should exercise a degree of independence from executive control which it was hoped would lift it above those extremely partisan political motives in which it was expected another branch of the legislature should indulge as the immediate and responsive representatives of the people.

If we are going to change the term of the President we would better think very carefully as to whether we ought not to change the term of the Members of the House of Representatives. If the President is to serve a six-year term is it not logical and wiser and safer for Members of the House to serve a three-year term and only have one by-election in the midst of a presidential term? If the President is to serve a six-year term is it not in the interest of properly conducted national affairs that Senators should serve an eight or nine year term and keep the Senators, or at least a portion of them, as they go out by thirds, for a longer term even than the President?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that the argument as to the length of the Executive term ranged in the convention from an annual election to an election for a six-year term.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It did.

Mr. FESS. They fixed the time of the legislative body first, that being in the first article of the Constitution. Then they made the Executive's term the average between the House and the Senate. I think it is more arbitrary than anything else.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it was something else than arbitrary. I think it was logical. I think the men who wrote the Constitution in 1787 were doing something more than an arbitrary act when they spaced those terms. They knew what they were doing. They wanted the House of Representatives quickly responsive to public sentiment and they made the term a short term and had the members elected directly by the people in the congressional districts. They wanted the President to serve a longer term than the Members of the House of Representatives in order to give greater stability to the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely want to make a suggestion. Instead of being arbitrary, it was directly in line with the system of checks and balances which they provided all the way through the Constitution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly so. The President was to be secure for four years and the House of Representatives for only two. The House was supposed to respond almost immediately to changing popular sentiment and the President to be, perhaps, a little resistant, and to have four years' time in which to work out his policies and problems. The term of Senators was made six years as a sort of balance wheel and to make the Senate, as I understand it from reading the minutes of the convention of 1787, somewhat independent of the Executive. Many of our rules and customs in the Senate, especially those in vogue in executive session, were really established in the first instance in order to protect the Senate from Executive dictation, and the length of a Senator's term is a part of that program.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Originally the Senate was made elective by the legislatures of the several States. The Senators were chosen by the legislatures. They were given long terms, the object being to remove them from popular influence and to make them in a sense independent of public opinion or to a degree independent of public opinion. A few years ago the Congress, evidently believing it necessary to bring the Government closer to the people rather than to remove it farther from them, submitted and the States ratified an amendment to the Constitution making Senators elective by popular vote. They are now chosen just as Representatives in Congress are chosen.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON. This amendment is a proposal to remove the Government, in so far as it relates to the Executive, farther from the people. This is a proposal to make the Executive less responsive to popular will. This is a proposal directly contrary to that which we approved a few years ago when we authorized the election of Senators by popular vote, and the question is, Does the Senate at this time think that it is necessary and desirable to remove still farther from the public the executive branch of the Government? It can have no other effect.

In the same connection, may I ask the Senator a question? The legislative branch of the Government is presumed to be responsive in a degree to public sentiment. The legislative branch of the Government, more than any other department, is concerned with questions of policy. When a law is passed the primary duty of the Executive is to enforce that law. While it is true that the President, as the leader of his political party and the executive head of the Nation, is concerned very greatly with questions of policy, yet it is also true that the legislative department of the Government is concerned primarily with questions of policy.

Now, do not the same arguments which can be made in favor of removing the Executive from the people, so that he will have less motive than he has now to respond to public sentiment, apply with equal or greater force to United States Senators? United States Senators were originally given terms of six years and made elective by the legislatures in order that they might stand between the expression of radical popular will and the reflection of it in governmental affairs. But we have seen fit to change that, and if the argument is sound with respect to the Executive, I ask if it is not equally sound with respect to the election of United States Senators? This amendment should be dealt with as a separate proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the argument is sound one way, it of course would be sound the other. I think it is unsound in the first instance.

I shall not detain the Senate any longer. I was about to say the old men, but to be historically accurate I should say the young men, who wrote the Constitution in 1787 got it about right in this regard, just about right. They may have made one little error of omission, but George Washington cured that when he announced his own intention and established the tradition to the effect that no President should accept a third term of office.

Mr. RALSTON. Mr. President, as a rule I am inclined to follow the legislative suggestions of my distinguished friend from Georgia, Senator HAMMIS, but in this instance I do not share his views as regards the proposal to limit the term of the President to six years.

It has been suggested in support of the amendment that certain States limit the terms of their respective governors to four years. That is the case in my State, and it has been found to work very satisfactorily. But it appears to me that that is not an argument in favor of the proposed amendment. I think the President of this country sustains quite a different relation to the people of our Nation than does the governor of a State sustain to the people of his State. I can easily imagine a condition that might make it most disastrous for the people of this country to be denied the right to reelect a President. I can imagine an international relation existing between this country and a foreign nation in which the two nations might be involved in war with one another, when the President then occupying the White House would have the whole situation in his hands and would be perfectly familiar with what was best to be done to conserve the interests of this Nation and those of civilization. I say that it is not hard to imagine a condition when it would be most disastrous to ask the people to deny themselves the right in an international controversy to continue their President for a second term or for a longer period of years.

It was very properly suggested by a Senator who has preceded me that by public opinion we practically now in this country limit a President to two terms. I think it was Lincoln who said that when public opinion is for it everything succeeds, when public opinion is against it nothing succeeds. The people of this country make public opinion, and a man can not usually succeed himself as President where he has been in office but one term if public opinion is against him. He may try; he may play politics; but he can not succeed if public opinion is against him. Therefore, Mr. President, it occurs to me that this would be an unwise amendment to make to the organic law of our country.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have already spoken on the pending amendment, and I wish to say only a few words now. I had hoped that the Senate might adopt the amendment which I offered to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, so as to reduce the term of the Executive as proposed by the pending amendment from six years to four years. The adoption of my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia would have enabled me to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, for I have long favored the proposition that the Chief Executive should be ineligible to reelection. The Senate, however, has decided otherwise and has decided that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia shall go to a vote finally with the provision in it for a six-year term instead of a four-year term for the President. Therefore, although I am strongly in favor of the provision of the amendment that no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection to the Presidency—I should like to vote for that—yet because I so strongly believe that we ought not to have a six-year term for the President I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia for the reason which I stated a day or two ago, namely, that I do not wish to confuse the question of eliminating the old Congress from meeting after the new Congress shall have been elected. However, I rose primarily to take just a moment of the Senate's time in connection with another matter not directly connected with this question.

Mr. President, the newspapers inform us that on Saturday last the President of the United States when he met the Oberammergau Passion Players dismissed Anton Lang, who represents the Christ in that play, for the reason that Mr. Lang attempted to say something about the suffering of the children of Germany and that he was not an official representative of the German Government.

It may be true that, from a technical standpoint of international law, the President acted correctly; but, Mr. President, it seems to me that there was a bigger and a better viewpoint to have been taken of that situation. I regret that the President of the United States could not have given a few moments to have heard the plea of that man who represents throughout the world the Christ idea as portrayed by the Oberammergau Passion Play, and when Mr. Lang had concluded, to have said to Mr. Lang that although it was a departure from ordinary custom, and although he was President, yet he had a sympathetic heart and he appreciated the situation. Some such treatment as that, it seems to me, would have been much more in keeping with the meeting the President had with the Oberammergau players than to have dismissed them on the plea that there was a crowd of citizens waiting to see him.

Those of us who have read the story of the reception given those men, and particularly Anton Lang, in the various cities of the country, can not but be impressed with the fact that, while he is not an official representative of any government, he is, in the minds of the people of the world, a representative of the Christ idea.

I repeat that I regret that the man in the presidential chair should have taken such a technical, hard, statutory view of the meeting he had with Anton Lang, rather than to have taken the view and practiced the spirit of the Christ whom Anton Lang represents in the remarkable play at Oberammergau.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the Senator has been saying; but suppose the President had followed the course the Senator has suggested, would there not be embarrassment hereafter in his refusing to hear any one from any other country on any other subject?

Mr. DILL. I may say in reply to the Senator from Ohio that I suggested what the President might have said, indicating at the same time that it was a departure from the customary procedure. Anton Lang is a world figure. He is not particularly a German representative in the Oberammergau Passion Play, but he is rather, in the minds of the people of the world, the representative of the Christ idea. It seems to me, from that viewpoint, the President would not have been breaking a precedent to such an extent that he could not have well maintained the rule of international law of not listening to the plea of private citizens of foreign countries. A more charitable spirit, I think, would have been to have given an attentive ear. I think the American people would have been prouder of the President had he taken the charitable, the large, the humane, the Christian view of the situation, rather than the narrow view dictated by international law.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, when the President of the United States receives those who call upon him it is essential, I apprehend, that a certain degree of formality shall be observed, and particularly so when those who call are, in a sense, though unofficially, representatives of a foreign power. It would be quite out of place, it seems to me, if the President were to allow himself to depart in any instance, from the established precedents which govern interviews of that character. If the President were to do it at all, and if he were to proceed on the basis of Christian consideration, as suggested by the Senator who has just spoken, it seems to me that the time to do it would be when he is waited upon by those who are inconspicuous, of humble position, of low estate. In proportion as the visitor becomes a world figure, in that degree it becomes important that the President should not relax in his case the wise rules of procedure which govern interviews of that sort.

Mr. President, may I suggest that if anyone is really animated by a regard for the feelings of others, if one really does wish to speak to the point of what under certain circumstances constitutes Christian consideration, it would behoove him, I should think, to withhold criticism of the way in which the Executive, placed in a difficult position, acted, which was in accordance not only with the instincts of a gentleman, but in strict accordance with the traditions of the place that he so well fills.

Mr. President, manners are quite incommunicable. It well might be that the incident would have been better handled by Senators on this floor, but personally, I doubt it. It seems to me that none of us is in a position to read to the President of the United States, the present occupant of that office, a lesson in courtesy, in consideration or kindness. I am quite sure that the people of the United States will regard the incident as I regarded it, as one wholly creditable to the tact and the discretion of the President, and will regret exceedingly that it became necessary for him to adopt the only attitude that he could take in the circumstances because somebody, quite inadvertently, did what was wholly inadmissible under the circumstances.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if I may.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think that, if the President wanted to take this attitude, he might well have explained to Mr. Lang the reason why he could not hear him, rather than to have dismissed him on the plea that others were waiting?

Mr. PEPPER. I have understood that the breach of propriety was not on Mr. Lang's part at all, but on the part of the official introducer. Mr. Lang himself did not speak. My suggestion is that, in view of the nature of the introduction, the President was not at liberty to follow any course except that which he did follow.

Mr. DILL. I may say that the report is that Mr. Lang was not permitted to speak.

Mr. PEPPER. I understood the Senator to say in his original remarks that Mr. Lang made a plea to the President.

Mr. DILL. He attempted to make a plea.

Mr. PEPPER. So far as I know, he attempted nothing. His introducer committed a breach of the proprieties, no doubt quite unwittingly, and placed the President in a position where, in order to preserve the proprieties, it was necessary for him to do what he did. As I have said, it may well be that individual Senators feel that they could have handled the situation with greater tact or with greater polish. It nevertheless remains one of those questions upon which none of us, it seems to me, can read lessons to others.

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator in reply to that suggestion that individual Senators will still reserve the right to express their opinion of such events even though they do not please other Senators.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I feel very much as others who have expressed themselves on the subject of the pending amendment that it is a question of such importance that perhaps it had been better had it come up as an independent proposition at a time when we were in a position to give it that serious consideration to which it is entitled. There are some of us—and I myself am among the number—who feel that it is a case of suspended judgment in that we have not had time to study the question as an imminent one, and the elements for and against should be weighed carefully before a conclusion is reached. I desire, however, now to state that I shall vote against the amendment for that reason and for the additional reason that has been voiced here by other Senators that the whole trend of our elective machinery has been "back to the people."

When the Constitution was adopted, as a matter of course the law of heredity had asserted itself and was asserting itself, and in spite of the fact that the great revolution was fought to establish the independence of the United States and to set up a democracy, our views of what was practical democracy were purely theoretical. The practical part had not been used anywhere to any great extent and therefore we incorporated in our form of government certain standards that were derived from the old régime. Knowing that they had survived, though they were not acceptable, we were loath to turn them loose and embark on an absolutely uncharted and untried sea of democracy.

As the basis of our Government we adopted a written Constitution which took the place of individual and imperial power, and incorporated in some of our forms of election certain removals from the people that might guarantee the Government against what some Senators have called the explosion, or the radical expression, of public opinion; but the trend in modern times has been back to the people. We have amended our Constitution to a point where the Members of the Senate are elected now by the people rather than by the legislatures. We have attempted to approximate that even in the election of a President by our preferential primaries. We could not do it directly, so we have gone about trying to do it indirectly, in order to get the voice of the people as to whom they preferred. And it seems a strange paradox that in the face of the inauguration of our preferential primaries, trying to get the expression of the people, we should attempt to remove the Chief Executive, as far as we may do it without danger, from response to the popular appreciation of what he has done.

I think it is a commentary on the American people for us to stand here and say that we ought to remove the Chief Executive from a response to public opinion as to the ratification of what he has done in four years, expressed in his reelection for another four years. In the present arrangement we have a check and balance against the best of both arguments. In the two-term theory we have, first, the response to the people and a molding and a shaping of the President's course, a settling, as it were, of the policies that he is going to pursue. While he has regard to what the majority of the electorate is going to say with reference to his first four years, that, we all believe, is a proper thing. Then in the next four years, under the custom that prevails, we have him independent of any response to the people, but we have the policy and the practices of the last four years settled in a splendid regard for the people. During the last four years he can take the best that there is and carry it out.

As to the graduated relation of the legislature under the present arrangement, as expressed in the House and Senate and the Executive, as outlined by the Senator from New York, I had not thought of that feature of it until the Senator developed it. I had not read the debates that brought about that graduated relation, but there is force in that; and from every standpoint, as far as the argument has gone, it seems to me that the American people should be trusted to resist the demagogic relation of their Chief Executive in the first four years and have the power to discern what is worthy in him to the extent of his reelection. It is a reflection on them to say that we have to take a man and make him independent of public opinion in order to get the best out of him, because the very logic of the deduction would be that if he is removed from response to public opinion he would be the better President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. We took that very precaution with reference to the judges of the courts, did we not? We made them unresponsive to public opinion because we gave them a life tenure, and we made it impossible to decrease or increase their pay during their term of office, so that they may have no incentive, either financial or otherwise, to bend their course to catch popular approval.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; and there has been a sentiment among the people to change even that, to change our constitutional provision in regard to our judges and make them responsive to the public. In some States the law in that respect has been changed; but I shall not stop to debate that, because I think the Senator from Arkansas will realize, as all of us realize, that there is quite a difference between the solemn adjudication of life and death and property rights before a court and the mere execution of the law as we find it in the President. I do not think the same argument would pertain to the two functions of our Government. We have in our Constitution, as the Senator is well aware, a provision that a judge may be removed if he fails to discharge properly the functions of his office.

There is, however, another thing that appeals to me in this connection. I am of opinion that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia would tend to intensify rather than to diminish the growing tendency of the Chief Executive to assume all the functions of government, or at least the legislative functions. I believe that electing him for a six-year term would encourage the tendency to a dictatorship that seems to be cropping out more and more, not so much perhaps on the initiative of the Executive as because of the attitude of Congress to the Chief Executive. Now that that tendency has assumed alarming proportions on the part of the Chief Executive—the tendency to dominate the legislative as well as the executive branch of the Government—I sincerely hope that it has reached its crisis, and that from now on we shall assert the rights and prerogatives of the legislative body, and not be rubber stamps; that we shall initiate the legislation and put it through, and insist that the Chief Executive shall be the Executive and we shall be the legislative body. We have gone far toward discrediting this body and another in our attitude toward our Chief Executive on the question of legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to say that I am afraid we are rapidly getting to a point where we do not appreciate our Constitution as we should. Because of some temporary irritation, some temporary occurrence, we imagine that if the fundamental law of the land were changed it would relieve the situation, and the tendency is to legislate in our Constitution rather than to let the fundamental principles be there and legislate in accordance with them.

The tendency is, in every State of the Union as well as here, to legislate rather than to declare great principles in our constitutions. I would rather have us confine ourselves to the present status of affairs and meet the conditions that confront us with such legislation as we can enact under the Constitution than to try to amend the Constitution to meet what may be simply temporary conditions. I am afraid we are getting in the habit of rushing in and submitting to the people certain amendments to the Constitution which are ill advised; certainly not considered as the provisions of the Constitution were considered by its framers, who had come out of the fires of a revolution with all dross and imperfections burned away, so that there was clearly defined just what was essential for the proper building of a great nation on profound, fundamental, inalienable rights and principles of the human family. I would rather take what we have and work it out as we can work it out with legislation than to attempt to modify the Constitution further.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to say just enough to prevent the possibility of any misconception attaching to the vote which I propose to cast in relation to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. I propose to vote against it, and hence the scruple which prompts me to speak with respect to it at all.

If the proposition were an independent one, and stood entirely on the footing of its own merits, I am not prepared to say whether I should vote against it or not. I think that there is a great deal to be said in favor of giving the President of the United States a longer term than he now enjoys and making him ineligible for reelection to the Presidency. The idea which underlies the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is, of course, no novel idea. It was broached in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. The proposal was made in that body that the President should be elected for a term of seven years, if I am not mistaken, and should be ineligible for reelection. It, of course, was not adopted, but it was advocated.

As I have said, it seems to me a great deal can be advanced in favor of a single term for the President of the United States. The best Presidents we have had have been deathbed Presidents—that is to say, Presidents who had been elected for a second time and no longer had anything to fear or hope for at the hands of the voters.

It was a saying of Benjamin Franklin that, while bad old men are common enough, there has scarcely ever been such a thing as a bad old woman. So I say that there has hardly ever been such a thing in American history as a bad President during his second term, when he was completely removed from political temptations of all sorts, and had his eye fixed not upon reelection to his exalted office but upon the dispassionate verdict of posterity.

It is a fact that most important extensions of the Federal merit system of appointment have been made by our Presidents during their second terms. That is true, as I remember at this moment, of almost all our recent Presidents.

Every or practically every President for years past, no matter what his attitude may have been toward the merit system of appointment during his first term of office, has felt that he was under an imperious obligation before he gave up his high place to extend the scope of that beneficent system.

Senators will recollect that some one said a few years ago that so frequent had been the gifts of the rich men of New England to Harvard College that it had become discreditable for a wealthy man to die in New England and not leave a legacy to that institution. So our Presidents have felt for a long time that there was something ignoble in the idea of a President giving up the Presidency upon the expiration of his second term without making some notable—indeed, some striking—contribution to the permanent welfare of the people of the United States.

The old Latin poet tells us that it is when we come to die that truth wells up from the lowest depths of our being. Somewhat the same sort of moral value attaches to the position of a President during his second term as that which attaches in a court of law to the dying declarations of a witness to some occurrence who no longer has anything to expect in this world.

So a very strong argument, in my judgment, can be made in favor of limiting the term of the President of the United States to a single term and making him ineligible for reelection. But this is not the time for bringing forward any question that calls for such an argument. The trouble about the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska is that it is purely a parasitic amendment. It has taken hold of the latter exactly as a wood tick takes hold of the ear flap of a dog. The proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska should not be used as a host for any such intruder. Let the pending joint resolution be considered on its own merits. I for one have made up my mind to vote for it. It would pare away a part of my term, but that will make very little difference to the people of the United States and will make still less to me.

I believe that the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is a judicious one. I think that it will import a valuable change into our organic law, and I propose to vote for it. Therefore I do not care to see it encumbered by any such irrelevant, alien amendment as that suggested by the Senator from Georgia. And I shall vote against the latter.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am not authority upon parasites which afflict dogs, and I do not pass upon what might be good to relieve a dog of such parasites. I am perfectly willing to leave that to people who are more familiar with those matters. But if this amendment of the Senator from Georgia is not relevant and germane to the proposition offered by the Senator from Nebraska, I am unable to see why.

The proposition with which we are dealing, offered by the Senator from Nebraska, is to fix the time at which the President shall be inaugurated. What is more germane than to fix the length of the term during which he shall hold the office into which he is inducted?

I do not think any Senator will get much credit for saying that he thinks that if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia were offered as an independent proposition he would support it, but since it is offered in connection with this other therefore he is compelled to oppose it. I know the usual way to avoid voting for a question which you suspect the people want is to say, "I am for it, but this is an inopportune time to press it."

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said the matter ought to be discussed; that there is a great deal to be said on both sides of the question, and therefore he wants it presented as an independent suggestion; and that is the proposition of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] and I believe of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

We know that this proposition will never have a better chance to succeed than now. If Senators really believe that a President ought to have one term and no more, if that is the honest conviction of Senators, now is the time to express it, now is the time to put that conviction into the form of an amendment to the proposed amendment to the Constitution. If Senators do not believe it, it is a good time to vote against the proposition. It is possibly the only time Senators will have to vote on it, and they ought to record themselves squarely upon the question, either that it is worth while and ought to be a part of the organic law or that it is not wise and should not be.

I do not see that it is any criticism of the President of the United States to say that he is a better official if he knows there is no second term dangling before him than if he is being whipped by the party lash to do something to make his own reelection possible and his own party's success probable. I do know that experience has taught us that that is true. The Senator from Maryland said that nearly everything worth preserving in an administration of the high office of President is accomplished in his second term. If that is true, if his second term is better than his first, what is the use of having one bad term in order to get one fairly decent term? Why not remove the cause, because all Senators realize that there is but one cause. It is not that the President has changed; it is not that his viewpoint has changed; it is not that he has more vision. It is because he is no longer responsive to the party whip, no longer responsive to those people who want to dictate his course of office so that he may succeed himself. It is the expression of the best there is in him, and that is what the American people are entitled to receive all the time.

I feel certain that if a man were elected President of the United States knowing that that was his one time to write a record that posterity would approve, knowing that there was no chance for a second term, that there was nothing to fear from the party lash, that there was nothing to fear from those people who besieged him from morning to night to appoint people to office in order that he might thereby reelect himself, he would be freer to discharge his duties.

I do not think the present President is any worse than any other man would be in his place, and I could point—and I know every Senator in the Senate could point—to facts which we know are controlling his policy which he would spurn were he not a candidate for election.

Take the appointment of the man in New Orleans, Cohen, rejected by the Senate and returned, and again rejected by the Senate and kept in office there, in order that the President may placate a racial group in this country. He would not do that if he were not hoping to get their vote to elect him this fall.

As I said a moment ago, the President would not keep the present Attorney General in office if it were not that the necessity of politics compels him to do it. Shall 110,000,000 people suffer, shall the very principles upon which our Government is founded be endangered, in order that the President may be reelected to office?

I think the price is too great to pay. I do not think we have any right to demand that the people who discharge their duties as citizens, who pay the taxes, and obey the law should be made the sport of a man who is seeking to have himself reelected to office.

Let us simply vote upon this question, as to whether we believe it is wise that a man should be subject to reelection or should be ineligible, as we are confronted with it. We have a chance to pass on that question. If Senators actually believe that the President would be a better official and that the country would be better governed if there were no temptation to play politics in order that the President might be reelected, this is the time to say so with their votes. If they do not think so, if they think a man is a better President by reason of the fact that he has a hope of office held out before him, then they should vote against it. But I say that is putting it upon a very sordid plane.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. My sentiment in favor of the thought embraced in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia has been very much strengthened, I am bound to say, by the very cogent line of reasoning the Senator from Arkansas has been pursuing; but does not the Senator feel that this amendment might jeopard the success of the constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska might jeopard the success of the proposal made by the Senator from Georgia? In other words, does he not think that the two propositions are not so closely related to each other that they might not be mutually destructive when submitted to the people? I would like to see the constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska adopted. Then I would like to see the proposition of the Senator from Georgia presented to us in a separate, independent form. We would then have an opportunity and the people would have an opportunity to pass on the merits of each of the proposals.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator is correct in his statement. If a man believes in the so-called Norris amendment, which is now pending, I can not conceive that he would refuse to vote for it because incorporated with it was the proposition offered by the Senator from Georgia that the President should be ineligible for reelection. I can not help believing that at heart there are more people who believe there is a sound reason for restricting the President from becoming a candidate to succeed himself than there are those who believe there is prime necessity for the Norris constitutional amendment. As the best evidence of that, I can not think of a political party that has not declared itself in favor of one-term tenure of office when the candidate is seeking office. It is only after the situation has gone to the point where the candidate is no longer a candidate but is an officeholder, that he discovers that a second term is very desirable.

The amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia has been indorsed by the Democratic Party. It has been thought to be wise when we were writing platforms on which we hoped to be elected. We have declared for a single term of office, and I do not recall a single candidate who was a candidate for nomination on the ticket of my party in recent years, who had any chance of being nominated, who did not declare that he believed in a single term for the President. If that were a good plank on which to run, it ought to be a good amendment to incorporate in the Constitution of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 40 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, has a roll call been ordered on the Harris amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). It has not.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, before any roll call is ordered I desire to address the Senate very briefly on the Harris amendment, and I am rather hopeful that it will go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to get a vote to-night. We have been going on for a good while, it seems to me, on this matter. I should like at least to get a vote on the Harris amendment and then have one or two committee amendments adopted that will excite no opposition. If we can do that, I will then move to take a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the Senate, but I do want to speak briefly on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Personally I feel very strongly that the amendment is a wise one and should receive the approval of Congress at the earliest possible moment, so that it can be considered, as all constitutional amendments must be considered, by the legislatures of the various States of the Union. I can not agree with the viewpoint expressed by other Senators that this proposal has not been before the public for a long time. I can not recall any prospective amendment to the Constitution that has received more general discussion and consideration than the suggestion that the term of President be extended possibly to six years, and that there be a constitutional disqualification to succeed himself.

In fact, this proposed amendment to the Constitution has received much consideration, much discussion, and much comment in the public press.

I speak from some experience, having been Governor of the State of New Jersey, where, under the constitution of the State, the governor is prohibited from succeeding himself, as is the case, I know, in various other States. I think it is a most wise provision. It does not make any difference whether it is the President of the United States or the governor of a State, we are all human.

When a man is elected to the office of President, where the Constitution permits reelection, he must of necessity have it constantly in his mind. I believe any President of the United States necessarily and naturally will do his very best to make a commendable record and serve the country as well as he is able to serve it, but back of all that undoubtedly is the human thought that in making that record he hopes that his fellow countrymen will approve of it sufficiently to renominate him and elect him for a second term. Whether he wants the second term or not—and, as far as I can recall, history does not record those who were not willing to have a second term—he wants to have it generally admitted, as far as that is possible, that the country has approved his record and is ready to give him another term. That ambition will influence, if not control, some of his policies.

Earlier in the discussion to-day one of the Senators, I think the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], made the statement, as I recall it, that a President elected for a single term, realizing that under the Constitution he could not succeed himself, would not respond to public opinion as readily as would a President serving his first term, with the hope or expectation of possibly having a second. While a President of the United States should undoubtedly try to respond to digested public opinion, at the same time I am under the impression that it might be beneficial to the country if the President, realizing that he could have only one term, should be just a little more firm, and not always respond to the clamor of the moment and the thought of the day, many of those thoughts and much of that clamor not carefully conceived, or at least not carefully considered.

I frankly believe that with the term of office of the President definitely fixed, notwithstanding the exigencies or demand of politics, we will get better service out of the President, I do not care whether he is a Republican or a Democrat.

Although I generally follow the logic of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], now occupying the chair, I could not entirely follow him to-day in his expressed fear that the present terms of Members of Congress would be thrown somewhat out of gear because of the extension of the presidential term. The responsibilities and functions of the different branches of the Government, which most of us recognize, and which in my judgment we should all recognize, are entirely different. The Executive is the Executive, as the title implies. The Congress is, of course, the legislative body, or should be.

The lower House of Congress is supposed to represent the viewpoint of the particular period when it is elected, and under the Constitution we elect the entire House with the idea that the country shall express their viewpoint. I do not think that privilege should be denied for a longer period than two years. I think the term of the Members of the lower House of Congress should always remain two years. Two years is ample time to have changes in the country pretty clearly defined and analyzed and digested; and if they can be represented by an election of a new House, it should have its effect on the Senate, naturally and properly.

Senators being elected, under the Constitution, for six years, I can not see how the situation would be altered if the President had a term of six years. In any event, only one-third, a minority of the Senate, is sure to serve beyond the present presidential term of four years. Therefore at present there never would be a majority of the Senate remaining in office beyond the President's term, unless they were reelected to the Senate during the term of the President.

So I can not just see how it would make any great difference with the Senate. Of course, if this amendment were adopted, one-third of the Senate would be elected with the President and one-third would go out with the President. If the country approved the President's record, and likewise approved the record of the Senate and the House, the legislators would probably be reelected. The Senate is a changing body, and would continue to be a changing body, although continuous as designed by the framers of the Constitution, because only one-third of the membership goes out every two years. This would in no way be changed nor should be changed. I can not see that it affects the term of the President at all. If the public are satisfied, when the elections come every two years, whether it is a congressional election or a presidential election, they will return the incumbents to office. If the public are dissatisfied, the opposite will be the result. The President's expressed views do not always control that situation. In my judgment, in considering the advisability of changing the presidential term, it has no really important relationship to the election of the lower House or of the Senate.

In these days the function or responsibility of the Senate and of the House seems to be greatly changing; and perhaps new conditions make that necessary, though I am not entirely ready to subscribe to all of it. With these changed conditions, I believe it becomes all the more essential to have a President as far removed as we can remove him from the political demands of the day and of the hour. I think it is to a great extent a human question and if the President of the United States goes into office for six years, and realizes he is going to have six years, and that at the end of that six years he will lay down the burdens of the office and go back to whatever his private interests may be, we will have just a little better executive control. He can administer his political duties a little more independently if in no sense a candidate for further honors. Maybe he will not always be entirely responsive to the changing whims of sections of the country, and maybe it will be all the better for the country as a whole if he is not. I would like to see the President of the United States in just as independent a position as the Constitution can place him, and I think in these days of greater and broadening responsibility it becomes all the more important to give him that type of independence and control.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want merely to repeat what I said two or three days ago when it looked as if we were going to have a vote on the pending amendment. I voted for the proposition involved in this amendment when it was before the Senate several years ago as an independent proposition. I have not changed my mind with reference to it, but I think that the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska would be complicated by having attached to it this amendment, about which there seems to be a very great difference of opinion. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as modified by him, will be read.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, after line 3, insert the following new section:

SEC. —. The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years; and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to re-election.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to make only a brief statement. I am going to vote against this amendment. I do not think it ought to be attached to the original joint resolution, and without regard to the merits of the question, I feel that I ought to vote against it, because I want the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska to be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I have been unable to find anyone to whom I could transfer the pair. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. KING's name was called). The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. He authorized me to state that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREL], and I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STEKLING]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES. Has the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. MOSES. I have a general pair with that Senator. However, I find that I can transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], which I do, and I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. RALSTON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. COLT. Has the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which I transfer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NOBLECK] and vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I inquire if the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. I have a pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. HARRIS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which section 3 was amended be reconsidered for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] to offer an amendment which he suggested the other day to the amendment of the committee. I have gone over it with members of the committee and we all agree that it is an amendment which ought to be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska that the vote by which the committee amendment to section 3 was agreed to be reconsidered? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the particular portion of section 3 which seems to me to require amendment is the provision which goes into operation when the House of Representatives fails to elect a President.

The power of election having been devolved upon the House, then the provision of the present Constitution is that the Vice President shall act as President. The amendment as it now stands provides that the Vice President shall in that event act as President only until the House of Representatives chooses a President. In other words, it would leave the Vice President occupying the presidential office under that contingency absolutely subject to the control of the House of Representatives. At any time the House of Representatives could, by electing a President, depose the Vice President who had been elected. It would render the Executive dependent upon the Congress.

The amendment which I am about to suggest is to retain the constitutional provision as it stands now and the amendment to that end which I move is as follows: On page 2, line 22, of the joint resolution as reported by the Senator from Nebraska, after the word "President," strike out the words "until the House of Representatives chooses a President" and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "As in the case of the death or constitutional disability of the President."

Mr. NORRIS. To that amendment to the amendment I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. May we have the amendment read as agreed to?

Mr. NORRIS. It will now leave it as provided at present by the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President chosen for the same term shall act as President as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President, and the Congress may by law provide that in the event the Vice President has not been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to ask one question. Does that language mean that if the House of Representatives fails to act within the two weeks which is allotted to them under the amendment, it no longer has the power to elect a President, and the man elected as Vice President will hold the office for four years?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate in the meantime has elected a Vice President, he becomes President and holds the office until the expiration of the term. That is the way it is now provided in the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would mean then that if there should be a race of diligence between the two Houses, and a Vice President was first elected by the Senate, he would take the office.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; the Vice President would not take the office of President unless the House of Representatives failed to elect a President by the beginning of the term of the President, which would be the third Monday in January, if this proposed amendment becomes a part of the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, for instance, suppose there was a three-cornered race and the three candidates for President went before the House and no one of the three was elected by the House before noon of the third Monday of January, the Senate in the meantime having elected a Vice President, he would become President.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he would become President.

Mr. McKELLAR. And would remain President for four years?

Mr. NORRIS. Until the end of the term.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am just wondering what the effect of that would be.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the way it is provided now under the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. The only difference is that there is a longer time existing between the election and the beginning of the term, but the language inserted by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is a quotation from the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution as it stands now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Nebraska evidently did not grasp fully the question of the Senator from Tennessee. As I understand it, if the Senate should elect a Vice President and the House should fail to elect a President by the third Monday in January the Vice President would hold the office until the House did accomplish the election?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Vice President would become President for four years.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to think over that. I am not prepared to go that far.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me call attention to the reverse situation. In the first place, that puts it just as it is now except as to time.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a very great exception.

Mr. NORRIS. There never has been a time where it has taken that long to choose a President, but let us take the other position. Suppose we said in that case the Vice President should become President only until the House of Representatives elected a President, they would have four years in which to elect him and the Vice President would be in the White House during every day of his term of office subject to being ousted at any time the House of Representatives chose to elect some one to take the office.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see the troubles there, but I am not prepared to say that the other troubles are not equally as great.

Mr. NORRIS. The Vice President has been elected with the idea of becoming President in case of a vacancy.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that in 1912 three parties were contending in the presidential election, and it was believed for a number of weeks that the election of the President might be thrown into the House of Representatives. There were in the House of Representatives at that time 22 State delegations in each of which the majority was Democratic, 22 delegations in each of which the majority was Republican, and 4 delegations were tied. Assuming the election had been relegated to the House of Representatives, and that the ties could not have been broken, then the Senate would have chosen a Vice President from the two candidates who had received the greatest number of votes at the general election. Under the then existing Constitution, which is now the Constitution, the person elected Vice President by the Senate would have become the President for the entire four years if the House failed to elect. This proposition, if agreed to, would not change that situation at all. It is now the Constitution and has been the Constitution ever since the adoption of the twelfth amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If the House of Representatives should be tied up so that it could not elect within three weeks it would never elect, especially when it knows that if it does not elect within three weeks its chance of election has disappeared. There would not be any use in giving them three months' time. The next Congress, which would follow that two years after, might elect a President after the Vice President had been in the office for two years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I understand that contention very well, but we must remember that we are now trying to improve a constitutional provision, and unless we do improve it it would be better to let it alone.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what we are doing; we are letting it alone.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment about that. As I understand the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] it would be this: It would permit such a condition of affairs that after two or three men have been nominated by political parties in the United States for the high office of President and a like number have been nominated for the high office of Vice President, if the election is thrown into the House of Representatives and it does not elect a President within two weeks, then, as I understand, no one of the three candidates for whom the people have voted for President will be selected President, but the Senate of the United States will select a Vice President who will occupy the office of President for four years. I doubt if such an amendment would appeal to the people of the United States; I doubt very much whether they would want to have created such a situation that the Senate could elect a vice presidential candidate to be President for four years; but I believe they would prefer that the House of Representatives be given every proper opportunity to elect one of the three highest candidates for President. I want to think about it, and so I hope the Senator from Nebraska is not going to ask for a vote on the question this afternoon. I wish to ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was adopted, if it has been adopted—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Because I think it is very important, and I think Senators should consider the amendment of the Senator from Colorado very carefully before they vote for its adoption.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado effects a very material change in the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if Senators feel that way about it, it will be entirely agreeable to me to have the vote by which the amendment was adopted reconsidered, so that it may be further debated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered, or I will ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to point out this fact—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One at a time. The Chair desires to state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator from Tennessee yielded the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the proposal as it is now pending the House of Representatives would be given only two weeks from the first Monday in January until the third Monday in January to effect an election, which is a very short time, in view of the fact that the House would also probably have to organize before it could proceed to vote upon the question of selecting a President. The proposal as originally presented was that the Vice President should serve only until the House of Representatives had acted, so that it made no difference under the original proposition presented by the Senator from Nebraska, or under the committee amendment to the Senator's proposal, whether the House were successful in effecting an election by the third Monday in January or not. But, as stated by the Senator from Tennessee, if the Senate should be so constituted that it could effect the election of a Vice President, that officer would become President, and the House would not really have an opportunity of making a choice.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would virtually render nugatory the action of the people.

Mr. ROBINSON. At least it is worthy of more consideration than we have given it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I shall attempt to take no advantage of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. And when the Senate convenes to-morrow I will ask, if the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Tennessee both feel as they do now, for a reconsideration of the amendment, in order that it may be further debated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can we not have a reconsideration of the vote now by unanimous consent?

Mr. NORRIS. When the Senator thinks further of it, I doubt whether he will wish to ask for a reconsideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. In my opinion it is a matter that ought to be further debated.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say, before I move that the Senate take a recess, that the Senator does not doubt, I presume, that that will happen if he wants it to happen to-morrow morning. I assure the Senator I do not want to take any snap judgment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that very well. I know the Senator too well to think that.

Mr. NORRIS. But I have talked to various members of the committee, and they have all agreed with me that we had better agree to the proposition of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to have an understanding that the amendment shall be reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado puts it back in the form in which I originally introduced it.

Let me say a word further, particularly for the benefit of the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Arkansas. If the House fails to elect, it will be because they are tied up by reason of the complex method the Constitution now provides under which the vote has to be taken by States, which makes it possible that no one candidate will receive a majority vote of all the electors. If they are tied up in that way, facing the fact that in two weeks from that time the Vice President elected by the Senate is going to become President, if they want the Vice President to become President more than they want to select one of the three candidates for President for whom they can vote, I think it is safe to say that they will keep the House tied up, and for the same reason in the condition in which they would find themselves they would not be able to elect during any time in that Congress. The result would be that a new Congress in due time would be elected when the President's term was half out, and the President during any minute of the time thereafter might be thrown out of office by the House of Representatives at any time electing a President. That would be a very unsatisfactory condition in which to put the country, and it would be a very unsatisfactory situation in which to put the President. It would subject him absolutely, under the penalty of sacrificing his office, to a branch of the National Legislature. I am satisfied, when Senators think of that, they will not want that condition. Moreover, we have lived for a great many years, more than a century, under the present Constitution with this kind of a provision in it. I have forgotten when the twelfth amendment was adopted.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was adopted in 1804.

Mr. NORRIS. Then for more than a century we have lived under the twelfth amendment, which contains a provision similar to that of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. The only difference between the twelfth amendment and the pending proposal is that the twelfth amendment provides that the House of Representatives shall have until the 4th of March, which is the beginning of the present term, to make the selection, if the election is thrown into the House, while in this case, if the election is thrown into the House, they will have until the third Monday in January. That is the only difference.

Let me say to Senators that it never has happened that an election has gone beyond the period within which the House might elect, and it never will happen that the House would fail to accomplish by the third Monday in January what it might now accomplish by the 4th of March. If an election were tied up by three separate parties each fighting the others, they would not wait until the convening of Congress, but would commence to work on the problem immediately after the result of the election became known and they would crystallize sentiment. If, because of the participation of three or more parties, an election were prevented for two weeks, for the same reason and under the same circumstances the House would not elect by the 4th of March, and that is the condition under the present Constitution.

On the other hand, I dislike very much to put the country or the President in the attitude where the President is liable to be thrown out of office at any moment. But if Senators so desire, when we convene to-morrow, Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator that we take an adjournment now.

Mr. NORRIS. I am about to move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator moves a recess, I wish to say that the large matter, as it seems to me in connection with this proposal, is that under it the man whom the voters of the United States may have designated as their choice for President may be kept out of the Presidency entirely and a man chosen by the Senate may become President. I doubt if the people will stand for that proposal when it is made known to them.

The Senator says that there is just a little difference of time. The fact is that there is a great deal of difference of time. The House that selects the President meets in December. It organizes then. It gets ready for the vote. It is all ready to act when the time comes. It has until the 4th of March to elect a President. It seems to me it is a very different situation from having just the two weeks.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is mistaken when he says that they are likely to have a President that the people have not voted for. The man who becomes President is the man that the Senate elected, and they must select from the two highest on the list.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the Vice President; but the Senator knows that there is a very great difference between the two offices. There is many a man that we elect Vice President that the people would not have elected President of the Republic, and it does seem to me that we ought to choose the President from one of the men for whom the people have voted for President.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I present an amendment intended to be offered by me to-morrow, and ask that it be printed and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the motion for a recess is made, the Chair desires to call attention to the unanimous-consent agreement, which is printed on the face of the calendar, to the effect that after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] may address the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. As the Senator in charge of this joint resolution, I shall make no objection to that, of course. I will ask unanimous consent to lay it aside if the Senator from West Virginia desires.

Mr. McKELLAR. He can speak upon the joint resolution just as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair desires to request an understanding with the Senators present to the effect that, notwithstanding there will be no routine morning business to-morrow as the result of the motion to recess, he may be permitted to recognize the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think that ought to be done. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Was not that simply a notice? Mr. McKELLAR. No; it was a unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to remind the Senators—perhaps some of them were not here the other day—that the Senate, upon the request of the Senator from West Virginia, entered into a unanimous-consent agreement that he should be permitted to address the Senate upon a certain day and at a certain hour. The agreement was made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does the Presiding Officer think, therefore, that a motion to take a recess is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the occupant of the Chair does not think any such motion is out of order, but the occupant of the chair did want to know if it was agreeable to the Senate that the occupant of the chair to-morrow recognize the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] in accordance with the spirit of this agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I can determine, having charge of this particular joint resolution, I should say that the Chair ought to do that. There will be no objection, I think, from any source.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

RECESS.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate stand in recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 18, 1924, at 12 o'clock.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 17 (legislative day of March 14), 1924.

POSTMASTERS.

ALABAMA.

Clyde Oldshue to be postmaster at Sulligent, Ala., in place of Clyde Oldshue. Incumbent's commission expired February 11, 1924.

Phil B. Payne to be postmaster at New Market, Ala., in place of A. L. Moore. Incumbent's commission expired February 11, 1924.

Louie W. Vaughan to be postmaster at Cuba, Ala., in place of G. R. McElroy. Incumbent's commission expired February 11, 1924.

ARKANSAS.

Wilber B. Huchel to be postmaster at Winthrop, Ark., in place of Addie Morgan. Office became third class October 1, 1923.

Charlotte A. Proctor to be postmaster at Hazen, Ark., in place of C. A. Proctor. Incumbent's commission expired January 23, 1924.

Lasco A. Callis to be postmaster at Bradford, Ark., in place of T. C. Wilson. Incumbent's commission expired January 23, 1924.

CONNECTICUT.

Katie M. Spencer to be postmaster at New Milford, Conn., in place of K. M. Spencer. Incumbent's commission expired February 4, 1924.

Michael J. Stanton to be postmaster at Lakeville, Conn., in place of M. J. Stanton. Incumbent's commission expired February 4, 1924.

DELAWARE.

William R. Risler to be postmaster at Lincoln, Del., in place of L. P. Shew. Office became third class July 1, 1923.

FLORIDA.

Robert F. Persons to be postmaster at Fort White, Fla., in place of R. F. Persons. Incumbent's commission expired February 14, 1924.

Eugene D. Lounds to be postmaster at Crescent City, Fla., in place of A. E. Lounds. Incumbent's commission expired February 20, 1924.

HAWAII.

Antone Silva to be postmaster at Hawi, Hawaii, in place of Antone Silva. Office became third class October 1, 1923.

IOWA.

Roscoe I. Short to be postmaster at Hazelton, Iowa, in place of W. F. L. Merrill. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1924.

LOUISIANA.

Robert H. Staples to be postmaster at Castor, La., in place of Jesse McInnis. Office became third class January 1, 1923.

MAINE.

Bernard V. Thompson to be postmaster at Easton, Me., in place of A. W. Kneeland, deceased.

Harold C. Gates to be postmaster at Millinocket, Me., in place of Thomas Quinn. Incumbent's commission expired February 11, 1924.

MINNESOTA.

Lucien M. Helm to be postmaster at Tower, Minn., in place of L. M. Helm. Incumbent's commission expired February 18, 1924.

MONTANA.

George I. Watters to be postmaster at Victor, Mont., in place of E. E. Hackett. Incumbent's commission expired August 5, 1923.

NEBRASKA.

Myron A. Gordon to be postmaster at Stratton, Nebr., in place of E. C. Ratcliff, resigned.

NEW JERSEY.

Mabel E. Tomlin to be postmaster at Sewell, N. J., in place of M. E. Tomlin. Incumbent's commission expired March 2, 1924.

NEW YORK.

Frank Dobbin to be postmaster at Shushan, N. Y., in place of W. R. Ryan, resigned.

Earl U. McCarthy to be postmaster at Mineola, N. Y., in place of J. J. Breen. Incumbent's commission expired February 20, 1924.

Julia J. Tyler to be postmaster at Kennedy, N. Y., in place of M. R. Crandall. Incumbent's commission expired March 3, 1924.

Sidney B. Cloyes to be postmaster at Earlville, N. Y., in place of C. I. Bureh. Incumbent's commission expired February 14, 1924.

Frank A. Haugh to be postmaster at Clyde, N. Y., in place of C. V. Ford. Incumbent's commission expired January 31, 1924.

Henry E. Thompson to be postmaster at Chateaugay, N. Y., in place of James English. Incumbent's commission expired February 14, 1924.

Stephen E. Terwilliger to be postmaster at Candor, N. Y., in place of F. G. Griffin. Incumbent's commission expired February 4, 1924.

Will J. Davy to be postmaster at Bergen, N. Y., in place of W. J. Davy. Incumbent's commission expired February 14, 1924.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Annie L. Stanton to be postmaster at Stantonsburg, N. C., in place of S. S. Strother, deceased.

OHIO.

Nathan S. Hall to be postmaster at Summerfield, Ohio, in place of R. R. Hannahs. Incumbent's commission expired August 5, 1923.

Marion E. Campbell to be postmaster at Sardinia, Ohio, in place of J. W. Campbell. Incumbent's commission expired February 24, 1924.

Edgar C. Allison to be postmaster at Cumberland, Ohio, in place of W. H. Young. Incumbent's commission expired February 24, 1924.

OKLAHOMA.

Charles E. Wilson to be postmaster at Savanna, Okla., in place of A. M. Knox. Office became third class October 1, 1923.

James W. McKay to be postmaster at Stonewall, Okla., in place of J. W. Fuller. Incumbent's commission expired January 28, 1924.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Nettie C. Moore to be postmaster at Honea Path, S. C., in place of T. C. Shaw, removed.

VERMONT.

James S. Brownell to be postmaster at Woodstock, Vt., in place of J. S. Brownell. Incumbent's commission expired March 3, 1924.

TENNESSEE.

Lula C. Beasley to be postmaster at Centerville, Tenn., in place of T. M. Huddleston. Incumbent's commission expired March 3, 1924.

WEST VIRGINIA.

James O. Buskirk to be postmaster at Holden, W. Va., in place of S. L. Toney, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 17 (legislative day of March 14), 1924.

COMPTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Walter L. Cohen to be comptroller of customs in customs collection district No. 20, with headquarters at New Orleans, La.

POSTMASTERS.

ARKANSAS.

James W. Slover, Harrison.
Benjamin B. Horton, Montrose.
Joseph S. Ottinger, Pea Ridge.
John M. Garrett, Vilonia.

TENNESSEE.

Wilson G. Hogan, Rives.
Onnie M. Hartsell, Limestone.
Everett M. Greer, Newport.

TEXAS.

William H. Littlefield, Anson.
Chessell Gra, Brookshire.
Ira S. Koon, Hallsville.
Lilburn C. Graham, Lancaster.
Llewellyn R. Atkins, New Boston.
Nora C. Brite, Pleasanton.
Herbert W. Scott, Throckmorton.

WITHDRAWALS.

Executive nominations withdrawn from the Senate March 17 (legislative day of March 14), 1924.

POSTMASTERS.

ALABAMA.

Washington H. Carlisle to be postmaster at Alexander City, in the State of Alabama.

NEW JERSEY.

Charles E. Wood to be postmaster at Hohokus, in the State of New Jersey.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 17, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, blessed Lord, for Thy presence in the earth, for Thy care of those whom we love, and for the fidelity of cherished friends. Let the blessings of health, strength, and good courage be upon us this day, and may our lives show forth our gratitude by our upright conduct. Bless us with a sweet peace of mind and with the fellowship and counsel of those who are good and wise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. KELLER, the bill H. R. 5274, to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. to construct and operate a line of railroad across Fort Snelling Military Reservation in the State of Minnesota, was ordered taken from the Private Calendar and placed on the Union Calendar.

IMPORTATION OF DYE PRODUCTS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the conditions which call for enactment of legislation provided in H. R. 7791 relating to importations of dye products under the tariff regulations are represented by importing interests to amount in some cases practically to a dye embargo. I am not attempting to fix responsibility nor do I minimize the importance of protecting home industries, but if the facts are as set forth in the accompanying memorandum responsibility should be fixed and relief offered. Congress refused after a square issue was presented to permit any dye embargo to be inserted in the last tariff. That contest was noteworthy in the House, and we should not do by indirection that which was refused domestic dye interests when the matter was passed upon by the House.

I am submitting a brief statement that sets forth difficulties encountered under existing practices and interpretations which have called for the proposed modifications set forth in H. R. 7791:

COMMENTS SHOWING THE EFFECT IN OPERATION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE FEATURES OF THAT PART OF THE TARIFF ACT WHICH GOVERNS THE IMPORTATION OF COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1924.

HON. WILLIAM R. GREEN,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following comments are respectfully submitted in the firm belief that the Congress should be apprised of legislation which, in attempted operation, is found so defective as to be grossly unfair, so faulty as to be legally inoperative, or so complicated as to render a reasonably expeditious administration impossible, and in order that, in such contingency and emergency, early consideration may be given the matter of affording remedial relief through the enactment of curative legislation.

As hereinafter shown, the legislation in the tariff act of 1922 governing the importation of coal-tar products, more especially dyes, dyestuffs, and color lakes, is in operation so viciously unfair, due to the numerous insurmountable difficulties encountered in attempted administration, that it would seem not only advisable but necessary, without undue delay, for the present Congress to afford remedial relief through the enactment of amendatory legislation. The situation appears to be such as to merit special attention, and the legislation is so faulty and unworkable that in reopening the tariff act for the purpose changes should be confined exclusively to the provisions mentioned in order to expedite action.

The foregoing statement is made advisedly by the undersigned, who is a Republican in politics and one who firmly believes in a tariff which will insure adequate protection to American industry, and the observations and findings hereinafter set forth are based on an actual experience of 10 months in the appraiser's office at New York engaged exclusively on work as investigator in connection with the administrative features of that part of the act which governs the importation of such products.

It should be stated at the outset that in preparing a brief on the subject the difficulties, complexities, and resultant discouraging perplexities, in the attempted administration of the provisions of the law, are so numerous that some of them are certain to be overlooked. The provisions are found to be legally inoperative in some respects and seriously defective in other respects. The following will suffice to show a number of the serious difficulties encountered.

TESTS.

NECESSITY FOR—CHARACTER—DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED—DELAYS.

In the tariff act on page (5), paragraph (28), the last five lines, appear the following words:

"For the purposes of this paragraph any coal-tar product provided for in this act shall be considered similar to or competitive with any imported coal-tar product which accomplishes results substantially equal to those accomplished by the domestic product when used in substantially the same manner."

It would seem mandatory, under the foregoing proviso, that on arrival, each and every coal-tar product of foreign make be tested for the purpose of determining whether or not it is true to name as given on the invoice, which, however, is not possible with the limited facilities and the number of employees available for the purpose. In the circumstances it is hardly necessary to say that tests for the purpose mentioned are not made unless the identity of the product as shown on the invoice is not known, or unless there exists some reason for doubt or for suspicion of possible fraud. The next step is to definitely determine whether or not any domestic product is competitive therewith which involves the making of comparative tests. A number of such tests are continually under way in the laboratory of the appraiser's office at New York, each test requiring from three days to six weeks from the time the sample reaches the appraiser's office, dependent in part on the volume of work on hand and frequently to the necessity of making light tests for the purpose of determining the relative fastness of the products, if dyes, to sunshine. Investigation frequently discloses that a number of different domestic manufacturers produce what appears to be a similar product which each offers for sale at a different price. In such cases it is necessary, in accordance with the Treasury Regulations issued March 2, 1923, to determine through a test of each of the similar domestic products which is the most nearly comparable with the foreign prototype and which requires considerable time and labor.

Many of the standard commercial dyes are used in many different ways on silk, cotton, wool, paper, lacquer ware, or on mixed goods, and it frequently happens that the domestic prototype can not be used for the purpose, in which case it is mandatory under the Treasury regulations that the major use of the dye be determined. Changes in styles and fashions constantly alter the major use of a dye and the difficulties encountered are so numerous that the major use of a dye is seldom determined with any degree of accuracy and findings and decisions affecting major use are invariably criticized as not being the fact. Moreover, appraisers are not equipped with the facilities for subjecting a dye to every kind of test to determine its variety of uses, nor are they equipped to conduct thorough and extensive investigations, in every instance, for the purpose of accurately arriving at a conclusion. Appraisers are doing the best they can with ill-advised legislation which in effect is not workable. The unavoidable delays caused by the time consumed in making tests and investigations have been a source of great irritation to consumers and importers and have subjected appraisers to very severe criticism, and unjustly so, for the law and not the officials is at fault. An importer or manufacturing consumer may, if he wishes, pay the duty on a guess that he has correctly arrived at the dutiable value and thus assume the risk of having the duty advanced, which in such event carries a stiff penalty with it, or he may permit the goods to go into a Government warehouse at his expense and remain there until such time as tests and investigations are completed. And it has happened that stagnation has occurred in textile plants due to such delays, thus seriously interfering with their manufacturing program and involving financial loss to them as well as to importers. It must be obvious that such experiences, chargeable to faulty legislation, should not continue indefinitely.

At stated intervals the appraiser at New York issues printed official lists showing the names of the foreign dyes which on test have been found, respectively, to be competitive and noncompetitive. A very considerable number of dyes appear on the lists but the information thus imparted is advisory only, and is subject to change without notice, dependent on further possible determinations, thereby rendering the information of little or no value. The law provides that if there be a domestic competitive product freely offered for sale to all purchasers in the ordinary course of trade and in the usual wholesale quantities on the date of exportation of the foreign product, the foreign product shall be regarded as competing. Now, then, to show the operation of this feature of the law.

An importer or manufacturing consumer seeks information from an appraiser as to whether or not a certain dye is competitive and is informed that the particular dye is not competitive. Based on the information given him by the appraiser and after computing the cost of the foreign material which he requires for use in his manufacturing program or for the purpose of sale, he places his order abroad for a considerable quantity of the product. In the meantime, just prior to or on the date of exportation of the foreign material, a domestic producer officially reports the manufacture, in commercial quantities, of a similar product and furnishes the appraiser with his offering price for the domestic product in the usual wholesale quantities. On test, the report of the domestic producer is confirmed, the foreign material is declared competitive and is transferred from the noncompetitive to the competitive lists. When the foreign material arrives in port one of two possibilities occur. If the importer is not aware of the change in the classification of the dye he is very apt to pay duty on a dutiable value on the noncompetitive basis and later find that the duty has, in the meantime, been materially advanced, carrying a penalty with it, or he has just learned that in the interim a domestic product has appeared on the market in competition therewith, increasing the dutiable value to the extent of converting a prospective financial profit into a considerable financial loss. In either case he can not be blamed for an emphatic expression of opinion regarding this peculiar working of the law. And also, in this connection, it has happened in some instances that in the course of investigations the appraiser at New York has found that a domestic product which has been produced for six months, a year, or longer, is, in fact, competitive with a certain foreign prototype, which up to the date of such discovery was regarded and classified as noncompetitive, whereupon, in compliance with this law, the classification of the particular dye was changed to competitive and necessarily made retroactive, thus materially increasing the dutiable value on such quantity of the foreign dye as may be in bond or which for any other reason has not been cleared and liquidated. Under the provisions of this law, in such circumstances, appraisers are bound to take such action. They can not do otherwise.

In determining the classification of dyes and color lakes it is mandatory also, if competitive, that relative strengths be accurately ascertained in order to arrive at dutiable value on the American selling price, as provided in Title IV, Part I, section 402, subdivision (f) of the act. Color lakes and many of the foreign dyes have no fixed strengths and it is obviously important, therefore, that every coal-tar dye and color lake, which is found to be competitive, be subjected to test immediately on arrival for the purpose of definitely ascertaining, in each specific case, the relative strength as compared with the domestic prototype in order to arrive at a just dutiable value and for the purpose of disclosing any possible fraud.

This is not always done, due to the tremendous amount of additional work thrust upon appraisers by reason of the numerous administrative features. Furthermore, it is not possible to determine the relative strength of pastes and pulp colors with the slightest degree of accuracy, due in part to inadequate equipment and to the fact that keg samples of such products would have to be furnished in each case for the purpose, which is not feasible. Therefore the law can not be complied with in the respect mentioned in so far as pastes and pulp colors are involved, and the additional delay caused by having to determine the relative strength of powder dyes—dyes in powder form—subjects Government officials to further criticism.

SPECIFIC-DUTY PROVISION.

In paragraph (28) of the act provision is made that the specific duty of 7 cents a pound shall be based on standards of strength established by the Secretary of the Treasury. Such establishment of standards will require, according to the best information obtainable, not less than 2 nor more than 10 years. The foregoing statement is confirmed by the fact that no official standards were established until August 14, 1923, or nearly a year after the passage of the act, and thus the law covering that feature of administration could not be complied with and is not complied with at present, excepting in so far as official standards have been established. Furthermore, it is my understanding that the official standards now of force are subject to possible change, dependent on further determinations. The specific duty was, nevertheless, materially increased in very many cases prior to the establishment of any official standards, no doubt predicated on full knowledge or in the belief that certain standards on certain dyes would ultimately prevail, but there would appear to be no warrant in law for any such presumption, and the provision is, no doubt, unworkable until all standards are permanently established.

CONTAINERS AND INVOICES MUST BEAR A TRULY DESCRIPTIVE STATEMENT OF CONTENTS.

"Provided further, That, beginning six months after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful to import or bring into the United States any such color, dye, stain, color acid, color base, color lake, leuco compound, indoxyl, or indoxyl compound, unless the immediate container and the invoice shall bear a plain, conspicuous, and truly descriptive statement of the identity and percentage, exclusive of diluents, of such color, dye, stain, color acid, color base, color lake, leuco compound, indoxyl, or indoxyl compound contained therein."

The foregoing provision imposes an additional responsibility on manufacturing consumers and importers, in that it is really up to them to see that all of the required information is given on containers and on invoices by the foreign manufacturers who do not fully comprehend the requirements and thus fail to comply fully therewith. It is my understanding that in many cases the percentage of diluents can not be determined, thus precluding compliance with the law. In other words, the requirements in the foregoing provision are so rigid as to operate in some instances as an actual embargo which is now unnecessary since the domestic industry is well established.

THE PROVISION DEFINING UNITED STATES VALUE.

"The United States value of imported merchandise shall be the price at which such or similar imported merchandise is freely offered for sale, packed ready for delivery, in the principal market of the United States to all purchasers, at the time of the exportation of the imported merchandise, in the usual wholesale quantities and in the ordinary course of trade * * *."

The foregoing provision is not and can not be successfully administered for the reason that, although diligent effort is made to do so, it frequently happens that an accurate offering or selling price, at the time of exportation of the imported merchandise, can not be ascertained. In combating the trade for offering and selling prices it frequently happens that different importers have, on or about the time of exportation of the imported merchandise, sold or offered for sale the identical dye at such a discrepancy in prices that appraisers are wholly at sea in their endeavor to arrive at a just dutiable value, and not infrequently it has happened that no offering prices or sales of the dye sought to be imported have been made for months previous so far as can be ascertained, and no provision whatever covering such contingency has been made in the law. No method whatsoever has been provided in the law for determining the dutiable value of an imported noncompetitive coal-tar product which has never been sold or offered for sale in this country, and new dyes are continually added to the manufacturing programs abroad. The law is very seriously defective in the respect mentioned.

THE PROVISION DEFINING AMERICAN SELLING PRICE.

"The American selling price of any article manufactured or produced in the United States shall be the price, including the cost of all containers and coverings of whatever nature and all other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing the merchandise in condition packed for delivery, at which such article is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in the principal markets of the United States, in the ordinary course of trade in the usual wholesale quantities in such market, or the price that the manufacturer, owner, or producer would have received or was willing to receive for such merchandise when sold in the ordinary course of trade and in the usual wholesale quantities, at the time of exportation of the imported article."

There are two very serious omissions in the foregoing provision. The words "and in sufficient quantities on reasonable terms of delivery to satisfy domestic requirements" or words conveying a similar meaning should have been added, probably after the word "market." It must be obvious that the omission is very serious in that it enables a domestic manufacturer to put out a coal-tar product in the usual wholesale quantities and yet not produce anywhere near enough of the product to satisfy reasonable needs for domestic consumption. There have been instances under this provision where consumers have been unable to obtain coal-tar products on reasonable delivery from domestic sources for use in their manufacturing programs and have had to import similar material from abroad and pay duty on a duty value based on the American selling price of the domestic product. Moreover, it nearly always happens in such instances that there is but one domestic manufacturer, who may at his option boost his price and thus cause the consumer to have to pay an exorbitant tariff duty on the foreign goods. In this connection it may be stated that under the provisions of the dye and chemical embargo act, since repealed, some domestic manufacturers made laboratory batches of dyes and other coal-tar products, thereafter reporting the commercial manufacture of the products for sale in the usual wholesale quantities, whereas later on investigation disclosed that they were not making the products in any considerable commercial quantities, but proposed doing so as soon as possible. Due to the omission noted, such practice may be regarded as being within the provisions of the act now of force. Furthermore, it should be stated again that the appraiser at New York is not equipped to continually carry on numerous investigations for the purpose of confirming each report of the manufacture of coal-tar products. To do so, the employment of a large number of competent chemists and colorists would be required for field work, thus necessitating a much larger expenditure of money than could be justified for the purpose.

The other serious omission is found in the fact that the "offering price" need not be based on an actual sale, and the omission has caused appraisers endless trouble and difficulty. It has been very difficult in numerous instances to obtain bona fide offering prices, due to the presumption that some domestic manufacturers offer their products for sale at one price and sell them at a lower price. Quite frequently it has happened that a domestic manufacturer has informed the appraiser of his offering price for the sale of a product and later on a prospective purchaser produces a letter from the same manufacturer in which a much lower offering price is quoted for the identical product and when called on by the appraiser for an explanation of the discrepancy various excuses are offered. Some domestic manufacturers keep the appraiser at New York fully informed of all changes in their manufacturing programs, including all changes in offering prices, etc. Others file an original report and fail thereafter to keep the appraiser informed of changes. Others assume an indifferent attitude, ignoring repeated Government requests and appeals for the information, and some manufacturers have refused to furnish the necessary information, thus rendering it extremely difficult for appraisers to comply with the mandate of law governing the importation of coal-tar products. Unless all domestic manufacturers furnish the appraiser at New York with all requisite information required by him for use in connection with a proper administration of the law governing the importation of such products and thereafter promptly advise him of all changes incident thereto, the American valuation plan, in so far as applicable to coal-tar products, is bound to be—in fact, is now—a failure.

Difficulty is also encountered in applying the American selling price in cases where a coal-tar product is competitive and a difference in relative strength is found. If, for instance, the imported article is found on test to be twice the strength of the domestic product and on the date of exportation of the imported merchandise the domestic product sold for $1 a pound, the dutiable value of the imported merchandise is arbitrarily fixed on a price basis of $2 a pound. It does not necessarily follow that just because a coal-tar product, especially a color lake, is twice the strength of a similar coal-tar product that the price should be increased in ratio therewith, and yet there is no other method of computing the dutiable value in such cases.

It will be noted from the foregoing that the American selling price provision is unworkable, viciously unfair, and confers special power and privilege on a certain line of industry, such as no industry is entitled to have.

ATTITUDE OF THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY.

The writer severed his connection with the Government on September 15, 1923, and is now engaged in business on his own account. In his travels in quest of business the writer called upon a large number of persons in authority in textile mills and incidentally sought to obtain their attitude toward the tariff legislation affecting the importation of coal-tar products. They expressed themselves as being very glad that a coal-tar dye and chemical industry is now well established in this country in view of the chaotic conditions abroad. A number of them said that, due to the character of the legislation, they have encountered more or less difficulty in obtaining dyes from abroad, similar kinds of which they could not obtain from domestic sources on reasonable delivery or in satisfactory quality for use in their manufacturing programs; and all of them, with the exception of a very few who were guardedly noncommittal, said that remedial relief through the elimination of the American valuation plan should be afforded. Most of them expressed the opinion that any change in legislation should comprehend adequate protection for the domestic coal-tar industry in order that it may be maintained in this country.

APPEALS FROM DECISIONS OF APPRAISERS.

The fact that hundreds of appeals from the decisions of appraisers have to date been filed with the board of general appraisers (customs court), due mainly to the complicated administrative provisions, is convincing evidence that there is something radically wrong with the legislation.

NONCOAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Regulation No. 10 of the Treasury Regulations, issued March 2, 1923, states in part that the words "similar competitive articles" in paragraphs (27) and (28) shall not be construed as relating exclusively to coal-tar products, and that an imported coal-tar product may be compared with a domestic noncoal-tar product or an imported noncoal-tar product with a domestic coal-tar product for the purpose of determining whether they are similar competitive articles. The title given paragraphs (27) and (28) is "Coal-tar products," and it is fair to assume that with the exception possibly of a very few natural products specifically mentioned by name in the paragraphs there was no intention whatever of including noncoal-tar products in the aforesaid paragraphs. The preceding statement is fully confirmed by the proviso in paragraphs (27) and (28), which reads as follows:

"For the purpose of this paragraph any coal-tar product provided for in this act shall be considered similar to or competitive with any imported coal-tar product which accomplishes results substantially equal to those accomplished by the domestic product when used in substantially the same manner."

There appears to be no warrant in the law for the inclusion of noncoal-tar products in the paragraphs cited.

SUMMARY.

It would appear from all of the foregoing, based on actual experience and observation, that the legislation governing the importation of coal-tar products is found in operation to be:

- (1) Monopolistic in that it confers special power and privilege.
- (2) Viciously unfair.
- (3) Legally unworkable in part.
- (4) Seriously defective in part.
- (5) Too complicated for successful administration.
- (6) Worse than an embargo.

REMEDY.

Coal-tar products, more especially dyestuffs, dyes, and color lakes, are so numerous and of such character that insurmountable difficulties are continually encountered in attempting to apply the so-called American valuation plan in their importation. It is an impossible undertaking and should be abandoned. A tariff based on foreign valuation, levied on a gold basis, and sufficiently high to insure ample protection should be substituted. The United States Tariff Commission can, no doubt, suggest proper rates of duty on such basis. Such action would remove all of the present difficulties, lessen the Government expenditure materially, and insure an expeditious delivery of such merchandise, at the same time insuring ample protection to the domestic industry.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion may I respectfully suggest that if there be no possibility of passing amendatory legislation during the present session, it would seem essential, in such eventuality, to have a congressional investigation for the purpose of fully determining all of the facts as to the additional expenditure of money incurred, the difficulties encountered, and the effect in operation of the administrative provisions of the tariff act of 1922, in so far as applicable to the importation of coal-tar products.

Respectfully submitted,

L. J. ROBINSON.

[NOTE.—Formerly employed in the office of the United States appraiser of merchandise at New York. Roster title, trade expert. Engaged exclusively on work with reference to the domestic manufacture and the importation of coal-tar products. Resigned September 15, 1923.]

Memorandum.

Suggestion for the repealing of certain sections of paragraph 27 and 28, covering coal-tar dyes and other coal-tar products, of the tariff act of September 22, 1922:

"Repeal all that portion of paragraph 27 of the tariff act of September 22, 1922, following the word 'valorem,' on line 47, page 4, of the tariff act of September 22, 1922.

"Repeal all that portion of paragraph 28 of the tariff act of September 22, 1922, following the word 'valorem,' on line 41, page 5, of the tariff act of September 22, 1922."

This in effect would assess all coal-tar intermediates, coal-tar dyes, and other coal-tar products, at ad valorem rates of duty based on the foreign market value rather than on the United States values and American selling prices.

Memorandum.

All coal-tar intermediates, coal-tar dyes and other coal-tar products are provided for in paragraphs 27 and 28 of the tariff act of September 22, 1922. Such articles, if produced in this country, are assessed at an ad valorem duty based on the American selling price. If they are not produced in this country they are assessed for duty on the United States value. This United States value is obtained by taking the United States selling price (that is, price at which the imported article is sold in the United States) and deducting 8 per cent for profit, 8 per cent for general expenses and overhead, also duty, insurance, freight, and transportation charges.

1. HOW THE TARIFF WORKS AS APPLIED TO COAL-TAR DYES AND RELATED COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Upon the arrival of an importation of coal-tar dyes, the importer fills out the appended form, giving information such as description of the dye, its Schultz number, manufacturer's number, date of the invoice, manufacturer's name, invoice price of the dye, last entry price of the dye, date of the order, how payments are to be made, character of material the dye is to be applied to, name of the steamship on which it arrives, and the date of arrival. This form, filled out so as to contain this information, is then submitted to the local United States appraiser, together with a copy of the invoice. No information will be given by the appraiser until the importation of coal-tar dyes is actually in port. He then notes on the form whether the dye is competitive or noncompetitive, and if competitive, the American selling price of the domestic product.

If there are several colors on the invoice the appraiser most probably and almost invariably is unable to tell without a test by the appraiser's laboratory whether one or more of the colors are competitive or noncompetitive. In that event he requests samples. Upon receipt of same they are sent to the appraiser's laboratory to be tested. This usually requires from two to four weeks.

In the meantime the importer has entered his merchandise, recalled his invoice, and is waiting for definite information from the United States appraiser before he can make his amended entry. The importer does not know how much duty he has to pay on those dyes on which the appraiser is making tests, and consequently he is unable to quote for sale or sell these colors. When the importer receives the advice from the appraiser that a color is competitive, he takes the necessary steps to determine whether or not the appraiser's stand is correct. He obtains samples of the domestic product, makes his dye tests, and also finds out the best he can from the trade the American selling price of the color. Very frequently and generally he disagrees with the findings of the appraiser, and then one conference after another is held with the appraiser to definitely determine whether or not the color is competitive. After the importer has definitely ascertained which of the colors imported are competitive and which noncompetitive, and if competitive the American selling price, he then has to ascertain the United States selling prices of those colors that are noncompetitive. He knows what he is selling these particular dyes for, but he does not know exactly what his competitors are selling them for. He has hearsay evidence obtained in the trade in the usual course of business, but this information is not accurate enough to use for the basis of entry.

Inasmuch as the appraiser will not tell him the United States value of noncompetitive colors, he has to guess, using as a basis the price that he is obtaining from the imported colors and what he hears that these colors are selling for in the trade; he then makes his amended entry and in due course of time, possibly a month, maybe three months, four months, or six months, the entry is acted upon by the appraiser and the chances are better even that the appraiser will disagree with the importer relating to the entry of one or more of the colors represented in the importation. In this event, the importer receives a notice of an advance.

Since the provisions contained in paragraphs 27 and 28—assessing coal-tar dyes, intermediated, and other coal-tar products at the United States value if noncompetitive and the American selling price if competitive—were inserted in the tariff law in conference in the final stages of the passages of the law by Congress, no administrative provisions were incorporated in the tariff for these products. In view of that fact, the same administrative provisions in the tariff law relating to products paying duty on foreign market value apply to coal-tar dyes paying duty on United States value and American selling prices. In other words, the stringent penalty provisions in the administrative sections of the tariff law, which were inserted to prevent fraud, are used to penalize the importer of dyes when he makes a wrong guess in the entry of coal-tar dyes based on the United States value or American selling price.

The penalties are usually twice as much as the additional duties, and as a rule the additional duties and penalties on an advance of coal-tar dyes are many times the selling price of those colors in the domestic market. It is true that the importer has redress before the Board of General Appraisers in an appeal for reappraisal of his goods. First, he would be heard by a single member of the Board of General Appraisers, and then by a Board of Three General Appraisers. This takes about six months before a final decision is handed down. In the meantime his business is at a standstill on those dyes covered by the appeal. If the importer should win his appeal, he must pay approximately 50 per cent of the additional duties and penalties as attorney fees.

2. GENERAL OBJECTIONS TO THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE DYESTUFF PARAGRAPHS OF THE TARIFF ACT OF SEPTEMBER 22, 1922.

The impracticability of the administration of American valuation as a basis for the determination of tariff duties is a self-evident fact. During the debate in Congress on the tariff law, which was passed on September 22, 1922, it was decided, because of this impracticability, not to change from the foreign market value as a basis of valuation. One can readily appreciate, if American valuation is impractical for general articles of the tariff law, how absurd it would be to use American valuation as a basis for the administration of provisions covering the complicated and innumerable coal-tar dyes. It was also shown during the debate in Congress how impossible it was to satisfactorily compare an imported article with an article of domestic manufacture, how there would always be one or more different characteristics of comparability, and this is amplified many times in determining the comparability of such complicated and technical products as coal-tar dyes.

1. The customs officials have held the question as to whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive to be one incidental to appraisement, rather than one of classification. Since a noncompetitive color is based on United States value, and a competitive color is based on American selling price, the difference in the dutiable value of a noncompetitive and a competitive color is always 100 per cent or more. Since the customs officials have held the question of whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive to be one of appraisement and not of classification, then the return of the appraiser that a color is competitive, when entered as noncompetitive, means an advance of 100 per cent or more in duty on the imported color. This subjects the imported color to the highest and most stringent penalty in the penalization provisions of the tariff law.

The following is an illustration of what this heavy penalty amounts to. An importer recently brought in 2,300 pounds of Patent Blue V, entering same as noncompetitive, and paid $1,361.60 duty. It was returned by the appraiser as competitive and the importer was required to pay $7,600.44 as additional duties and penalties. Of the $7,600.44 the additional duties were $2,732.40 and the penalties $4,868.04. The additional duties and penalties were twice the selling price or value in the domestic market of the 2,340 pounds of Patent Blue V.

There is no doubt that the question of a color being competitive or noncompetitive is one of fact and not one of value. The question as to whether or not an article should be provided for in one paragraph or another of the tariff act, is one of fact and not one of value. The argument has been raised that the reason why the question of whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive is one of appraisement and not one of classification, is that they are provided for in the same paragraph. This is very unsound reasoning, because there is no doubt that if an importer entered an article as acetic anhydride at 5 cents per pound, under paragraph 1 of the tariff act, and the appraiser, after examination, decided that the article was not acetic anhydride, but was another acid anhydride and assessed it at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the provision for all other acids and acid anhydrides not specifically provided for in the same paragraph, that in paragraph 1, this action of the appraiser would not be one of appraisement, but one of classification, and there would be no advance in value. There is no equity in subjecting an importer to the fraudulent penalization provisions of the tariff act when only a difference of opinion exists.

2. Since the customs officials have held the question of whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive to be one of appraisement and not one of classification, no notice is given when a color is changed from the noncompetitive to the competitive list. Thirty days' notice is given by the customs officials in the change of classification of the commodity in the tariff law. No doubt a similar 30-day notice should be given in a change of a color from the noncompetitive to the competitive list. As it is now, upon the importation of many colors, an importer does not know for a week to six weeks after the arrival of a color whether or not it is competitive. This lack of knowledge prior to the importation jeopardizes the consumer's business as well as the importer's, because the former is forced to buy imported colors with the understanding that he should pay any additional customs duties that might hereafter be assessed. If there were a 30-day notification, whether a color was competitive or noncompetitive, the importer would know prior to importation, and most probably at the date of the order, so that the consumer would actually know what price he was paying for the dye.

3. The provision in paragraphs 27 and 28 which defines "competitive" is as follows:

"Any coal-tar product provided for in this act should be considered similar to or competitive with any imported coal-tar product, if it accomplishes results substantially equal to those accomplished by the domestic article, when used in substantially the same manner."

It is evident that this is a very loosely drawn provision, and is based upon the double use of the relative word "substantially." Whenever a relative word has been used in the tariff law for distinguishing between two or more articles, it has always been the source of considerable litigation. No doubt it was the intent of Congress that a dye was competitive when it would constitute a commercial delivery for an imported dye, but this provision is so drawn that if an imported dye accomplishes results substantially equal when used in substantially the same manner as a domestic dye, then the domestic dye is competitive. An imported color may have 10 essential qualities and the domestic color may have only 8 of these, but with a broad interpretation of this provision the domestic color would be competitive with the imported color.

The chief objection to paragraphs 27 and 28 is the question of whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive and the American selling price as a basis of appraisement of customs duties. The elimination of these two provisions would do away with practically all of the objections to the dyestuff paragraphs. This provision defining whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive is so loosely drawn that no two people have the same interpretation as to whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive according to this provision. As long as such a provision remains in the tariff law there will always be needless questions and dispute, especially when you are applying such provision to the importation of thousands of different coal-tar dyes, no two of which are exactly the same. The question of comparability of imported and domestic merchandise at its best is impractical and impossible even when applied to merchandise of a simple character, but when applied to such intricate and involved articles as coal-tar dyes it passes from the impossible to the ludicrous.

4. The Board of General Appraisers in the so-called Azo-Flavine case recently ruled that the burden of proof as to whether or not the imported color is competitive, and as to its American selling price, is placed with the importer. In other words, according to this decision of the Board of General Appraisers the importer is supposed or, rather, forced to prove a negative.

In other words, he is presupposed to know what every one of the eighty-odd domestic manufacturers of dyes is producing in this country and the prices they are getting for their dyes. Also he is supposed to know who manufactures each of the thirteen to fifteen hundred dyes produced in this country and the American selling price of each. The Board of General Appraisers in this decision have shown clearly how impossible it is to administer paragraphs 27 and 28 of the present tariff law. It takes no stretch of imagination for anyone to realize that it is absurd to place the burden of proof on an importer in the importation of colors, and to presuppose that an importer knows who manufactures every color produced in this country and the price at which they are sold in the domestic market.

5. The Treasury Department in the promulgation of regulations on March 8, 1923, for the administration of the dyestuff provisions of the tariff act, requiring the customs officials to hold that as long as an intermediate is produced in this country it is competitive, although such intermediate has never been sold or offered for sale in this country. This is administration in a more comprehensive and broader manner than the law intended. In order to enforce this regulation the customs officials are required by the Treasury Department to calculate the American selling price of the intermediate, figuring back from the finished domestic product sold in this country and made from such intermediate. For example, if A is an intermediate produced in this country, but never sold or offered for sale, and B is a dye produced in this country made from intermediate A and sold at $3 a pound, upon importing the intermediate A it would be assessed at a duty calculated on the American selling price figured from the American selling price of $3 per pound for dye B. Since the customs officials have not the personnel capable of conducting investigations to determine exactly the cost of producing dye B from intermediate A, they must take the statements of the domestic manufacturer, which it is evident would be very high, and approximate very closely the selling price of dye B. This is a very striking example of writing into a law by regulation something that is not in the law and was never intended to be there.

6. The Treasury Department in the same regulations, promulgated on March 8, 1923, provided that all importations of noncoal-tar products, when competitive with coal-tar products produced in this country, shall be held to be competitive and pay a duty on the American selling price under paragraphs 27 and 28 of the tariff act. This is another example of writing by regulations into the tariff act something that does not exist there. This is certainly very broad and loose interpretation of the scope of the dyestuff paragraphs of the tariff law.

7. The customs officials are constantly shifting colors from the competitive to the noncompetitive list, and from the noncompetitive to the competitive list. Some colors have been changed as often as three and four times from one list to another. For example, Phosphine 3 R. Shortly after September 22, 1922, this was placed on the competitive list. Evidence was submitted to the local United States appraiser showing that this color was noncompetitive, and it was placed on the noncompetitive list. It remained there until some two months ago when it was given place on the competitive list. Again, evidence was submitted to the appraiser showing that this color was noncompetitive and recently it was transferred to the noncompetitive list.

Patent Blue V is another example. Shortly after the passage of the tariff act of September 22, 1922, this was made competitive with the domestic product selling at $1.75. In March, 1923, it was changed to the noncompetitive list. In April, 1923, it was again made competitive, this time with a domestic product selling at $2.85 per pound. There it remained until about four to six weeks ago, when it was made competitive with the same color that it was first made competitive with, having a selling price of $1.75 per pound. These are only two of a hundred or more instances of vacillation in a most important matter. This vacillating policy of the local customs appraisers jeopardizes business, because an importer does not know from one day to another whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive. He may be figuring on a color as being noncompetitive and is so quoting his customer, when, as a matter of fact, the appraiser has changed his attitude and holds the color to be competitive; or, vice versa, an importer might be figuring that a color is competitive, his competitor gets more recent information from the appraiser, quoted as noncompetitive, and obtains the business.

8. It is a self-evident fact that it is impossible to properly administer the dyestuff provisions of the tariff law because of their impracticability. The difficulties are more complicated, due to the fact that there is not a properly qualified staff of officials to administer these two tariff provisions. It is granted that the Treasury Department recently employed a colorist who has had many years' experience in the dyestuff business in this country. This gentleman is only one of a number who passes on numerous questions arising in the administration of the dyestuff provisions. The final questions are passed upon by the United States appraiser and the special deputy appraiser. Both, although very capable and qualified, have had no experience in the dyestuff business and very limited experience in the administration of the tariff law. The examiner in actual charge of the passing of the dyestuff invoices is not a chemist and has never had any experience in the dyestuff business in any manner, shape, or form, although he has had many years' experience in the tariff administration. There are numerous questions arising in the proper administration of these paragraphs, such as what the usual wholesale quantity is, what a reasonable price is, whether or not a color is competitive, and many other questions of fact that can only be properly determined by persons who have an intimate knowledge of the dyestuff business.

9. If an imported dye is competitive with two or more domestic colors, the local customs officials invariably take the domestic color having the highest price. An importer recently had an importation of a color known as crystal violet O. This color was competitive with three of domestic manufacture, one selling at $1.75, one at $1.77, and another at $3.75 per pound. Although this color more closely approximated in quality the domestic article selling at $1.77, the appraiser assessed it as competitive with the color selling at $3.75.

10. The local customs officials have also adopted the practice of determining whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive by comparison of the United States value with the American selling price of the competitive color. If the United States value is lower than the American selling price, they hold it to be competitive. It is a poor rule that won't work both ways, and this certainly is an inequitable practice in the administration of the dyestuff provisions.

An importer recently imported a color known as Pinatype Complement Red D. Although this dye is the same as one of domestic manufacture, but of higher concentration, it was nevertheless held to be noncompetitive, inasmuch as its dutiable value was considerably higher than the American selling price of the product of domestic manufacture. There are several dyes that are produced by only one manufacturer. In these dyes the sole American manufacturer has a monopoly because the price that he sells his color for is used as a basis for the assessment of duty. Consequently by his selling price he can fix the duty that an importer would have to pay importing the same color. This is a case where Congress has delegated to an individual the power to assess customs duties, which undoubtedly is a violation of the Constitution.

11. The customs officials determine the American selling prices by calculation. When a color is imported of a different concentration than the same color of domestic manufacture, they figure the American selling price for dutiable purposes, based upon the American selling price of the domestic product and its relative strength as compared with the imported dye; i. e., if there is an importation of a vat dye in powder form and there is no vat dye in powder form produced in this country, but there is a vat dye in paste form produced in this country which is one-fifth the strength of the powder form, and this dye is selling in the domestic market at $2 per pound, then the customs officials will multiply this American selling price of $2 per pound by 5 and use this calculated American selling price of $10 for assessing duty on the imported vat dye in powder form. This undoubtedly is contrary to the tariff law, because the customs officials are comparing dyes of a different consistency and are using a calculated or theoretical American selling price for dutiable purposes.

12. The impracticability and injustice of the dyestuff provisions of the tariff act are clearly shown in the Hydron Pink FF case. Hydron Pink FF is a color that is used in dyeing cotton goods and is bought and sold in lots of 1,000 pounds or upward. Domestic consumption in this country is approximately 150,000 pounds per year. This color was held to be noncompetitive up until June, 1923, when a domestic manufacturer notified the local United States appraiser that he was producing this color. The domestic manufacturer had made only two or three sales and was producing less than 1,000 pounds per month. He informed a domestic consumer that he could supply 100 pounds of this color within two to three weeks, but could make no promise of delivery on a quantity of 500 pounds. Inasmuch as this dye is bought and sold in quantities of 1,000 pounds or more, that quantity is the usual wholesale quantity of this color. The domestic manufacturer has never produced or sold this color in that usual wholesale quantity. Notwithstanding this fact, the local United States appraiser made this color competitive, not only as of June, 1923, but dating back to April 18, 1923, the date of the first sale of the color by the domestic manufacturer. The domestic manufacturer was not able to make deliveries to supply 1 per cent of the domestic consumption, nevertheless it was held to be competitive. The domestic consumers could not get domestic dye sufficient to supply one-tenth of their needs and were required to pay an additional duty of 75 cents per pound in using the imported color.

In October, 1923, the domestic manufacturer notified the trade and the local United States appraiser that he had withdrawn this color from the market. Regardless of this fact, the local appraiser still contends that this color is competitive, declaring that the domestic manufacturer is still producing it, although not offering it for sale. Here we have the situation where the domestic manufacturer is not offering this color, nevertheless it is held to be competitive, and as the consumer has to use the imported color, he is compelled to pay duty based upon the price of the article which is not even sold in the domestic market.

13. The following is an example of the injustice of paragraphs 27 and 28 of the tariff law. Allsarine red was imported and entered as noncompetitive. The importer, to the best of his belief and knowledge, knew nothing about any comparable color produced in the domestic market. Some few weeks after importation the appraiser advanced this color, holding it to be competitive with a color of domestic manufacture. The importer was notified of this advance, which amounted to over $5,000, and a hearing was set before the general appraiser. The importer was called upon to give the necessary proof and evidence to show that the color of domestic manufacture was not comparable with the imported color. On the date set for the trial the domestic manufacturer admitted that his color was not comparable. The importer was put to all this trouble and expense when there was no real basis for any return by the appraiser that the dye was competitive. It is thus seen how the domestic manufacturer can, acting through the appraiser, put the importer to unnecessary expense and loss of business.

Any change in the dyestuff provisions of the tariff act which would eliminate the question of whether a color is competitive or noncompetitive and the American selling price would do away with practically all the troubles that are now being encountered by legitimate importers of dyestuffs and by consumers of dyestuffs in this country.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 10, 1924.

Mr. FREAK introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 7791) to amend act approved September 21, 1922, known as the tariff act.

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraphs 27 and 28 of the act approved September 21, 1922, entitled "An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," be amended to read as follows:

"PAR. 27. Coal-tar products: Acetanilide not suitable for medicinal use, alpha-naphthol, aminobenzoic acid, aminonaphthol, aminophenetole, aminophenol, aminosalicylic acid, aminoanthraquinone, aniline oil, aniline salt, anthraquinone, arsenic acid, benzaldehyde not suitable for medicinal use, benzal chloride, benzanthrene, benzidine, benzidine sulfate, benzoic acid not suitable for medicinal use, benzoquinone, benzoyl chloride, benzyl chloride, benzylethylaniline, betanaphthol not suitable for medicinal use, bromobenzene, chlorobenzene, chlorophthalic acid, cinnamic acid, cumidine, dehydrothioloalidine, diaminostilbene, dianisidine, dichlorophthalic acid, dimethylaniline, dimethylanilinophenol, dimethylphenolbenzylammonium hydroxide, dimethylphenylenediamine, dinitrobenzene, dinitrochlorobenzene, dinitronaphthalene, dinitrophenol, dinitrotoluene, dihydroxynaphthalene, diphenylamine, hydroxyphenylarsenic acid, metallic acid, methylanthraquinone, naphthylamine, naphthylenediamine, nitroaniline, nitroanthraquinone, nitrobenzaldehyde, nitrobenzene, nitronaphthalene, nitrophenol, nitrophenylenediamine, nitrosodimethylaniline, nitrotoluene, nitrotoluylenediamine, phenol, phenylenediamine, phenylhydrazine-phenylnaphthylamine, phenylglycine, phenylglycineortho-carboxylic acid, phthalic acid, phthalic anhydride, phthalimide, quinoline, quinoline, resorcinol not suitable for medicinal use, salicylic acid and its salts not suitable for medicinal use, sulphanilic acid, thiocarbamide, thiosalicylic acid, tetrachlorophthalic acid, tetramethyldiaminobenzophenone, tetramethyldiaminodiphenylmethane, toluene, sulphochloride, toluene sulphonamide, tribromophenol, toluidine, tolidine, tolylenediamine, xylydine, anthracene having a purity of 30 per cent or more, carbazole having a purity of 95 per cent or more, metacresol having a purity of 90 per cent or more, naphthalene which after the removal of all water present has a solidifying point of 79° C. or above, orthocresol having a purity of 90 per cent or more, paracresol having a purity of 90 per cent or more; all the foregoing products in this paragraph whether obtained, derived, or manufactured from coal tar or other source; all distillates of coal tar, blast-furnace tar, oil-gas tar, and water-gas tar, which on being subjected to distillation yield in the portion distilling below 190° C. grade a quantity of tar acids equal to or more than 5 per cent of the original distillate or which on being subjected to distillation yield in the portion distilling below 215° C. a quantity of tar acids equal to or more than 75 per cent, of the original distillate; all similar products by whatever name known, which are obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from any of the products provided for in this paragraph, or from any of the products provided for in paragraph 1549; all mixtures, including solutions, consisting in whole or in part of any of the foregoing products provided for in this paragraph, except sheep dip and medicinal soaps; all the foregoing products provided for in this paragraph, not colors, dyes, or stains, color acids, color bases, color lakes, leuco compounds, indoxyl, indoxyl compounds, ink powders, photographic chemicals, medicinals, synthetic aromatic or odoriferous chemicals, synthetic resin-like products, synthetic tanning materials, or explosives, and not specially provided for in paragraphs 28 and 1549, 7 cents per pound and 55 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That no duty imposed under this paragraph shall be increased under the provisions of section 315.

"PAR. 28. Coal-tar products: All colors, dyes, or stains, whether soluble or not in water; color acids, color bases, color lakes, leuco compounds, whether colorless or not; indoxyl and indoxyl compounds; ink powders, photographic chemicals, acetanilide suitable for medicinal use; acetphenetidine, acetylsalicylic acid, antipyrine, benzaldehyde suitable for medicinal use, benzoic acid suitable for medicinal use, beta-naphthol suitable for medicinal use, guaiacol and its derivatives, phenolphthalein, resorcinol suitable for medicinal use, salicylic acid and its salts suitable for medicinal use, salol, and other medicinals; sodium benzoate saccharin, artificial musk, benzyl acetate, benzyl benzoate, coumarin, diphenyloxide, methyl anthranilate, methyl salicylate, phenylacetaldehyde, phenylethyl alcohol, and other synthetic odoriferous or aromatic chemicals, including flavors; all of these products not marketable as perfumery, cosmetics, or toilet preparations, and not mixed and not compounded, and not containing alcohol; synthetic phenolic resin, and all resin-like products prepared from phenol, cresol, phthalic anhydride, coumarone, indene, or from any other article or material provided for in paragraph 27 or 1549; all of these products, whether in a solid, semisolid, or liquid condition; synthetic tanning materials, picric acid, trinitrotoluene, and other explosives, except smokeless powders; all the foregoing products provided for in this paragraph, when obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from any of the products provided for in paragraph 27 or 1549; natural alizarin and natural indigo, and colors, dyes, stains, color acids, color bases, color lakes, leuco compounds, indoxyl, and indoxyl compounds, obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from natural alizarin or natural indigo; natural methyl salicylate or oil of wintergreen or oil of sweet birch; natural coumarin, natural guaiacol and its derivatives, and all mixtures, including solutions consisting in whole or in part of any of the articles or materials provided for in this paragraph, excepting mixtures of synthetic odoriferous or aromatic chemicals, 7 cents per pound, and 60 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That no duty imposed under this paragraph shall be increased under the provisions of section 315."

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. On what subject?

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. In connection with the Roosevelt incident on Saturday.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I wonder whether the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is present. If not, will the gentleman postpone his remarks until he is present.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I would not object to that except the House will be in Committee of the Whole at that time. I do not think I shall say anything that will be offensive to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RANKIN. I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order of no quorum. Evidently a quorum is not present.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Edmonds	McClintic	Rogers, N. H.
Anderson	Fredericks	McDuffie	Romjue
Bankhead	Free	McFadden	Schafer
Beers	Freeman	Magee, Pa.	Schneider
Bell	Fulmer	Michaelson	Sears, Fla.
Bloom	Funk	Miller, Ill.	Shreve
Bowling	Gallivan	Mills	Sinnot
Boylan	Garber	Moore, Ill.	Steagall
Britten	Geran	Morin	Strong, Kans.
Carew	Goldsborough	O'Brien	Sullivan
Carter	Greene, Mass.	O'Connell, N. Y.	Sweet
Casby	Hayden	O'Connor, La.	Tague
Celler	Hall, Tenn.	O'Connor, N. Y.	Taylor, Colo.
Cole, Ohio	Hull, William E.	O'Sullivan	Tilson
Connolly, Pa.	Jacobstein	Oliver, Ala.	Tucker
Corning	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver, N. Y.	Upshaw
Curry	Kahn	Parker	Weller

S. 2488. An act to authorize the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said city; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if the gossip about the Capitol is any indication, there will be an attempt made to hand the ex-service men another "gold-brick" bonus bill, said to be similar in its features to the one passed at the last session.

The press of the country said of that bonus bill:

That spineless piece of unsound legislation, the certificate of cashless bonus bill; "the gold-brick bonus bill"; "the pawnbrokers' bill," designed not to help the soldiers but to save political lives. The bill provides certificates which they may "hock" at the bank or the pawnshop or the private loan shark's office on the best terms they may. Does any Congress imagine that a hard-up soldier, out of a job, can make a loan on better terms than the Government of the United States? Why tolerate a cowardly enactment like that with which Mr. Fordney and his confederates tried to soothe the taxpayers and the veterans?

MEN ENTITLED TO CASH.

I do not believe that the leaders will be able to force this bill down the throats of the Congressmen as they did at the last session, and that there are enough men who will fight to the limit to get an adjusted compensation for the ex-service men in the form of a cash payment instead of a certificate permitting them to go into debt, if the ex-service men in the House do not weaken and fall for a makeshift. Much of the propaganda directed to the Congressmen about the pending tax measures carried with it not only a request to pass the so-called Mellon bill but also carried a demand that no bonus bill be defeated.

Why any set of persons in this country can be so greedy as to want what amounts to a tax bonus for themselves and yet want to deny a bonus to the men who made it possible for that same set of persons to now enjoy not only prosperity but peace and comfort as well is beyond my comprehension.

MONEYED INTERESTS WANTED WAR.

The big financial and social leaders are the ones who wanted the war. They clamored for war and they got it. They did not enlist and fight, but pleased and profited during the war; made millions of dollars out of it without suffering the slightest personal danger or the least privation. Yet, to the men who went abroad, lived in the filthy trenches, sacrificed their health and youth, and in many instances their lives, this set of men would have given them nothing. Every man who enlisted sacrificed his opportunity for personal gain. While it might not have amounted to as much in dollars and cents, it was as important to him as to any financial or social leader in the country. Business got its bonus and got it quick. It did not have to plead or beg for it. Is flesh and blood of less consequence in this country than mere property?

When the war ended the shipbuilders were paid not only bonuses under contracts which gave them half the savings they made on contracts in many cases, but they were also paid canceled-contract claims which gave them profits on ships never built.

GOT THEIRS IN CASH FIRST.

The munition makers, the harness makers, the clothing makers, the gunmakers, the aircraft builders—every branch of war industry was paid not only adjusted compensation through the hundreds of millions given those industries in canceled-contract claims, but right now the Government is trying to recover $9,000,000 paid the aircraft builders as bonuses.

While the soldier, suffering in the trenches 24 hours a day, fighting deadly shells and gases as well as poisonous and tormenting vermin, knew no let-up, industry and its employees, bomb and disease proof, were collecting bonuses and the Macy Wage Board and other boards were adjusting compensation by increasing wages every two weeks.

NEVER TREATED SOLDIERS FAIR.

Nobody thought about increasing the soldiers' wages. He had been promised that his job would be open for him when he came back. The fact that he lost the chance to make war-time wages was supposed to be his badge of honor and sacrifice. Yet the very interests that collected billions in both adjusted compensation and bonuses are not content with what they got, but now desire to deprive the soldier of an adjusted compensation.

There was no effort to give the soldier a bonus. The soldier could not strike or quit soldiering. If he tried it, he was sent to prison or might be stood against the wall and shot. Now, he asks that he be paid $2.25 a day for the time he was separated from his loved ones and was undergoing the hardships and dangers of war, while the great interests insisted on paying their employees $15, $20, and $25 a day, and in many cases insisted that the workers do not too much work even at that wage. This was because under the cost-plus contracts these predatory interests made more money when the employees loafed on the job.

INTERESTS TOOK BIG PROFIT.

Did any of these interests which now oppose adjusted compensation for veterans come forward and oppose the payment of profits on war material never completed when the contractor canceled at the cessation of the war? Quite to the contrary, they sought every avenue of influence to collect the profits on war machinery which was never built.

It was these interests who first characterized adjusted compensation as "a bonus."

These interests insist that the soldier should be satisfied to have received a dollar a day for his time in the trenches. How many of these great interests were willing to build war materials at cost? How many of them saved the soldier's job for him until he came back?

PAID BILLIONS TO RAILROADS.

This country paid billions to the railroads, the shipbuilders, munition manufacturers, and others, and created thousands of millionaires out of war profits, and those same war millionaires now come forward to oppose showing the soldier any gratitude.

During war times everybody cared for the soldier. Now nobody cares.

I favored adjusted compensation, to be accorded in a cash payment, for the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war. I deplore the delay of Congress, not only in meeting this obligation but also in failing to provide proper care and treatment for those who were disabled in the service.

WAR PRODUCED MILLIONAIRES.

It is estimated that for every American soldier killed in France war profiteering produced three millionaires in this country. Adjusted compensation for the service men should be paid by imposing a tax upon excess profits and swollen incomes from fortunes largely derived from war profits. If this can not be done, then I am in favor of issuing long-term Government bonds to provide the money for an immediate cash bonus.

I am unalterably opposed to every scheme like the sales tax, designed to force the men and their families who fought the war to pay this just obligation growing out of the war.

How can we say to our soldiers we have no money to pay a bonus when this country supplied the money to pay a bonus to the soldiers of England and France?

BONUS BEGGED FOR NO BONUS.

A bonus begged for is no bonus at all. Armistice Day rejoicing was not in the heart of the Nation; only in the pocket. Economy is a poor stall when the Nation's honor men are in need. Millions of dollars are wasted by the Government and when soulless corporations can get aid and succor, how can relief be denied soldiers? In the end, the soldiers' good will and gratitude will far outweigh the temporary money advance. An honorable discharge should be legal tender for the necessities of life. The hope and faith of the returned soldier is worth to the country all it costs to preserve it. They made good for us. Let us make good to them. A contented citizenship is better security than all the wealth in the country.

If the Government recovered the hundreds of millions of dollars stolen from the Treasury of the United States by crooks and grafters who profited in war contracts, there would be plenty of money to pay the soldiers' bonus. The bonus should be paid in cash and paid at once. Many of our ex-service men are out of employment, and need the money now, and a little money now may be worth many times a larger sum later.

The payment of the soldiers' bonus is an obligation which it would be shameful to avoid. If the war had lasted many days longer, the cost to the Government would have been more than the total amount necessary to pay the bonus, and no one thinks that Uncle Sam would have defaulted or laid down because of this extra cost. Money is raised to meet the cost of the war, and a bonus to the soldiers is simply a part of the cost, and should be paid in cash and not in promises. That distinguished soldier and patriot, George Washington, received a large bonus in the form of public lands for his services, and did not hesitate to accept it. After the Civil War bonuses were given to the soldiers, and there was no protest. England, France, and others of the Allies engaged in the war paid their soldiers bonuses, and with our money, too.

SET PREMIUM ON COWARDICE.

Assuming that the average wage before the war was at least $5 a day, every soldier who enlisted and fought in the trenches received only $1 a day, while workers who stayed at home received high war wages, in some instances as high as $25 per day. Is this country to set a premium on cowardice?

Everyone who had anything to sell to the Government during the war not only received a bonus, but a cash premium for the cancellation of their contracts. All property confiscated during the war was well paid for. Why not make a partial payment for the time of our service men, as every service man who entered the war was automatically deprived of a large sum of money that would have been his if he had stayed at home.

PEOPLE WANT BONUS.

The people of the United States are in favor of a bonus, and in every State where the question has been submitted by a referendum to the people the vote has been overwhelmingly in favor of the bonus.

Some argue that the bonus is a State matter. That is not true. The war was not a State matter. States were not at war. The war was a national affair and the bonus should be paid by the Nation. The gratitude of the States should not be used as a substitute for the duty of the Nation.

AGRICULTURAL SITUATION.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a brief statement made by one of our Washington papers regarding the agricultural situation, the amount of farm reserves, the visible supply, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I have objected to all matters of that sort going into the Record. If the gentleman wants to insert anything of his own, I shall not object, but I do not believe we should print articles from the Washington newspapers or any other clipping. Therefore I object.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, do I understand some Member objects to my request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] objects on the ground that he objects to the printing of all newspaper articles in the Record.

CIVIL WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. SWOOPE. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 7303, which was introduced by Mr. FULLER, proposes to increase the pensions of all Civil War veterans to $72 per month. This is the amount allotted under the act of May 1, 1920, to soldiers of the Civil War when their physical disabilities are such that they require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person.

It seems to me that when it is 59 years since the Civil War ended, and all those who served in that war must be at least 74 years old, and most of them much older, it is time for us to consider them all disabled. Certainly, there is no disease so incurable as old age, nor any that causes so many disabilities and handicaps. All of the Members of this House have been receiving hundreds of letters during the past few months urging us "to do everything for the disabled." We can certainly include among the "disabled" all of the Civil War veterans as being unable to labor because of the burthen of years.

Each year the number of Civil War veterans becomes less, compared with the number of the young, the hopeful, and the aspiring who crowd around them. They stand like the solitary pines of the forest, lifting their scarred and wounded forms amidst the fresh and youthful verdure. But, old and broken as they are, I know of no men in the world more revered nor more entitled to honor. When I meet an old soldier in the street I feel like taking off my hat and bowing in lowly obeisance before him. His brass buttons and his old blue coat are synonyms of bravery, of glory, and of patriotism.

There are now, of the two millions of men who served in the Union Army during the Civil War, only 110,000. In the next fiscal year, according to the mortality statistics, 26,000 of them will die, and so every year the number will become less. The expenditure of the comparatively small sum of $17,700,000 will pay the increased pensions to those who now survive, and the following year it will cost only $13,000,000. This is a very small sum for the Government of the richest country in the world to spend to make comfortable the old age of those who preserved the Union.

We all know that the cost of living has risen at least 71 per cent since the World War began, and this increase in the cost of living has lessened the value of the dollar. A pension that might have been sufficient in 1914 to purchase the necessities of life will now buy only a little more than half as much as it then would.

We want as a Nation to prove that the old maxim, "Republicans are always ungrateful," does not apply to the United States. We want to be both just and generous to all those who served the country in her hours of trial. Let us begin by trying to assist over the years of old age the veterans who helped Lincoln to save the Union.

APPROPRIATIONS—NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6820) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes. Pending that I want to see whether we can arrange for a time at which to close general debate.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What suggestion would the gentleman from Idaho make?

Mr. FRENCH. The demand for time has been rather heavy, but I would like to ask whether we can not agree on four and one-half hours, to be controlled equally by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and by myself.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Inasmuch as we have already agreed upon that I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four and one-half hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6820.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6820, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 6820, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask that any members of the committee who are interested turn to page 4279 of the Record of March 15, which was Saturday last. Near the bottom of the first column of that page please read with me the following sentence from the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]:

According to his own testimony—

Says Mr. STEVENSON, referring to Col. Theodore Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy—

According to his own testimony, his wife became the owner of 1,000 shares of the Sinclair Oil Co. and retained them until 1922, after the leases that are complained of had all been executed.

I ask the House to note two points in connection with that sentence. First, the direct and explicit statement that this was according to Colonel Roosevelt's own testimony. Second, that the ownership of Mrs. Roosevelt continued until after the leases that are complained of had all been executed.

Now, gentlemen, it may seem a little strange and unusual in these emotional days and in the present hearsay atmosphere of Washington if I produce the actual record, the printed word, which was and is accessible to every one of you as it is accessible to me, and read to you a parallel column sentence from the sworn testimony of Col. Theodore Roosevelt. This will be found in the oil-investigation proceedings for Monday, October 29, last, long before the controversy had assumed the proportions which it has now assumed. It is printed upon page 417 of the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, United States Senate, entitled "Leases upon naval oil reserves":

STATEMENT OF HON. THEODORE ROOSEVELT, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY—RESUMED.

My last connection with the Sinclair Co. in any financial way, direct or indirect, finished when my wife sold some stock she had had, at a loss, a short time before the lease was signed.

Now, I ask you in all fairness and candor, gentlemen—and this is in no sense a partisan or political matter—to compare that statement, which I repeat was as accessible to the gentleman from South Carolina as it is accessible to you and to me, with the statement which I have read from the gentleman's own remarks.

No; this is not a partisan question. This is a question of whether we as a House of Representatives or whether we as individual Members of this House can afford lightly to blacken a man's reputation. That is the essential issue, because the charge that was made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] was a very grave charge; a charge that in my judgment tended to bring Theodore Roosevelt's name into discredit and into disrepute.

I do not see why the gentleman from South Carolina, who freely quoted Colonel Roosevelt's own testimony elsewhere in his remarks, did not, in candor and in fairness, also quote to the House the sentence which I have read from Theodore Roosevelt's own testimony. That should have been done at the same time and for our information. Gentlemen, I do not want to attack the gentleman from South Carolina. I do not rise in any spirit of that kind whatever. I simply rise because I think we ought to join, all of us, in these excited and troubled days, in the demand that a man's reputation should not be assailed lightly. It is all that he has, after all.

In this connection, because, I say for the third time, the matter is a nonpartisan one, I want to read from an editorial in the Boston Post, which is perhaps the leading Democratic paper of my part of the country, and many of you would say one of the leading Democratic organs of the entire United States. Speaking of what has been going on in the Senate of late, the Boston Post says—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts one more minute.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The Boston Post says:

We submit that it is about time to put an end to this biatheskrilling. As it now is, anyone of the most unsavory antecedents and proved unreliability can come before a Senate committee and insult and slander men of the highest character. It is easy to say that such baseless charges are soon refuted; but the lie travels everywhere and swiftly, while the subsequent truth never has quite the same chance. It is one thing to investigate sanely; it is another to permit unlimited slinging of filth under a sort of official sanction.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Before proceeding further let the Chair state that the time that has been used on both sides up until this morning was almost equally divided, and there is left 2 hours and 15 minutes on each side.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman comes back here to fight what is not in issue. Here is the testimony of Mr. Roosevelt, and I read it the other day:

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. I acted as a director [referring to the Sinclair Co.]—this I will again have to ask for corroboration on—I acted as a director from, I should have said, 1916 to 1917.

Mr. SINCLAIR. 1916, I think.

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. 1916 to 1917.

Senator WALSH. And your stock was sold some time during 1917 or 1918?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. My stock was sold, I should say, in the winter of 1918.

Senator WALSH. And then your wife became a stockholder in 1920?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. In 1920; and sold that stock in 1921, I think I can tell you, approximately. It was, I think, in 1922; sold it in 1922.

Senator WALSH. Are there any other members of your family interested in the Sinclair Co.?

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. My brother is an employee of the Sinclair Co.

I read that statement. I did not find any statement there in which he said he sold it before or after the lease, and the very fact that it was of such vital interest for him to say it was before the lease caused me to draw the inference that it was after the lease.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; not now.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman like to read this for himself?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not yield now. But when his distinguished brother-in-law, Mr. LONGWORTH, assured us that it was sold before the lease I accepted that statement, and the Record shows I accepted it, because I knew he would not state what was untrue. But it left the fact admitted that she owned it when Roosevelt got the presidential order signed that made the lease possible.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was not any necessity for his coming back here—and, by the way, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] also disclaimed any intention of charging me with being a deliberate falsifier. I took the statement as a settlement of that issue.

They say I am a slanderer. Now, gentlemen, I expect to prepare and give to the press a statement of all this matter, in which I will state substantially everything I have stated here, and anybody who is entitled to sue me for libel can do it anywhere.

I do not stand behind any immunity. I have been in the business for 35 years, and I stand by my statements and by my actions, and I defy any man in court to overturn them. [Applause.]

I did say that if these attorneys, who were out and who were rejected, were disqualified because of former connections with oil companies, this record showed Mr. Roosevelt was, too. In a statement in this morning's papers he makes a rather savage attack on me. I asked him a question, and I am going to ask this House that same question. I am going to read you a part of this record, and a very small part of it, at page 1882, Mr. Archie Roosevelt being cross-examined by Mr. Stanford:

Mr. STANFORD. Now, Archie, as a matter of fact, you haven't had much to do with the Sinclair Co.'s business for the past year, have you?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. No, sir; nothing except that Russian thing.

Mr. STANFORD. That Russian thing?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes.

Mr. STANFORD. And that was when we went over to Russia in May, 1923?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANFORD. And I believe you made a report?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANFORD. And you have done some little work under Mr. Watts?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANFORD. In reference to disposing of some gasoline over there? Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes, sir; I came up here—there is another place I got—I came up here and tried to get this Mr. Watts to dispose of some gasoline, in regard to some contract, anyhow—I have forgotten now—

That is a remarkably clear business record—to the Navy Department, and the Navy Department turned us down.

Mr. STANFORD. Well, that has been practically the extent of your business in connection with the foreign work of the Sinclair Co. in the last year, has it not?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Practically entirely; yes, sir. I watched and got reports, you know, from Mr. Woodman and Mr. Longshore, and when I was in London I did one or two little trivial things, you know.

That is the testimony of Archie Roosevelt as to what he did in the year 1923, for which he was paid $15,000, according to the testimony of Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

I ask the questions: First, when was it that his salary was raised from $10,000 to $15,000 a year, and at whose request? Second, for what was the $15,000 a year paid? It appears it was not paid for work. Third, the gentleman in assailing me said that he got this job for Archie, who was a veteran and a cripple. I want to know how many other veterans he got a $10,000 job for, or a $15,000 job for, especially when it was a sinecure. That is all I have got to say about this thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I had the pleasure about a week ago of making a trip home. I took some satisfaction in the comparison of this body with another, in the fact that we had not indulged in any scandal up to that time. Last Saturday afternoon the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] made a speech and I took the floor, because, having followed the hearings to some extent, and being personally acquainted with Theodore Roosevelt and an admirer of his family and children, I felt it was wrong that there should go to the country unchallenged a statement that I did not believe the gentleman himself would want to go unchallenged. I think yet that it was wrong. I think, Mr. Chairman, that when we are drawing inferences we ought to stop before we draw the inference without testimony that a man is unfit to associate with his fellowmen, and if young Teddy Roosevelt had been guilty of the thing deliberately stated on this floor he would have been unfit to occupy the position that he now holds. But the gentleman from South Carolina this morning, when we all say there is no truth in it, says now, although he left it in the Record, that he did not mean to stand on that as a fact after he was assured it was not true. However, how will that look to-morrow morning when Mr. Rogers's remarks go out as compared with the facts? The gentleman is troubled; he is worried this morning, because he says the testimony—

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. No.

Mr. STEVENSON. I only want to assure my friend that I never felt better in my life.

Mr. TINCHER. Perhaps the gentleman is used to it. The attitude would be awkward for me. [Laughter on Republican side.] The gentleman is worried, because he does not understand how Archibald Roosevelt was worth $15,000 a year, and he bases that on a reading of the testimony before a Senate committee. He can not understand how Archie would be worth that much money. I know that the gentleman himself ordinarily is worth his salary as a Congressman. Heretofore I have had very friendly relations with him and have admired him and some of his work, but you can not tell what a man is worth by what you read. What in the name of common sense will people think of him when they read the Record to-morrow morning? [Laughter on Republican side.]

There is one other little occurrence to which I wish to advert at this time. I have never taken the floor in this House to attack any Member of the House, and never shall. Members have their rights; but there is a certain gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and I suppose he is in a position to do it this morning, who always enjoys following me. He has his fun. He indulges in a form of sarcasm which I suppose he likes, and in a kind of fun in which I shall indulge a little. I feel sorry for this gentleman, and I want to help him in any way that I can. In the first place, he is not without ability. He knows how to be sarcastic and not say very much either. He said the other day that he was thankful for the fact that no

Democrat's name could possibly be connected with this scandal, and that in all of the investigations that were ever had the good name of every Democrat was left absolutely intact. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is a very valuable man to his party. He is the best little alibi in the world. He is of the party of McAdoo, Doheny, and Baker. I will tell you why we did not have any argument over the kind of system that they carried on during the last administration. They just admitted it and laughed at it. There was nothing uncommon about putting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as I did one afternoon, something to show that Mr. Baker, as Secretary of War, was indulging in a practice that was not only untrue to his country but unfair to the farming people of this country, and which was going to enrich some importers. They did not even deny; they just laughed about it. Their position was, "We are in the saddle, and we are running this thing." And now one of the candidates for Vice President, or rather placed in nomination at San Francisco at the last Democratic convention, Mr. Doheny, has a clean bill of health given him Saturday by my friend CONNALLY, who states that not a Democrat can be mentioned in connection with this scandal.

I do not care for the gentleman's reference to my personal appearance and manner of delivery. God never intended that everyone should have the perfect Grecian beauty of my friend from Texas. God did not endow all men with the beautiful locks and magnificent presence that He did the gentleman from Texas. I concede that he is the most beautiful man in the House, and that is generally conceded in the House. In fact, it needs no testimony, because he will admit it himself. There is one thing, however, that he is worried about, and that is whether, if we get to the White House with this investigation, I will have any courage. So far I have had the courage to stand against anything that I thought crooked, and I hope I always shall.

I have never had the chance to have the tests that my friend has had. Oh, I can imagine the picture of him going up to Theodore Roosevelt, sr., in his childhood, and saying, "Teddy, I want to go to war." The locks were hanging on his shoulders at that time, and I think that Teddy would have said, "You are too young, you can not go." Now, he is worried for fear the children of his dear old friend Teddy have not the moral courage to stand up for what is right, and he expresses that concern and worry on the floor of the House.

I congratulate my friend upon his service to his country. As I understand it he volunteered to serve in a noncombatant portion of the recent war and that is all right. He got that much further than I did and I am not criticizing, because again my form as compared with his Grecian beauty barred me. I am glad the gentleman did not go to France, at least, until after the war was over, because I think it would have been very unfortunate if he had gotten scarred up or wounded. But why worry about the Roosevelt courage? If he had gone to France perhaps he would have received a wound as did young Teddy, whose courage he is now worrying about. [Applause on the Republican side.] If he had gone to France perhaps he would have received wounds like this young Archibald, whom they are now abusing. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do commend him for going to France, even though he did not go until after the war over; and, if he did so, I commend him for standing at the grave of that other brother, Quentin, who is buried over there.

And why worry about the moral courage of that family? He sent this out to the country. What was there against Teddy when he indulged in that worry? He charged that his wife held a thousand shares of Sinclair stock after the lease had been made, and now that the charge is no more the worries can be dispelled. I admire beauty and art, and I admire the gentleman from Texas. I would not worry about the courage of the Roosevelts. He can go and get his picture taken with his uniform on and look at that beautiful picture and dispel all worries. Sometimes, I do not know, but before I came to Congress, Billy Mason, who was then in Congress, made a speech. He was talking about some fellow named "Tom." He said, "The trouble with Tom is when he gets up in the morning and puts on his trousers he thinks the world is half dressed, and when he goes down Pennsylvania Avenue and looks in a glass where he can get a reflection of himself he wonders why the other side of the Avenue does not tilt up." Every man is entitled to his good name. No man has the right to take that good name away from him unless he has affirmative proof that the man is not entitled to his good name. Theodore Roosevelt, his wife, and two little boys are as much entitled to their good name as any man in America. No man has the right to assert the contrary without he has the evidence to back it up. [Applause.] And I for one, so long as I have my membership here, will not be bluffed out of standing against taking the good name away from any man who is unjustly accused by the sarcasm of the gentleman from Texas or the accusation of any other gentleman; I never will. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when Saturday afternoon in an unostentatious, and I think modest, manner I saw fit to make some remarks about the impropriety of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINSCHER] savagely attacking the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] for having the temerity to rise on the floor of this House and quote from the printed hearings the sworn testimony of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Colonel Roosevelt, I did not apprehend that that insignificant act on my part would cause such a volcanic eruption on Monday morning. Had I thought that, I fear I should not have been bold enough to do so. What I did remark was that the gentleman from Kansas, when he first came here from Kansas, standing upon the floor of this House, poured forth fierce denunciations of the War Department and the Navy Department under Democratic rule during the war, and charged all of those departments with being filled with graft and corruption and criminal misdoings, and that after some sixty-odd investigating committees had been appointed by the Republican Party when it first came into power in 1919, after they had completed their labors they had found they were unable to put the finger of guilt upon any responsible official of the Democratic administration. I said that that being true, if the gentleman from Kansas were a real fighter that he would stand up now when these investigating committees begin to find the tracks that lead up to your own door—I said almost up to the doors of the White House—I said that the gentleman from Kansas, if he were a real fighter would stand up and take his medicine and not whine and cry like a whipped child. That is what I said. [Applause.] Now, that is what I said. I did not refer to Colonel Roosevelt's military record. I admire it. It was a splendid record so far as I know. I did refer to his father's record, and the printed records of Saturday here will bear witness I paid to his father's record as high a compliment as my power of speech and my modest abilities would permit. Now, the gentleman from Kansas comes back here upon the floor this morning and makes an attack on me, and I challenge any Member to read the Record on Saturday and see whether I made any personal allusion to the gentleman's personal appearance. If I were the gentleman from Kansas, bearing in mind that comparisons are distasteful, if I were the gentleman I would never undertake a comparison of that kind. [Laughter.] He told the story of what was said by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Mason, some years ago, Senator Mason, in referring to Senator TOM HEFLIN, who was then a Member of the House, when he said that "when he pulled on his trousers in the morning that he thought the world was half dressed," and sought to apply that story to me. If I were inclined to bandy epithets with the gentleman from Kansas, I might call attention to the fact, and could get plenty of corroboration, that when he performs that service, indeed a very large part of the world is dressed. [Laughter.] Now, let me say one other thing about all these charges. I understand that the gentleman from Kansas last week, in his own State, and as chairman of the State committee—is he, I do not know—

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Generalissimo.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Some official in his own State, some party official, some party dignitary or chairman of his State convention, made a speech only last week in which he said that the graft in this Government under the Democratic administration was greater than Teapot Dome. He made such a statement after the Republican Congress had fully investigated all such charges and had failed to fix wrongdoing or corruption upon one responsible Democratic official. The only man they indicted was the Republican Assistant Secretary of War, Benedict Crowell, whose indictment was dismissed by the court because the present Attorney General and his assistant could not write an indictment that would charge a crime.

What do we find? We find that in all these alleged war frauds nothing came from them. Take, for example, the dye-patents case. What happened in regard to that under the Attorney General? Why, the dye-patents suit was filed over in Delaware, and the Government lost the case. What happened about the harness case, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], now occupying the chair, called to the attention of this House so many times. They tried it over in West Virginia and the jury found them not guilty. No; I do not know whether it was the verdict of the jury or the instruction of the court by the jury, but they lost the case. What happened with the Morse shipping case, with which this House has been filled since 1919? They indicted Morse here in the District of Columbia and with a flock of attorneys, some of whom had sat in this House and some of whom had sat in the Graham investigating committee and knew all about it, assisting the Attorney General. What happened in that case? In that case the jury found Morse not guilty, and he went forth judicially an innocent man.

What happened to all these fraud prosecutions during the war? Nothing except an accumulation on the pay rolls of the Department of Justice of a great flock of attorneys who can neither write an indictment that will stick nor get verdicts from the court or the jury on evidence which they brought forward or ought to have brought forward and which gentlemen on the Republican side in the years 1919, 1920, and 1921 said revealed such a saturnalia of crime and of graft that it offended the very nostrils of Heaven. One thing follows, either that there was not any graft or that your party and your officials are so incompetent that with your arms full of evidence and with a flock of retainers you can not convict anybody in a court on evidence that you can produce.

Now one other thing, and I am done. I challenge the gentleman to deny what I said on Saturday, and that was that I found some satisfaction in the fact that with a war record like that, while I grieved that these things had ever occurred, I said I derived some satisfaction from the fact that after the Republicans got into power and when these smelling committees began to go around through the avenues where the evidence led them, and when they knocked at the silent chambers where these conspiracies and plots were being hatched—I derived some satisfaction from the fact that no responsible figure in my party was found there, and that no responsible figure in the Democratic Party has been shown to be guilty of graft.

Oh, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINSCHER] talks about Mr. McAdoo. Why, if he is so outraged at what Mr. McAdoo did after he got out of the Cabinet, if he is so outraged at what Mr. McAdoo did when he became a private citizen, oh, how his heart must be crushed by the fact that his own Secretary of the Interior, not after he got out of office, but while he was in office, gave away under leases the naval reserves of this Government and went away from the meeting place with $100,000 in a leather satchel. [Applause.]

Oh, my friends, I know that his grief is great at that; too great even for words; because while he has criticized McAdoo, you have never heard one word on this floor from the gentleman from Kansas about Fall, or about Daugherty, or about Doheny, or about Sinclair. His grief is too great for words. [Applause.]

One other thing, and then I am done. The gentleman from Kansas saw fit this morning to make some reference to my modest service in the war. It was not really in the war, because I never got to the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I never made any reference to the military record of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. On the other hand, as I understand, that record is splendid, and I now desire, if I did not do so then, to pay my tribute to any soldier who went across the seas and followed the flag of his country and exposed his person to danger. The only reference which I made was this, that the first time I ever saw Colonel Roosevelt, senior, was in 1898, in San Antonio, when he was recruiting his Rough Riders, and that I undertook or tried to join his regiment. That was true.

I quit the University of Texas. I did not refer to these things and have never done so except when provoked by the gentleman from Kansas. I left the University of Texas and went to San Antonio and applied to Colonel Roosevelt, and was accepted, but it was found by the surgeon that I was too light for my height. The gentleman said he did not go; he had an excuse; I was too light and he was too heavy. [Laughter.]

I did not content myself with that. When I found I could not go with Colonel Roosevelt I immediately went over to Austin, the capital of my State, and I enlisted in my State regiment, and the surgeon, happening to be an old schoolboy friend of mine—I do not know whether that had anything to do with it or not—I was passed. I entered the service and remained there until the war ended. I did not go to Cuba because they did not send me to Cuba. I spent my service down in Miami, Fla. It was not my fault. I placed myself where my commanding officer should see fit to send me. My record is in the War Department. I wonder where the gentleman from Kansas was at that time. I notice in the Directory that his age and mine are only one year apart. When he seeks to criticize my war record, I wonder where he was in 1898; I wonder why he did not then follow the name of Roosevelt, that he is so anxious to follow now. [Applause.]

Then the gentleman referred to my service in the last war, the World War. I claim no credit for that. I did not go when the first call came. I was a Member of this body. I did not go until Congress passed an act drafting the boys from 18 years old up, and when they went down and drafted the boys 18 years of age I, having been a "tin soldier" in times past, having tried to go to war in 1898, said to myself, "If they have got to draft the boys 18 years old, under 21, and the country needs men that badly, old boy, it is about time you should go, because you have had military training and perhaps you can be of service quicker than they can."

Oh, the gentleman said I was in a noncombat organization. That is not true, and he ought to know it is not true. I was a brigade adjutant of the Twenty-second Infantry Brigade over at Camp Meade, Md. I wonder where the organization of the gentleman from Kansas was stationed at that time. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen, this is distasteful to me. I do not like to make these personal references, and I would not do so except for the attack by the gentleman from Kansas. I was informed a few minutes before the gentleman rose that he proposed to attack me personally on this floor and attack my war record. I claim no credit for that any more than any other citizen. I thought my obligation to my country required me to go while the gentleman from Kansas thought his obligation caused him to stay, and I am not criticizing him for that—that is with him and with his conscience—but I do question the right of the gentleman from Kansas to attack a record of which I have never boasted, because I claim no special credit for my record.

But after all is said and done, gentlemen of the House, the fact does remain that the gentleman from Kansas and other Members like himself, stirred by partisan rancor after the war, stood on this floor and filled the public prints, filled the public forums, and filled the circumambient ether with their denunciations of graft, of corruption, and of misdoings, and of all other crimes which could be catalogued along with such crimes under the Democratic administration. Yet with more than 60 committees and subcommittees they had to acknowledge that the taint of corruption could not be placed upon a single responsible Democratic official. And now, with such a record as that, when this chapter of corruption about Teapot Dome, the sale of the naval oil reserves, and when this scandal about the Attorney General's office and the scandals and indictments in the Veterans' Bureau affairs come to light these brave defenders of the public service, these men whose souls were so stirred by outrage under the Democrats, instead of lifting their brave voices in denunciation go around whining and saying, "We hope this period of slander and defamation will soon stop; the people are getting enough of it." I say, gentlemen, why do you not now stand up and take your punishment? Why do you not stand up now and condemn those who have been proven guilty rather than by negation, rather than by sitting still and saying nothing, seemingly—I will not even use that word with reference to anybody except the gentleman from Kansas—tolerating these terrible transactions in the public service.

I did not provoke this discussion either now or on Saturday, and I regret, gentlemen, to have consumed so much of your time in doing what I thought was due to myself and due to my membership in this body. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON].

[Mr. COLTON was granted leave to extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, may I be notified when I have consumed 15 minutes?

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the debate this morning has been marked by so much personality that I would now like to bring your minds back to some public questions in which I believe the people are interested. Personally I had been very greatly in hopes that this subject would not come up for discussion in this House and be marked by the same grade of debate that has marked it in another body. But I think this an opportune time to call attention to some facts in connection with a subject which may, at least, be of interest and which I hope will be understood.

I want to say at the outset that we on the Republican side—and I think the whole membership of this House for that matter—hold no brief for any man who violates his oath of office or who is not true to a trust. But gentlemen, because one man may do wrong is no ground for us to stand up and make wholesale condemnations against public officials.

I want to invite your attention to the fact, that thus far, in connection with the naval oil reserves, only one man in public life stands condemned before the American people and even he has not yet received the right which every American is entitled to receive, namely, a trial by his peers. Every other American citizen is presumed at every stage of the proceeding to be innocent until he is proven guilty. I say if Mr. Fall or any other official is guilty of the violation of a trust, he should be punished.

I say to those on the other side that if, amid all of that waste and extravagance in expenditure that characterized your administration, no man in official life were guilty of wrongdoing you ought to be thankful and you ought to join with us in proclaiming that only one man, among the many who have been working out the great problems which have confronted this Government since the war has gone astray; instead of condemning everybody you ought to join with us in our attempt to stop this wholesale condemnation of innocent men. Our country has been and is now singularly blessed with honest public officials. If you sincerely want to establish faith in the Government among the people publish that fact; condemn evil but hold up the good.

Now, let us look into some of the facts surrounding the circumstances which have given rise to much of the debate on this floor in the last two or three days and in another body for weeks and weeks.

Let us inquire into the origin of the events and policy leading up to the oil leases. May I quote from a letter:

The general leasing act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), authorizing permits and leases to develop oil, gas, oil shale, coal, phosphate, and sodium belonging to the United States, provided that it should not apply to lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses "except as hereinafter provided."

Section 18 of the act, second proviso, was to the effect that as to any placer mining claims possessed prior to July 3, 1910, on which one or more wells had been drilled, and so forth, the Secretary of the Interior might within naval petroleum reserves lease "the producing wells thereon only," together with an area of land sufficient for operation. The next proviso to section 18 was to the effect that the President, in his discretion, might lease the remainder or any part of the claim on which such wells had been drilled, the claimant or his successor to have the preference right to any such lease. The next proviso authorized the President to permit the drilling of additional wells by the claimant or his successor within the limits of any such former mining claim.

The proviso to section 35 of said act of February 25, 1920, was to the effect that moneys accruing to the United States under the provisions of the act from lands within naval petroleum reserves should be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

From the foregoing it will be seen that under the general leasing law of February 25, 1920, the Secretary of the Interior could lease producing oil wells in naval reserves. The President could authorize leases of the remainder of the former mining claims on which any wells were situated, preference being given to the mining claimant, and the President was also empowered if he did not desire to lease the entire former mining claim to permit the drilling of additional wells.

On June 4, 1920, at the instance of the Secretary of the Navy, there was included in the naval appropriation act of that date (41 Stat. 813) a direction that the Secretary of the Navy take possession of all properties within naval reserves—

"on which there are no pending claims or applications for permits or leases under the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, * * * or pending applications for United States patent under any law; to conserve, develop, use, and operate the same, in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, or sell the oil and gas products thereof, and those from all royalty oil from lands in the naval reserves for the benefit of the United States: And provided further, That the rights of any claimant under said act of February 25, 1920, are not affected adversely thereby." * * *

Under the act just cited of June 4, 1920, it will be perceived that the Secretary of the Navy was given jurisdiction over all lands in the naval petroleum reserves that were not covered by the former mining claims recognized and provided for under the general mining laws and under section 18 of the general leasing act.

In naval reserves Nos. 1 and 2, California, therefore, leases have been issued under two different acts of Congress—first, leases by the Secretary of the Interior or with the approval of the President under sections 18 and 18a of the act of February 25, 1920; second, leases issued under the authority or presumed authority of the naval appropriation act of June 4, 1920.

In naval reserve No. 3, Wyoming, no leases were given under the general leasing act of February 25, 1920. The Mammoth or Sinclair lease, covering the entire structure was given under the act of June 4, 1920, to Mammoth Oil Co., executed April 7, 1922.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I will, for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I was trying to follow the gentleman. Do I understand that the gentleman is defending and trying to justify the leasing of our naval oil reserves?

Mr. COLTON. Oh, no; not at all. That is not pertinent to the question I am discussing.

Mr. BLANTON. I was trying to find out just what the gentleman was discussing.

Mr. COLTON. I will tell the gentleman in just a moment. I am stating that following out a policy started by the previous administration, particularly by men who were at the head of departments, this administration began leasing certain oil reserves and yet on March 2, 1924, the former Secretary of the Navy in an article published in the Washington Herald demanded that the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior be dismissed from his position for carrying out these policies and the orders of his superior. Last Saturday a demand was made that the First Assistant Secretary of the Navy be dismissed. Both of these men have only been carrying out a policy first authorized by Congress and then started by the previous administration and followed out by this present administration.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind yielding further?

Mr. COLTON. Certainly not.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the resolution passed by the Senate, and passed by Republican votes as well as Democratic votes, condemned the Secretary of the Navy for making the leases and asked for his resignation.

Mr. COLTON. I am not responsible for what another body has done, and I want to say that any contract or lease that was conceived in fraud is void ab initio, and proper steps are being taken for the cancellation of all such contracts.

I am not defending any wrongful act, but I want to say to you—and I expect to speak of this just a little later—that I am lifting my voice to-day against this wholesale condemnation of faithful men who have, through long years of diligent service, built up splendid reputations. Those reputations are about to be ruined and by what? So-called evidence that would not be taken in any court of competent jurisdiction in the land, and yet evidence, or so-called evidence, that is being broadcasted in this day of hysteria throughout the country.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind one other question?

Mr. COLTON. Certainly not, if it is just a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been wondering just how much these receiverships are going to cost. My experience has been they are very expensive. I agree with the gentleman that these leases are void ab initio, and the Government ought to have gone there and should have taken charge of the property and then let the other fellow sue, and not have placed the matter in the hands of receivers and have all the receivership expenses charged up against the Government.

Mr. COLTON. That only applies to those leases that have fraud connected with them. You leased wells during the last administration. Are you saying they were conceived in fraud? Fifty-eight wells had been leased prior to March 4, 1921.

In naval reserve No. 2, California, prior to March 4, 1921, the Democratic administration, with the approval of Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, had leased 58 producing wells in various parts of the reserve. More than this, with the written approval of Josephus Daniels, dated August 21, 1920, and subsequently approved by Secretary Payne and President Wilson, the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. was permitted to put down five new wells on reserve No. 2, at a royalty of 25 per cent. A little later, with the written approval of Secretary Daniels and of the President, the Consolidated Mutual Oil Co. was given a lease for 120 acres of land in the heart of naval reserve No. 2, at a royalty of from 12½ to 25 per cent. All of these royalties were taken in cash and paid into the Treasury and aided in no way in affording or conserving a supply of fuel oil for the Navy. Meanwhile the hundreds of oil wells upon private lands within and adjoining the reserve were draining the oil from under the Government's lands in the reserves, the total number of these wells, as stated by the Bureau of Mines March 4, 1921, being 785.

Adjacent to the Teapot reserve in Wyoming were a large number of wells in the Salt Creek field, and that they were draining Teapot is shown by the fact that after Sinclair began drilling in the Teapot reserve the production from the adjoining lands in Salt Creek fell off 1,000 barrels per day.

Under the policy of the succeeding administration, wherever it was found necessary to drill the reserves to prevent drainage from private lands, whether under general leasing law or the Daniels Act of June 4, 1920, the royalties were taken in oil instead of in cash and exchanged for fuel oil in tanks, where it could be conserved and held for the use of the United States Navy, when and if needed. At this moment there is stored in tanks owned by the Government in Hawaii 1,500,000 barrels of fuel oil, and like storage has been arranged for under the Sinclair lease upon the Atlantic coast. It would not be possible to store crude oil for long periods without losses by evaporation, but experts say that the fuel oil, which is the form in which battleships use it, may be stored for long periods of years without appreciable loss. Therefore, the policy of this administration is one of conservation, with the additional advantage that the oil is in such location and form that it can be made immediately available to our battleships in case of emergency.

The highest royalty secured by the Wilson administration under any laws was 25 per cent, while the royalties secured by the succeeding administration ranged from maximums of 25 to 77 per cent, most of them being from 35 to 55 per cent. I am not arguing for the policy. I am saying with the policy established, the leases made by this administration are immeasurably better than those made under the previous one.

The facts are that as regards one of the reserves leasing is the only way it can be handled.

I have it on the authority of an expert that the oil produced from these fields is not a fuel oil. It has a paraffine base and by ordinary distillation and redistillation by the Burton process yields a very large percentage of gasoline or motor spirits, products which have a value far in excess of that of fuel oils. Such part of the residue as is not used for the production of high-grade lubricating oils could be used for fuel purposes; but if so prepared, it could not be economically utilized for naval fuel owing to the high cost of rail transportation from Wyoming to the seacoast.

The Teapot Dome therefore, unlike the oil from the California reserves, can not be practically nor economically utilized by the Navy as a fuel oil; and the only way the products of that reserve could be utilized for the benefit of the Navy, except possibly as to the use of some gasoline or lubricating oil, would be by exchange of products or values or by a Government enterprise of drilling, refining, and sale of oil products. A knowledge of these facts enables one to understand the language of the law above mentioned, which authorizes not only contracts and leases but sale and exchange of the products of the reserves.

In the situation above outlined the administration was called upon to decide what its policy should be as to the protection, handling, and utilization of the products of these reserves. The policy of carrying on offset drilling operations simply with a view of getting a certain amount of oil out of the ground before adjacent owners could drain it can not in the nature of the situation be considered a permanently satisfactory policy. No considerable amount of oil for storage could thus be secured by the Navy, and the question as to what amount of offset drilling was necessary to protect against outside drainage would necessarily be one of opinion constantly modified by changing surrounding conditions. It would be at best a more or less questionable policy of self-defense, which would neither retain the oil in the ground nor provide any permanent storage of reserve oil.

In this situation the administration was called upon to determine:

1. What policy should be pursued to protect the Government from very great losses by drainage through adjacent wells of private oil operators; and

2. What should be the policy with regard to providing an emergency reserve of oil for the Navy.

Manifestly the Navy could not safely depend for a much-needed emergency reserve, particularly at points far distant from the mainland, upon undrilled and uncertain supplies in the ground in California. Much less could it depend upon supplies from a wholly unproven reserve in Wyoming, no part of the product of which, however much or little it might prove to be, could be utilized for naval fuel. This reserve, the Teapot Dome, was generally believed to be an excellent prospect for a large production of high-grade gasoline-producing oil, but, except for two or three wells drilled into the comparatively shallow upper sand and indicating a production of 8 or 10 barrels a day, the reserve was wholly undeveloped; it came very nearly being a "wildcat" proposition, with the probability of considerable production of gasoline, kerosene, and other products of refining, none of which could be advantageously or economically utilized by the Navy.

It is to be assumed that after careful consideration the naval authorities believed that, under the circumstances, it was necessary to give the reserves more attention, and to inaugurate a more active, intelligent, and practical policy to protect their oil products. If the reserves were to be of real value to the Navy in supplying a large reserve of oil for use in case of emergency, and particularly at points distant from the continent, it was necessary to utilize these products for that purpose. The oil could be stored in tanks for an indefinite period, with comparatively little danger of loss through accident and with a very limited loss through evaporation. The question was how to inaugurate and carry out a policy under which the reserves could be utilized for the only purpose for which they could have been intelligently or wisely established.

The Navy Department has no bureaus whose business it is to be informed with regard to oil lands, geology, and the science and business of oil production. In the Interior Department is the General Land Office, not only familiar with land titles and conditions through its activities and operations as an agent of the Secretary of the Interior in the administration and protection of the public domain but under the leasing act charged with the administration of many thousands of acres of public oil lands.

In the Interior Department is the Indian Office, familiar with many phases of administration of Indian oil lands. In the Interior Department is the Geological Survey, a bureau whose officials are thoroughly familiar with the topographic and geological conditions of all the naval reserves, with the history of operations and with the probabilities of drainage and production. In fact, it was this office that primarily advised with regard to the establishment of the boundaries of the reserves. In the Interior Department is the Bureau of Mines, charged, to a considerable extent, with the administrative operations of the Government in connection with the handling of the oil lands over which it has supervision. This bureau is familiar with the character of the oil on the reserves and with the problems of production, transportation, and use of oils. Manifestly, if the administration, under authority of law, was to be able to make advantageous arrangements and contracts for the protection, the management, and the development of the naval reserves and their products, the assistance of the Interior Department and its bureaus was absolutely essential.

With a view of utilizing those agencies of the Government, President Harding issued the order under which the details of the problems at hand were to be worked out with the assistance of the Interior Department. In no other way could the vast amount of information which had been gathered, assembled, and tabulated, not only with regard to these reserves but with regard to the general business and practice of oil development and production, be utilized. Furthermore, the Government had important interests in the general oil situation growing out of vast royalties accruing to it through leases of oil lands under the leasing act, with regard to which the Secretary of the Interior was charged with a great responsibility. I say again the leases if tainted with fraud should be canceled.

Even if they proved to be good leases, fraud would vitiate them, and all of that is being inquired into in the courts.

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion I only have this to say: Here was a policy started by Congress, a policy started by a Democratic administration, and these men were acting under the orders of superiors under this administration, and now, because they carried out orders and carried out a policy of a former administration and executed leases that were valuable to the country—much more valuable than those of the previous administration—because they did that, although no word of taint has been uttered against their personal character, yet a hue and cry goes up calling for their resignation and saying, by inference at least, all manner of things against them.

One of the proudest names in America would have been tarnished and besmirched here last Saturday in public debate had fortune not favored us with the presence of men who could show that it was false and not a word of truth in it. [Applause.]

One's character is the most sacred possession this world has to offer. It is the mark set in the forehead of its possessor that is recognized by men of like standards everywhere. Character is as eternal as the everlasting hills and the one thing an alkalied tongue of slander can not corrupt. It is the fabric into which has gone all the choice threads of a life's selection.

Character is essentially just what we are—the oak of the forest that resists majestically when the evil winds of calumny and destruction beat upon it. Ghouls dig into the dirt to rob dead, decaying bodies. What think you of their vocation? Yet it is as high as Halley's comet above that of the man whose palsied mind would shoot forth to the world scorpion words to blast the hopes and bruise the hearts of men whose life's accumulation consists of their character—the jewel beyond price.

What of one's reputation, may I ask you? Is it not the mantle in which the individual's character is ensconced? Is it not also precious? Aye, it is far beyond the wealth of the world and far beyond any gain which may be anticipated by political partisan traducers in their attacks on honest public men, men whose reputations may be sacrificed by the mouthy splashes of slanderous vitriol which emanate from slimy reservoirs of disappointment and hate.

"Boys flying kites haul in their white-winged birds,
But you can't do that when you're flying words.
Careful with fire is good advice, we know,
But careful with words is ten times doubly so."

Mr. Speaker, the highest function of our Government is the protection of its citizens. Into our hands, as the chosen Representatives of this people, is intrusted the mandate to protect the citizens of this our great country. Does our duty in this matter extend to periods of time in which we have war or peace or does it include all periods? Are we selected to sit idly by and witness the destruction of honorable men by those who wield the long, rusty sword of scandal? Are we to be paid from taxes gathered from the purses of the poor simply to watch in silence the blasting of the reputations of good men because one man goes wrong?

Were I to ask of each gentleman here his estimate of America, the answer would be blazoned forth, "She is wonderful," and all the descriptive adjectives known would be used to embellish her in the superlative degree. Her history, her sentiments, her greatness, would be punctuated with applause as regularly as the tramp, tramp, tramp of soldiers' feet when keeping time to beating drums.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, what think you the verdict would be, in view of the recent epidemic of broadcasting through the air and all the earth the besmirching scandals, idiotic and substanceless as they are, were we of this Congress to ask the great heart of America her estimate of us? Let us be careful and not condemn without a just hearing men who have borne heretofore spotless reputations.

In this day of hysteria let us keep our feet on the ground. American jurisprudence is built upon the foundation that every man is entitled to his day in court; that he is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty. This is a guaranty which was given to the Anglo-Saxon race at Runnymede and is guaranteed again in our Constitution. Let us be slow in forming judgment, especially when evidence is given in the way of second or third hand conversations; evidence, so called, that would not be admitted anywhere in any court of competent jurisdiction. The demand of the time is for men who will keep their heads.

I am so glad to-day that there sits in the White House such a man as that—a man who fearlessly will prosecute the guilty and yet who, just as fearlessly and courageously, amid the calls of the spirit of mobocracy, is not afraid to say that the innocent shall be protected. Justice will be given to the just and the unjust. [Applause.] Every American should be glad to-day that a man like Calvin Coolidge is in the White House. [Applause.] I believe he is going to be continued there. We need him. Not that we condone wrong or fraud; we want the guilty punished. We are also standing for constitutional liberty and right. That is worth more to us just now than all this hearsay scandal talk that is going abroad in the land and being published in all the papers. Men are condemned before they are given a chance of being heard. It is against this that I lift my voice to-day and thank God that Calvin Coolidge will see that American rights guaranteed under the Constitution are protected. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, will be before the House to-morrow, and as I shall have no opportunity for the discussion of the measure as I would wish, because of the time limited for the debate, I avail myself of the kindness extended to me to recite a few verses written by a North Carolinian, which would be appropriate to that discussion. My heart prompts me so to do. As a tribute to our boys who carried the American flag to renown in a distant land, they will find a responsive echo in the heart of every Member of this House:

Let us cheer for those boys to the end of the earth,
From the mountain heights to the sea,
In the land where freedom had its birth,
Where manhood still is the highest worth
In the hearts of the noble free!

Across the sea they bore the flag;
Across the sea they brought it back;
Ne'er did its shining stars e'er drag—
From sea to sea; from crag to crag—
Along war's grim and gory track.

Home at last some heroes come,
And others watch with wistful eyes;
While others sleep where rolls no drum,
Where war's thrilling fives are dumb;
In France bloodred with sacrifice.

Some stripes are deeper in the red;
Some stars shine golden in the blue;
Say not the fallen brave are dead,
But rather let it still be said
They live the best who died so true.

[Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] as he may desire. [Applause.]

[Mr. TILLMAN was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it has been more than five years since the "brazen throat of war ceased to roar," and the haughty Hun dipped his colors in acknowledgment of defeat at the hands of American soldiers and their allies. During all these years our fighting men and their brethren who were not fortunate enough to reach the zone of war have been led to believe in the absolute fairness of the scheme of adjusted compensation. A large majority of the rank and file of justice-loving Americans, including 99 per cent of the ex-service men themselves, insist that there should be a substantial payment to the men to recompense them in part for the difference in wages they received as soldiers and the wages they would have earned at home. The fair-minded people of the Nation expect this Congress to provide for the discharge of this obligation. I for one am ready to pay the debt.

To this end I have introduced bill No. 3930, identical with the Legion bill, bearing the name of Mr. McKENZIE, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I am also author of bill No. 3929 to insure hospitalization, medical treatment, and necessary care for disabled ex-service men without regard to the origin of said disability. All soldiers, South and North, middle-aged, old or young, should know that Republics are not ungrateful, and should be justly and generously treated.

I personally know something of the hell of war. In July, 1918, I went to Europe with a small party of Congressmen to study war conditions at close range. On a French vessel, painted like a zebra, carrying 1,100 service men and equipped with cannon, we zigzagged across the Atlantic. The boat failed to encounter any of the steel-fanged wolves of the undersea, then haunting and hunting the ocean to prey on allied shipping and allied lives, and landed in the quaint old city of Bordeaux about the middle of July.

The Germans had been making a last desperate push for Paris. A second lieutenant told me in Bordeaux that the enemy would be in Paris in a week. His statement did not seem unreasonable. The brave Frenchmen had been bled white. Not an allied soldier stood with gun in hand on the eastern front. Gold and treachery had bought victory for Germany there, and Hindenburg's seasoned veterans had been shifted to strengthen the combat divisions on the Italian and western fronts. Rumania and Serbia had been crushed. Italy was just recovering from her debacle at Caporetto. The English lion, facing the foe foaming at the mouth and dripping with blood, was being mercilessly forced back toward the Channel. Red-haired, heroic Albert, King of the Belgians, had lost all his territory but a narrow strip just wide enough to furnish scant footing for his few thin battalions, and the grim, gray-clad human fighting machines of the Kaiser were crouching for a final spring at their objective, the beautiful French capital. The fascinating woman, Paris, so much wanted by the boche general staff, was distant only a few kilometers, almost in reach of their criminal touch. But the red tide turned, and the American soldier was present and battling when the turn came.

Fresh and eager for a chance to show their mettle, there stood between the iron legions of the crown prince and this rich beauty, Paris, these American lads, like a 100,000 Davids, chosen of God for victory. The prince launched his heavy columns against these game youngsters, and to the astonishment of all the allies the crack troops of the German armies after three days of desperate effort were beaten back by these intrepid boys from across the seas, turned their bronzed fighting faces away from cultured Paris and toward Berlin. The world rang with loud praises for America and her tiger brood of fighters. [Applause.]

The doughboy had fought his way to a place in the sun. The Hun kept going, the doughboy following, till Germany cried for quarter and quit. In the Soissons, Chateau-Thierry, Rheims salient, we were once conducted by an officer inside the lines, and I saw our soldiers in battle. I saw them in the muddy trench, saw them going to the front and returning, saw two lads shaking with that strange experience, shell shock. Behind the lines one day I saw a white-faced stripling who had just died of a machine-gun shot. I thought of his mother across the wide Atlantic, who had just lost her darling boy. I saw a Red Cross nurse close his eyes.

Yes; close his eyes; his work is done.

What to him is friend or foe man.

Rise of morn' or set of sun,

Hand of man, or kiss of woman?

I saw how brave they were, how they suffered, how seldom they complained, and there I registered a silent vow to Heaven, which I have kept, and am keeping to-day to stand forever by and for the men who wrote their names in honor and in blood "in the purple testament of bleeding war." No man can see what I saw and feel what I felt without becoming a partisan of the ex-service men. [Applause.]

A word concerning the war eagles of the air. My son, Fred, volunteered soon after war was declared, joined the Ninetieth Aero Squadron, fought overseas for 18 months for almost nothing, giving up a good position here, fought in a combat plane, participated in the Battles of Rheims, Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, Verdun, Meuse, and the Argonne, and came home with two service and wound stripes, with two French medals, and the American distinguished-service cross.

The airplane fighters were interesting to me aside from the fact that my boy was one of them. They sought no safe retreat behind the lines, no protected shelter in trench or dug-out, no easy place far in the rear. They chose the blue ether for their battle field; the risk of cloud-surmounting flight above the wheeling earth was theirs; the peril of combat in the sky where death flies eagle-winged, with naked talons ever ready, pushed by the urge of insatiate desire, assured that an instant's indecision on the part of the pilot, a slight mistake of judgment, an unskilled touch of hand, accident to delicate and complicated machinery, or foe's machine-gun bullet will bring it the feast of death.

The American soldier was as good as the best shock troops of the Allies, as good as the Alpini or befeathered Bersaglieri of Italy, the blue devils of France, the naked-kneed Highlanders of Scotland, as good as the best of the bulldog breed of New Zealand or Australia, as good as the bravest of the lion's litter from England or Canada. I had General Pershing's word for it that he is as good as the Kaiser's best. He fought Jaeger, Saxon, Bavarian, and Prussian guardsmen, and he drove these trained warriors from every bloody field where he met them or could overtake them.

He swung into action like a blue-eyed Viking. He bled with a smile on his face or died with a jest between his teeth. He was possessed of the Puritan steadfastness of Cromwell's roundheads and the dashing gallantry of the blue bloods who rode with Prince Rupert. His grandfather, who charged with Pickett at Gettysburg or marched with Sherman to the sea, will never be ashamed of his record in this world struggle. The English fight best with their backs to the wall, against desperate odds. The French and Italians are best in charging, but the American soldier was an ideal fighter whether charging or on defense.

Unlike the brave Frenchman, he was not seeking to drive an armed invader from his native heath; he was not fighting to prevent a merciless vandal from despoiling his fair villages and cities; he was not beating off lustful beasts in human form from the home where dwelt his mother, sister, or wife. The wide Atlantic lay between this soldier boy and his loved ones. He was fronting the best-trained soldiers the world had ever known, 3,000 miles away from home, sweetheart, and native land. And thus he fought. The more honor to him. He was a crusader, battling for an ideal as much so as did any knightly follower of Richard Cœur de Lion or Godfrey de Bouillon. That is why polli and Tommy loved him and loved to fight by his side. They were brothers in arms, and in the long golden years to come they will cherish this comradeship, nor will any of these war-time associates forget—

The look of men that ha' brothered men by more than an easy breath;
The eyes of men that ha' read wi' men in the open book of death.

When the boys left we all turned out to hear the tramp, tramp, tramp of their marching feet; bugle spoke to bugle, drum to drum; mothers kissed and cried over the departing first-born; maybe he came home, maybe he died of "flu," or now sleeps in the brave soil of France or under the popples of Flanders. Everybody cheered them, orators said: "Boys, we will never forget you; there is nothing too good for you." We all told them that. I did, and God and heaven help me, soldier boy, I will keep the faith. I will redeem the pledge. [Applause.]

The doughboys, those who fought and those equally worthy who were ready to go, came home. Again bugle sang to bugle, drum throbbed to drum, brass bands crashed out martial music, mothers kissed their boys once more, or stood drooping, pale of face and sad eyed, thinking of their dead boys who could not come back, watching neighbor women embracing their more fortunate offsprings, and the orators again spoke words of praise and welcome, promising the boys "anything they might want in the future, as there was nothing too good for them."

Now, they want adjusted compensation, provided in the McKenzie bill or in the bill I have introduced, which is approved by them, or some similar bill. They want a bill giving them the option of taking their compensation in cash or in paid-up insurance; but the majority of the Ways and Means Committee has reported a bill for paid-up insurance only, which, under the parliamentary situation, under the rules, we are not allowed to amend but must take it or nothing. The ex-service men in the House and the friends of the soldiers will vote for this bill, because we see it is the only thing we can get right now, and a half loaf is better than no loaf.

How different things are now than in 1917 when the boys were enlisting and being selected and in 1918 when they came back. Then America, forgetting her appetite for saint-seducing gold, shouted promises that all she had was not too much for those who stood by the flag. Now the great financial interests that profited by the war do not want to be taxed to pay the bonus. They contend that no tax reduction can be had if there is to be a bonus. Our Nation is the richest in the world and has done less for her soldiers than her sister nations. The following table shows the maximum payments per capita made by Governments to their ex-service men:

Canada	$631
Belgium	492
France	249
England	190
Italy	64
America	60

We have been giving bonuses to everybody but the soldier. The war created 23,000 more millionaires. It cost the taxpayer a bonus of three billion four hundred million to adjust the claims of contractors for uncompleted contracts which were suddenly stopped by the ending of the war. One billion seven hundred million bonus was paid by the Government to the railroads for adjustments. Princely sums also by the Navy Department and the Shipping Board. Billions of bonus money were voted to the protected manufacturers by the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill. The Treasury Department but recently remitted two hundred and thirty millions to heavy income-tax payers, a kingly bonus. Only soldiers have been denied a readjustment of their losses because of the war.

Both parties and most public men have pledged advocacy of the bonus. I have done so and am keeping my word. Some of my friends write me to vote against the bonus, but they will respect me, at any rate, if I keep my promise and vote as my conscience dictates. The Veterans' Bureau has not been functioning in a way satisfactory to the ex-service man, and we must correct this by legislation. Let us pay this debt at the option of the soldier in paid-up insurance or in cash if they prefer it. Ninety-five per cent of the soldiers want cash and they have the right to it. They were old enough to fight; they are old enough to know what to do with their money. Oh, but you must not risk him with money. Weasel words, an insult to the veteran, and a brazen attempt to deceive him and the bonus opponent too. You hear men uttering this double-dealing sentiment who stayed at home and fattened off the proceeds of unconscionable contracts while the boys they do not want to turn over money to were fighting for a dollar a day and spending much of that for allotment, for insurance, and necessary expenses. What a shameful wrong to deny a soldier who fought for his country while others fattened their fortunes at home the poor privilege of accepting his dues in money.

The man who faced red-throated cannon is competent and entitled to handle his own funds. [Applause.]

A BUSINESS PROPOSITION.

As a business proposition, I should vote for the bonus. You who oppose the bonus for business reasons, read the following table prepared by the Treasury. I quote only two items:

State.	Number of soldiers in Army.	Total bonus received in State.	Cost in taxes to State, 1922 report Treasury Department.	Amount received by State, above that raised by taxation.	Amount raised by taxes above that received by soldiers of State.
Arkansas	63,425	$31,712,500	$3,830,000	$27,882,500
New York	378,986	189,493,000	557,140,000		$367,647,000

In casting my vote for the bonus I am casting a vote that will help my State $27,882,500, as per the above table. I am for my own State, for my own people, for my own soldiers.

The American soldier's entrance in the war materially shortened it. His dashing valor brought it to a speedy close. During the last 10 months the war cost us $44,000,000 every day. In six months this would have been eight billion; this amount and more was saved by the rapid ending of the war, caused by our men, and so they saved us their compensation many times over. Do not try to fool the soldier; you can not do it.

Kipling, the soldier poet, the red-blooded Englishman who understood "Tommy," the pet name of the English fighting man, described a situation which now exists here.

We first applaud the soldier, promise him everything when we want him to fight for us; and when he asks for what is promised, some people tell him he has not got sense enough to take care of his money, and is a sort of a nuisance anyway, and needs a professional money grabber to manage his affairs for him. Kipling says—

It's Tommy this and Tommy that

An' "Tommy, how's yer soul?"

But it's "thin, red line of heroes"

When the drums begin to roll.

For it's Tommy this and Tommy that,

An' "Chuck him out, the brute,"

But it's "savior of his country"

When the guns begin to shoot.

An' it's Tommy this and Tommy that

An' anything you please;

An' Tommy ain't a bloomin' fool—

You bet that Tommy sees.

[Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON.]

[Mr. BLANTON was granted leave to extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope that every one of you colleagues will take the time to read the remarks which I placed in the Record last Saturday discussing the outrageous, ridiculous, unfair tax system that prevails here in the District of Columbia, where Washington people pay a total tax of only $1.20 on the $100 and the Government pays all the balance of their expenses. You will find these remarks on pages 4440 to 4448 of the Record for last Saturday, March 15, 1924. I hope that every Senator will do me the honor to read them.

It will be remembered that we passed a so-called gasoline tax bill a few weeks ago. The House left in the bill a property tax of only $1.20 on the hundred, which now exists on automobiles, although the intention of the commissioners who sent us the bill was to relieve themselves of this tax. In Maryland the people pay a registration fee of 32 cents per horsepower on a car, and they also pay a property tax of $2.70 on the hundred and a gasoline tax of 2 cents on the gallon. In Virginia the people pay a State registration fee of 60 cents per horsepower on each car and a State property tax of $1.50 on the $100 and a municipal registration tax and a municipal property tax, and an additional tax of 3 cents a gallon on gasoline.

Notwithstanding these facts, the newspapers and citizens' associations here in Washington have forced the property tax out of that bill, and it has been reported to the Senate with no property tax, and the only registration fee it has is a little, measly, insignificant $1 fee for a car. In other words, if the changed bill is thus passed by the Senate the only tax a $15,000 Rolls-Royce limousine will pay under that bill is the unheard of measly, little, old sum of $1. The present registration fees have been abolished, and the present property tax of $1.20 on the $100 has been likewise abolished, and a nominal $1 per car substituted.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. What is the valuation in dollars in comparison with the full value of the property that property is assessed at here?

Mr. BLANTON. In most cases all property is assessed at from half to two-thirds of the actual value. I want you gentlemen to take the time to read the facts that I put into last Saturday's Record, beginning at page 4290. I have cited specific property after property here in this District, together with admissions of the owners of the property that it is worth double the assessed value. Many pieces of property are assessed at half value. I cited the Meridian Mansions, 2400 Sixteenth Street, which was purchased at $2,225,000, and the present owner has spent a small fortune on it since he purchased it.

He says that the improvements, let alone the land, could not be put there for $3,000,000. Yet the whole property, land and improvements, is assessed at only $1,481,960, and at the ridiculous tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100, permitted by Congress, pays a tax of only $17,783, when its gross receipts from rentals aggregate $281,532, annually. And it is Congress that permits this ridiculously low tax rate of $1.20 on the $100, a lower rate of tax than exists in any city, large or small, in the United States. And the Government pays all the balance of their expenses out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I want to help you colleagues make this the most beautiful city in the world, but because we want to make it the most beautiful city in the world is no reason why we should let the people here live in the most beautiful city in the world and still pay a tax of only $1.20 on the $100 when your people and my people pay anywhere from $2.75 per $100 up to $6 and $7 per $100.

The people of Washington have no right to live in this, the most beautiful city in the world, unless they are willing to pay a reasonable rate of taxation, just as all other people in every other city in the whole United States have to pay. This is the most beautiful city in the world because the Government has spent hundreds of millions of dollars here out of the People's Treasury. The people who are so blessed as to live here, and who have grown well-to-do because their property, once of little value, has been enhanced ten, twenty, fifty, and in instances one hundred times its former value, should be willing to pay a reasonable tax for the many city conveniences they daily enjoy. It is simply outrageous to let them now escape all registration fees and all property tax on their fine Pierce-Arrows and Rolls-Royces.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. How is the House or any of its Members going to get that personal-property tax back where it belongs in the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you how. First, I am very hopeful that the Senate will put back into the bill both the registration fees and the property tax, before it passes the bill. If it does not, I will be one of the conferees on that bill, and I am going to stay there and discuss the matter with my brother conferees a good long time before I shall agree to any change in that bill as the House passed it. [Applause.] And we will want you colleagues in the House to back us up. Here is my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], who in Massachusetts has to pay a personal-property tax on his automobile of nearly $100. He also has to pay his registration fee, and he also has to pay his gasoline tax, and yet, if we passed this bill as it has been reported to the Senate, he could bring that automobile down to Washington and escape his registration tax and escape his $100 personal-property tax, and pay only a little measly $1 tax, and I could register my car here and escape the registration tax and the property tax and have to pay only $1 on it, and so could all you other gentlemen. It is not fair to the people of the United States to relieve Washington people of taxes and shift the burden to the Government. I say that it ought to stop.

If you colleagues here, and if our brothers over in the Senate, will just look over the facts I placed in last Saturday's Record, beginning on page 4440, it will be very apparent to you all that this has been a tax-dodging scheme on the part of the commissioners of the District of Columbia from the very beginning. For when they sent this bill to us already prepared by them last December, and asked us to pass it immediately, they claimed that it was to obtain reciprocity with Maryland. But Maryland did not ask that the registration fee now charged here be abolished. And Maryland did not ask that the property tax of $1.20 on the $100 now charged here on automobiles be abolished. All Maryland asked was that there should be a gasoline tax of 2 cents per gallon, to correspond to a like tax existing in Maryland, there being a tax of 3 cents on the gallon in Virginia.

But these tax-dodging commissioners saw an opportunity to escape present taxes on automobiles, so when they prepared the bill they abolished the registration fees now charged in the District, and they also abolished the present personal tax of $1.20 on the $100 now charged on automobiles in the District, and provided merely for a nominal tax of only $1 on each car should be charged.

And when the House of Representatives would not stand for it, and by a decisive vote placed back into the bill both the property tax and also a registration fee of 15 cents per horsepower, the papers and citizens' associations immediately began to throw spasms and said that they would kill the bill and not let it pass in the Senate. And they have held board of trade meetings, and citizens' association meetings, and mass meetings, until they have succeeded in getting the bill reported to the Senate in practically the original shape the commissioners sent it to Congress for passage.

I do not believe that the Senate will permit it to pass in that form, with the registration fees and the personal-property tax abolished.

WASHINGTON PEOPLE "ACTUATED BY PURELY SELFISH MOTIVE."

Every Member of Congress, both in the House and Senate, who will carefully study the facts I placed in last Saturday's Record will conclude that Washington people are actuated by purely a selfish motive. Every Senator who has publicly expressed himself in the newspapers about the matter lately has asserted that it is selfishness. Let me quote here what appeared in the Washington Star on February 27, 1924:

BALL SAYS TAXES LOW.

"I am extremely sorry," replied Senator BALL, "that the citizens of Washington have taken this position. It is a position that Congress can not support. It takes a stand that exempts you from taxation. There is no excuse upon which a fair-minded man can exempt you from this taxation that is paid in other States.

"There is a lower tax rate here than in any comparable city. Maryland and Virginia each pay personal taxes. Why shouldn't you? In these two States one pays 2 cents a gallon for gasoline tax and the other 3. . . ."

And in the same issue of the Washington Star appeared the following expression from a very distinguished friend of the District:

MUST PAY FAIR TAX.

In support of his contention that his substitute bill, which carries the 2-cent tax on gasoline, $1 license fee, and the present personal-property tax, was fair, Senator BALL pointed out that the personal-property tax on automobiles paid in Baltimore is $3 a hundred, while here it is $1.20. He insisted that the taxes paid on automobiles in Washington are very much lower than in Delaware, New York, Maryland, and other States. He declared that the people of the District can not expect Washington to become a really big city unless the people here are willing to pay fair taxes.

And in this same issue of the Washington Star, on February 27, 1924, appeared the following expression from another very distinguished friend of the District:

Senator WELLER, of Maryland, said that the matter was of interest to the people of Maryland, who also want their reciprocity with the District in the matter of automobile licenses. He, too, argued that the taxes paid on automobiles in the District, even under the proposed gasoline tax law, would be much lower than in Maryland. Senator COPELAND suggested that the tax on automobiles in New York was higher still than in Maryland; that he paid, he thought, $5 a hundred personal-property tax on automobiles there.

Senator WELLER declared that the people in the District in opposing the gasoline tax bill, which would lead to reciprocity with Maryland, were actuated by a purely selfish motive; that they did not want to pay a fair tax.

But let me quote some more public expressions from newspapers.

WASHINGTON PEOPLE DECLARED SELFISH.

Again, in the Washington News, published February 27, 1924, the people of Washington were publicly declared "selfish" by a sincere friend of the District. Let me quote what was said:

Senator EDWARDS, New Jersey, called attention to the difference in the tax rate paid in Washington and other cities. Here the basic tax is $1.20, while in Baltimore, at a similar valuation, $3 is paid; in New York, $5.40; in Jersey City, over $4; and in Chicago, $8.50.

Senator BALL and Senator JONES, Washington, said it would be unfair not to have a personal tax on autos.

SELFISH.

"It is truly a selfish proposition with District people," Senator WELLER, Maryland, said. "People here do not want to pay fair taxes."

Still, again, the people of Washington were publicly criticized.

WASHINGTONIANS "UNWILLING TO PAY THEIR JUST SHARE."

The Washington Post for February 27, 1924, said:

SENATOR BALL REPLIES.

"I am extremely sorry that the citizens of Washington have taken this position," Senator BALL replied. "It is a position that Congress can not support. It takes a stand that exempts you from taxation. There is no excuse upon which a fair-minded man can exempt you from this taxation that is paid in other States."

"There is a lower tax rate here than in any comparable city. Maryland and Virginia each pay personal-property taxes. Why shouldn't you? One pays 2 cents a gallon gasoline tax and the other 3 cents. The money so raised goes to the highway improvement. That provision is in my proposed substitute."

"On what ground can I, or anyone else, stand now? Washingtonians are not willing to pay their just share of taxes, as evidenced by the decision of this committee. I can not go to Congress now and say that the people here are willing to pay their full share and that funds should be appropriated for improvement of the city when it is evident that they are not."

Senator BALL warned the civic and trade representatives that there is a growing belief in Congress that the taxpayers of the District should contribute more than 60 per cent for the maintenance of the municipal government.

If Washington people are selfish and are actuated by a selfish motive, and if they are unwilling to pay their just, fair share, as has been publicly declared by distinguished friends of the District through the newspapers, are we Members of Congress, Congressmen and Senators, going to let Washingtonians escape just taxes and vote to place the resultant burden upon our people back home? I do not believe that the Senate will so ordain and I do not believe that the House of Representatives will so decide.

This foolish, ridiculous, outrageous, unjust system of taxation here in the District of Columbia must stop. The people of Washington are specially blessed in living in the most beautiful city of the world. And they must pay a reasonable rate of taxation, based upon an honest assessment of real value, just as everybody else who are not so fortunate as to live in the most beautiful city of the world have to pay. Washington people should not have to pay the maximum that others pay, but they should at least pay the minimum that others pay. And the more that Washington people fight against paying a reasonable, fair rate of taxation the more they convict themselves of selfishness and of not wanting to do the right thing. And if we Congressmen permit this to continue, we are going to hear from the people of the United States, who are getting tired of it. And the people of the United States are finding out about it. And they are going to question us about it when we go home. And they are going to hold each one of us responsible if we permit it.

I know exactly how very unpleasant these Washington newspapers can make it for us when we stand against them on this question. But I have taken my stand and I am going to fight it out to a finish and am going to thrash out this question with them on every bill that comes before Congress to permit the people of the District to spend public money for their own expenses. My constituents at home know me and have confidence in me, and all the newspapers and associations in Washington can not hurt me at home. The people there are backing me, and lots of people over the United States are likewise backing me in my fights for right and justice.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have no quarrel with the Members of Congress who are attempting to pass some legislation for the benefit of the soldiers. I do take exception to calling it adjusted compensation, because if they were going to put it on the basis of adjusted compensation they would have to pay the soldiers more money per day in order to have it adjusted compensation. You can not call it a bonus, because a bonus would mean a voluntary gift, and we have had so much difficulty in getting the legislation we can hardly call it voluntary giving. I think we are making a monstrous mistake in this bonus legislation for this reason: In the United States to-day 230,000 farmers have had to give up their homes since last year on account of foreclosure proceedings, or voluntary surrender on a settlement with their creditors. Here is the greatest opportunity this country will ever have to create a country of home owners. I have said on this floor before, and I say now, that I am not in sympathy with any proposition that does not encourage young men to build up something for themselves. I urged before the Ways and Means Committee, in order to have a proper compensation bill, that the United States ought to say to the soldiers of the World War, "I am going to lend you money to buy a home, either in town or in country, and I am going to let you organize the greatest home-building association that was ever organized, and I am going to let you build up home ownership and have something when the rainy day comes that you can point to with pride, something that will build up the wealth of this country."

What is this so-called bonus bill going to do? The little cash you pay out will soon be gone; they will have nothing to show for it. But under legislation of this House in the future years I feel that full justice will eventually be done the World War veterans. After the officers of the Revolutionary War had been paid five full years of salary the Congress of the United States, in its kindness and generosity to them, passed additional legislation to reimburse them, although it was claimed that the same had been paid them in full settlement. But we are not going to let these soldiers suffer. We will take care of them in the future years. Some of us who are in this Congress may not take care of them. But there will be new faces and new blood in Congress as the years go by who will take care of them. But I say that a monstrous mistake is being here enacted and made, because you are losing an opportunity to create in America a land of home owners, an opportunity to shift the population of our great cities back to the rural precincts.

Gentlemen, you may treat it lightly, you may think that it is not a serious matter, but the only way you can ever pass real home ownership legislation is to tie it onto legislation affecting the soldiers, and it is the only way you can ever pass it through Congress. Now, we have thrown it down. Why, gentlemen, one of the best provisions of the bill advocated by the American Legion committee and endorsed by them and taken out of this bill was the one for the development of home ownership in this country. I think that this House is making a monumental mistake. I am going to do to-morrow just what the rest of us are going to do; I am going to vote to suspend the rules and pass the legislation with the hope that it will bring some results. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLIGAN].

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to review and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped when the adjusted compensation bill came before this Congress there would be no attempt on the part of anyone to play politics with it, but my hopes were in vain. The Republican leaders of this House have seen fit to play politics with this question. To-morrow they will bring this bill before the House under suspension of the rules and pass the bill with only 20 minutes debate on a side without opportunity to amend it or offer a motion to recommit. The Republican leaders have seen fit, by this gag rule, to make it impossible for the Members of this House who are in sympathy with the 4,000,000 ex-service men to have an opportunity to amend this bill so that it will do justice to the ex-service men. I think this is the most outrageous and unjust thing that has ever been perpetrated on the ex-service men, or anyone else, by Congress. You say, "Take this or nothing."

This bill as reported by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee is a huge joke—a gold brick handed to the ex-service men. They provide for one option, a paid-up insurance policy due in 20 years. The contention has been that the ex-service men should have something immediately to aid them in readjusting their financial condition with that of the man who remained at home; yet in this bill there is no cash payment over $50, and the men can not borrow any money upon this policy until the end of two years, and at the end of two years the loan value of the average policy would be $57; at the end of three years, $87.93; at the end of four years, $119.99; at the end of five years, $153.52; and so on until at the end of 20 years the loan value of the average policy would be $900. I do not believe that such a bill as this would satisfy 5 per cent of the ex-service men, yet the Republican leaders of this House have agreed to bring this bill in under this gag rule, so that no one can offer an amendment providing for an additional option of payment in cash. As I see it, the ex-service man must die or wait 20 years to get the benefits of the provisions of this bill.

I believe that 75 per cent of the Members of this House, if such an amendment could be offered, would vote for an additional option of cash payment. I think 75 per cent of the ex-service men want cash.

War contractors received an adjusted compensation of their contracts in the sum of $700,000,000 in cash. Federal employees received an adjusted compensation of $265,000,000 in cash. The railroads received $824,000,000 in cash. You did not ask any of the above mentioned to take paid-up insurance and wait 20 years for their money. Then why should you say to the man who fought and won the war, "We will not pay you cash, but will give you an insurance policy that will become due in 20 years."

I think that such a bill as this is a direct insult to the intelligence of the ex-service men in the United States. I, for one, have enough confidence in the judgment and discretion of the ex-service man to believe that if you adjust his compensation and pay to him four or five hundred dollars in cash that he will judiciously invest or expend that amount.

And I want to say to you Republicans of this House that when you force, by this gag rule, this unfair and unjust bill on us that you are not representing the rank and file of the Republican Party, because I know that the rank and file of the Republican Party want to see justice done to the ex-service men and want Congress to pass an adjusted compensation bill that will give immediate relief to the ex-service men, and they are not in favor of a bill of this kind that you are cramming down our throats by this rule.

An adjusted compensation act should have been passed in 1919, and would have been passed in 1920 if the Republican leaders of this House had not played politics with it. In 1920, in the Sixty-sixth Congress, the Republicans had a majority in the House and in the Senate, and have had since that time, and the responsibility of not enacting such a law before is upon the Republican leaders in Congress. You had a majority in the Sixty-sixth Congress, and when the adjusted compensation bill came before that Congress you brought it before the House under a similar gag rule. Under that rule no Member of the House could offer an amendment.

In April of 1920 the House was promised by the present Republican leader that an adjusted compensation bill would be reported to the House on May 3. This promise was not kept. The adjusted compensation bill was not passed by the House until May 29, after an agreement had been made by the leaders of the House and Senate that Congress would adjourn on June 5. It was well known when that bill passed the House in the Sixty-sixth Congress, there would not be time in which to pass it through the Senate before the day agreed upon for adjournment.

For the last five years this legislation has been a political football, kicked about by the Republicans of Congress every two years. Every election year since 1919 this legislation has been before Congress and yet has never become a law. In 1922, in the Sixty-seventh Congress, this legislation was again brought up and passed by both the House and the Senate and was vetoed by the late President Harding.

I have some hesitancy in mentioning the fact that President Harding, three days before his election in November, 1920, in a speech at Cincinnati, Ohio, made the following statement:

I want to say to the service men here that I want an America that will never forget its gratitude for the service they rendered the country. A Republican House passed the bonus bill, and it is now up to the Senate. I, myself, think it ought to pass.

This being another election year the adjusted compensation bill is again brought before Congress. President Coolidge in his message to Congress stated, in his cold-blooded manner, that he was unalterably opposed to a bonus for the ex-service men, making it clear that he would veto such a bill if presented to him for his signature.

I presume that President Coolidge advised with his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, the third richest man in the United States, whose great fortune was enhanced and protected by the services of these men who would be benefited, in a small way, by the passage of such a bill. Mr. Mellon, a Cabinet member under this administration, has been exceedingly unfair to the people of this Nation, and especially to the ex-service men.

In 1922, when President Harding vetoed this act, Mr. Mellon's report showed a deficit in the Treasury of $650,000,000, yet in the same fiscal year the Government paid $613,000,000 of the Government debt not yet due, and still the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year of 1922-23 had a surplus of $370,000,000, showing a discrepancy of over a billion of dollars in Mr. Mellon's statement—an amount almost sufficient to pay the adjusted compensation. It seems to me that if this mistake on Mr. Mellon's part was not intentional, then he is not a safe man to be the Secretary of the Treasury and handle the Government's finances; and if it was intentional and for the purpose of defeating the adjusted compensation act, then he was not fair and honest with Congress or with the people.

If I read the signs aright the country is in no mood to have questions dealing with the problems of everyday life hinge upon petty party disputes and questions of political expediency. No party should seek to profit from legislation dealing fairly with the returned soldier.

Small-bore politicians may think that political advantage may be gained by playing politics with this legislation, but I hardly think intelligent people will be misled by the facts, and let me impress on some of these gentlemen that the returned soldier does recognize a demagogue at long range, and, furthermore, he puts on his gas mask when he sees him coming without waiting for the barrage.

The returned soldier, as I have found him, believes that the American soldier, regardless of party, fought and won the war. He knows that party lines were forgotten and our people stood together as Americans, forgetting for the time being the conflicting theories of government and governmental policies which are the basis of the alignment of political parties. They believed this because, when they were asked upon induction into the service about their age, residence, place of birth, and occupation, by some strange oversight they were not asked their politics.

I am a Democrat myself; my father was a Democrat before me, but I confess to you that if my life depended upon it I could not have told you the politics of 19 of the 250 men of my company, and I knew them all better than I ever knew any men on earth. Sometimes I knew their religion, because when the time comes to face eternity men talk of such things. When one of them fell bleeding with cruel wounds or gasping for breath from German gas, we did not wonder what ticket he would vote if he came through; all we knew, or wanted to know, was that he was a patriotic American, and when we laid him away and placed above his grave the little white cross which marked a hero's grave, we did not write thereon his political faith; we did not know and we did not care.

I have seen the Republican fight by the side of the Democrat, and I have seen the Democrat die by the side of the Republican, and one was just as patriotic and just as brave as the other. They were both true Americans. And we Members of the Congress should deal with legislation affecting them in the same spirit that these men fought for our country.

It seems to be the consensus of opinion that something substantial now, and not 20 years from now, should be done to enable the returned soldier to readjust himself to the conditions which confronted him at the time of his discharge and are still confronting him. Four and one-half millions of young Americans who gave up their means of livelihood, their positions, their opportunities for advancement, and made every sacrifice from one of financial loss to that of health and limb and life itself, are entitled as a matter of simple justice to such legislation as will, as far as possible to do so, help them to fight the battle of life by reducing to the lowest possible minimum the handicap under which they began the struggle as a result of their service.

The use of the word "bonus" in discussing this legislation is a misnomer. In the common acceptance of the term, bonus means a gratuity, something free, something for nothing. The service men are asking for a small readjustment of their compensation while in the service as compared with that of the men who remained at home and did not sustain any financial losses by serving their country in its time of need. The returned soldier does not come for alms; he simply wants fair treatment, a square deal. You can not buy his patriotism; you can not recompense him for the anguish of body and mind he suffered in the training camps or on the field of battle; all this he laid down upon the altar of duty. He suffered, his loved ones suffered, and the suffering is not at an end, for there are those who will limp through life unable to hold their own in the fight for existence, and there are those who did not come back, whose widows and orphans and old fathers and mothers must face the struggle without the strong arm of him who sleeps in France or who fell a victim to disease in one of the training camps. You can not discharge your obligation by pointing to the benefits the disabled and the relatives of the dead receive from his war-risk insurance. He paid for his insurance out of his small compensation. But you can do something as an act of simple justice, not of charity, to lighten his burden and toward placing him on an even footing with the man who was not called into service.

The men who were not called into service and remained at their former employment received larger wages than was ever before paid in the history of our Nation. Those men owed just as great a duty to their country as the man who was in service, and when I make the statement I mean nothing disparaging, because I realize a much larger army must remain at home to provision the Army in the field. But they remained at home and reaped the benefits of these high wages. To illustrate my point I wish to tell an incident that occurred in France after the organization with which I served came out of the Meuse-Argonne offensive. A private showed me a newspaper which stated that the munition workers, as I remember, were drawing $7 per day, were asking for a raise to $9 per day. This private said, "There is justice for you, those fellows getting $7 per day for making ammunition and kicking, and here we are stopping ammunition for a dollar a day."

During the war the United States took over a great deal of private property for public use, for use in the different war activities, for which they paid the market price. The same situation existed when the United States inducted men into the service, yet the Government did not pay the market price or anywhere near the market price for those services.

I wish to mention to you the fact that the allied nations have adjusted the compensation of their returned soldiers of the late war, both officers and men who had home service and those who had foreign service. Italy gave to her returned soldiers amounts ranging from $63.69 up to $854.42. France paid amounts ranging from $187.21 to $233.58. Great Britain, from $140.94 to $7,290. Canada, amounts ranging from $600 to $4,758.

I believe that if these war-stricken nations, with the vast amount of territory laid in waste which can not be reclaimed for years to come, with their great loss of man power and their enormous war debts, can pay their returned soldiers the above-stated compensation, then this great Nation of ours, with all its natural resources and wealth, is financially able to pay to her returned soldiers $1 per day for home service and $1.25 per day for overseas service and pay them at once in cash if the man wants it, which would be a billion dollars cheaper to the Government than the proposed plan.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STENGLE].

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I regret exceedingly that some peculiar twist of the rules of this House, through which it will become necessary for us to vote to-morrow on only one proposition in regard to adjusted compensation, has made it necessary for me to-day to seek a part of the valuable time of this committee which ought to be used to forward legislation connected with the appropriations for naval affairs in order that I may register my protest against the form in which this particular so-called bonus legislation has been brought before us. Some have seen fit to call this "snap" judgment. I know of no better term than this by which to describe it. But I am reminded, my friends, that during the war there was no use found for snap judgment by the millions of American boys when they were called to the colors. It so happened that during that period I occupied an official position in the great city of New York, and from my office window

I was able to see the ships that were sailing out into the ocean carrying your boys and mine to the other side for the purpose of safeguarding democracy and preserving the rights of citizenship throughout the world. I saw the distinguished and lamented President Wilson when he in turn went over on his ship. I saw the boys as they marched in battalion form down to the dock; I saw the fathers and mothers and friends and neighbors as they wrapped arms around the necks of those boys and promised them that upon their return home again nothing would be too good for them. I joined in that promise and praise. I joined in the efforts which followed closely thereafter in raising funds to provide for the welfare of our boys on the other side.

I was a member of receiving committees as the boys returned, and a royal welcome was given to them, with the further assurance that their efforts in our behalf would not be forgotten by us on this side. And what are we offering them? I read somewhere in the Good Book a statement like this, "They asked for bread, and you gave them a stone." These boys, my friends, have only asked for a square deal, and you give them insurance. They have only asked for an adjustment of their compensation, and you give them a policy that is only worth something in reality after they have gone to that bourne from which no traveler has returned. Now let me ask you to consider for a moment what you have really done. They have asked for a cash payment, and you have given them a policy which can not be conscientiously or honestly defended, and you have given the country, or are going to give the country to-morrow, an added indebtedness of $2,119,000,000, when if you had done what you were asked you would have saved the country almost $700,000,000. [Applause.] So, as I say, you have added an additional burden, an unnecessary burden, upon the people of the country by denying the cash compensation as requested. [Applause.]

I am exceedingly sorry that my Republican colleagues of this House are not willing to play the game fair with the boys who wore the khaki, fought the great battles, and suffered intense privations in order that civilization might be kept on an even keel and your home and mine be continued as the center of hope, ambition, and righteous living. Gentlemen, snap judgment, such as you are exhibiting toward adjusted compensation legislation, will not pay your debt to those who have a right to expect decent treatment at your hands. You may get away with your proposal to-morrow, but when you do you will be but marking the beginning of a real fight for a square deal for those boys who risked everything for their country's honor. A mere certificate of decent admission to some cemetery after life's struggle is over is not and by no process of honest reasoning can be made to appear as adjusted compensation, and nobody knows this better than the now famous (?) 13 members of the Ways and Means Committee who voted for the insurance-policy plan and then were not willing to trust this House to receive and act upon their report in a true American way. If I mistake not, there will be at least 13 new faces in the Sixty-ninth Congress as a result of this unfair dealing.

Either the Sixty-eighth Congress owes the 4,000,000 of returned World War veterans a fair and honest adjustment of their financial affairs or they owe them nothing at all. Either the country is indebted to these boys or we are wasting our time and talent in endeavoring to bring about so-called bonus legislation. By their votes in committee each and every member of the Ways and Means Committee has admitted that something is due. Then why not sit down with the proposed beneficiaries and in man fashion seek to give them some option as to how they shall receive or accept the small pittance which we are about to allot to them.

This is not and ought not to be a partisan question. The politics of those who volunteered or were drafted for World War service was never considered. They were all Americans, and that meant "service" when the bugle sounded. I rejoice that no Democratic member of the committee having this matter of compensation in charge so far forgot his duty to our Nation's defenders as to take part in a "snap judgment" procedure when the hour of final decision came. I rejoice further that at least one of my Republican colleagues was bold enough and brave enough to stand out against such a plan.

For the life of me I can not understand why we are not given an opportunity to decide whether we prefer giving the boys cash or insurance policies or an option to take either. Personally I believe it would be better for both the country and the boys to adopt the cash compensation plan. It certainly would cost less and give more satisfaction and at the same time do away with an immense lot of bureau work made necessary by the plan proposed by the "immortal 13." Am I far wrong if I suspect that the methods which we are asked to approve will bring about the creation of a large number of additional places to be filled by the appointment of political friends who are hungrily waiting at the Republican pie counter?

Gentlemen, the pledge I gave the boys both when they went "over there" and when they came marching home was not a mere "scrap of paper." I meant it then, and I mean it now. We found money to pay bonuses to war profiteers, and, if we want to, we can find enough now to do the right thing. I know that, through the agency of a well "oiled" propaganda, we Members of this body have been urged to defeat adjusted compensation. Some of us have even been threatened with political extinction if we vote for such a thing, but, colleagues, there is not enough allurements in being a Member of Congress to make me forget my duty in this matter, and should my act on the morrow send me to the "shades of private life," I shall go cheerfully and with the consciousness of having stood up when the call of manhood came. I will not go hence, however, without here and now registering my humble but earnest protest against the taking of snap judgment in the matter of properly paying an honest debt to those who bared their breasts to the enemies of decent civilization.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, to break the monotony of criticism which has prevailed. I desire to assure the House that I wish to pay a tribute to some officials who have performed their duty. [Applause.] I have always believed—in fact, from early manhood I have advocated and indorsed certain municipally owned public utilities. At this time I want to congratulate the city officials at Jacksonville, Fla., both present and past, upon the wonderful showing and success they have made of the city water-and-light plant in Jacksonville, and in doing so I believe I also voice the sentiments of the citizens of said city. Believing it will be of interest and benefit to the citizens of other cities of the country and also may be of some assistance in making other municipal plants a success, I ask that the following letter be made a part of my remarks:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I do not think I shall object—I just want to ask the gentleman if they are asking Congress to put up 40 per cent of all the expense of their water, and light, and sewers, and police service, and firemen service, and schools, and school books, and the opening up of streets, and so forth?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. No. They are not asking for a thing. They have furnished certain information I requested.

Mr. BLANTON. They are quite different from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
CITY COMMISSION OF THE CITY OF JACKSONVILLE,
Jacksonville, Fla., March 4, 1924.

Hon. W. J. SEARS,

Care House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DEAR Mr. SEARS: Replying to yours of the 29th instant, beg to say that in 1893 the city was authorized by the State legislature to issue $1,000,000 worth of improvement bonds, $75,000 of which was specifically set aside for the purpose of building and equipping an electric-light plant. From the proceeds of this issue the construction of the plant was begun in 1894, completed in 1895, and began operation under the supervision of that branch of the city government then known as the board of public works. This board continued to operate the plant until June, 1899, at which time our city charter, as above stated, was changed and the management passed into the hands of the board of bond trustees. Since the 1917 charter amendment the plant has been under the supervision of the city commission.

In addition to the original bonds of $75,000 a new issue of $27,500 in 1901 and another of $100,000 in 1913 were sold, making a total of $202,500 actually outstanding against the plant at this time. In 1912 we built a new plant and made changes in the old (now used as a substation) at a cost of approximately $635,000, and in the following year our gross earnings were over $600,000. The plant has earned much more than enough to make all necessary improvements and pay operating expenses. Our plant is worth over $2,500,000, and has proven to be the most valuable asset the city owns. We not only deliver current to our consumers at a very reasonable rate, one much lower than the average plant charges, but it saves the taxpayers at least 6 or 7 mills annual tax by reason of transfers made to the general fund. No assessments have been made on account of the construction cost of the plant, but, as stated before, bonds were sold, the plant has long since repaid the taxpayers many times more in profits. The rates now in effect are practically the same as for a number of years past, except slight changes in those on power. It has been the policy of the different administrations to keep the operation of the plant entirely away from politics, and this one thing alone has been of inestimable value to the taxpayers.

The gross earnings of the electric light plant for 1923 amounted to $1,300,410. The operating expenses were $646,626, the net earnings for the year were consequently $653,784, and the cash on hand in this department December 31, 1923 (including sale of improvement certificates), was $639,605. The gross earnings of the plant for 25 years amounted to $12,397,746, operating expenses during same period of time $5,424,771, net earnings $6,972,975, extensions and improvements $3,758,940; and turned over to the city treasurer since 1899, $3,351,895.83 for general purposes, being from 1899 to 1916 the sum of $977,391.83, and in the last seven years an additional sum of $2,374,504.

RATE CHARGED.

The rates for residential lighting and cooking are 7 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 35, 5 cents per kilowatt hour for the next 40, and 2 cents per kilowatt hour for all in excess of 75 kilowatt hours consumption, subject to minimum charge of $1 per month.

Outside the city limits the rates are 10 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 35, 7 cents per kilowatt hour for the next 40, and 3 cents per kilowatt hour for all in excess of 75 kilowatt hours consumption, subject to minimum charge of $1.50 per month.

The rates for commercial cooking and heating in city limits are 3 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 500, 2½ cents per kilowatt hour for the next 4,000, 2 cents per kilowatt hour for the next 5,000, and 1½ cents per kilowatt hour for all in excess of 9,000 kilowatt hours consumption, subject to a minimum charge of $5 per month.

Outside the city limits the rates are 4½ cents per kilowatt hour for the first 500, 3½ cents per kilowatt hour for the next 4,000, 3 cents per kilowatt hour for the next 5,000, and 2½ cents per kilowatt hour for all in excess of 9,500 kilowatt hours consumption, subject to a minimum charge of $7.50 per month.

POWER RATES.

The rates for 2,200-volt alternating 60-cycle current are as follows, subject to minimum consumption of 5,000 kilowatts per month, all wiring from main line to meter to be paid for by applicant:

Two cents per kilowatt for the first 10,000 kilowatts used per month. One and seventy-five one-hundredths cents per kilowatt for the next 15,000 kilowatts used per month.

One and fifty one-hundredths cents per kilowatt for the next 50,000 kilowatts used per month.

One and twenty-five one-hundredths cents per kilowatt for the next 75,000 kilowatts used per month.

ILLUMINATING ELECTRICITY.

The rates for illuminating electricity, i. e., 110 and 220 volts alternating current for all services, shall be 7 cents per kilowatt hour by meter measurements, with a minimum charge of 50 cents per month, subject to the following discounts: Where the consumption of each separately metered service equals or exceeds—

Thirty dollars per month, 10 per cent.

One hundred dollars per month, 15 per cent.

One hundred and fifty dollars per month, 20 per cent.

Two hundred dollars per month, 25 per cent.

Three hundred dollars and over, 40 per cent.

Commissioner Frank H. Owen has charge of and supervision over our electric-light plant, and if there is any further information you desire, particularly in relation to details concerning its operation and the like, I am sure he will be very glad to supply same on request.

In conclusion, permit me to say that it has certainly been no trouble to me, but on the other hand a distinct pleasure, to furnish you with this information relative to our plant, for we all feel that the showing it has made makes it worthy of being pointed to with pardonable pride, for we feel that while electricity can be sold by hydro plants at less than our rates, they are probably the lowest at which same can be obtained anywhere in the country where fuel is used for the production thereof.

Whenever I can serve you, please feel no hesitancy in calling upon me, and with kind personal regards, believe me,

Cordially yours,

THOS. C. IMESON,
Chairman City Commission.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to-morrow we are to take up the consideration of a makeshift soldiers' bonus bill by a "gag process" under a suspension of the rules. Why is this to be done? Is it to enable the people's Representatives here to express freely by speech and vote their wishes on this all-important subject? Exactly the opposite is true.

Is it to weave into a bonus bill the best thought of this Congress? Not at all. Is it to pass a bonus bill such as the country wants the ex-service men to have? No; it is to prevent this identical thing. Is it to give the ex-service men what the great majority of them desire? Most emphatically no. Is it for the purpose of paying the ex-service men what we so justly owe them? No. It is to further deprive them of their rights. Is it for the purpose of being fair with either this House of Representatives, the country, or the ex-service men that this important matter is to be handled in this way? No; it is for the purpose of being anything but fair. Then why is it to be done? I will tell you. It is for the purpose of thwarting the will of this House, the wishes of the country, and the desires of the ex-service men and yet trying to avoid all blame for the outrage. It is for the purpose of attempting to take care not of the ex-service man but of those who would exploit them. It is for the purpose of trying to shield those in the present administration who are opposed to a real bonus by passing this proposed makeshift. I will tell you why this "gag" performance is to take place. It is for the purpose of preventing the ex-service men getting that which is theirs. It is for the purpose of being dishonest with them and for the purpose of deceiving them if possible. It is for the purpose of attempting to make the ex-service men think they are getting payment of the debt we owe them when, as a matter of fact, they are only getting what will be a nuisance to many of them.

It is for the purpose of giving them as nearly nothing as possible, with the design of making them believe they are really receiving something of value. It is for the purpose of trying to get the vote of the ex-service men under false pretenses. It is for the purpose of trying to get the ex-service men's vote in the next election, not in return for service but for empty promises of the same people who were willing for them to fight and sacrifice without pay and who now desire to exploit them rather than pay them that which is due them.

Oh, why not be honest about this matter? Those who oppose any bonus for the ex-service men ought to have nerve to say so and act accordingly. They also ought to be fair with the ex-service men, with the country, and with Congress, and let those of us who favor a real bonus have the right to say so by word and by vote. Why be afraid to let us offer amendments here and thus perfect the bill? Are the Republicans afraid of the Democrats in dealing with this bill? Are the Republicans in control afraid of the ex-service men in Congress? Are the Republicans even afraid of some of their own crowd? "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." Why run from a square deal? Why flee from the light of open debate? Why squirm and twist and be afraid of your own shadow and flee from a proper consideration of the issues involved? Oh, my friends, what a mockery you are making of this matter.

Instead of bread you are giving a stone. Instead of a fish you are giving a serpent. Instead of food you are giving ashes. Instead of raiment you are giving sackcloth. Instead of a token of highest respect, esteem, and honor you are giving a deception of emptiness and shame. Instead of a genuine bonus you are proposing to throw a monkey wrench in the political and parliamentary machinery, so as to prevent, if possible, the granting of a bonus by either this Congress or any subsequent Congress. Ah, Mr. Chairman, when the boys marched away we promised them everything. They went and did most bravely their part. Some came back halt and lame and blind. Some with both eyes gone. Some with both arms gone. Ah, too many were slaughtered in that awful inferno and never came back. Oh, the hell they went through for you and me and our country.

Thank God many of the boys came back alive and well, and these boys are now holding up their hands, not begging, but asking us here in Congress to only be fair with them and help start them again in life. And now you, who have charge of this "gag" proposition, instead of granting them assistance in a new start in life, are offering them funeral expenses.

The ex-service men gave us honor; you are offering them dishonor. They gave us service; you are offering them hypocrisy. They gave us all; you are offering them nothing. They saved us; you are offering them destruction. They gave us patriotism; you are giving them politics. They fought honorably for the Nation; you are fighting dishonorably for their votes. They offered to sacrifice themselves to save you and yours when it was necessary for the preservation of the Nation; now you propose to unnecessarily sacrifice them and theirs, because you think that by so doing you may gain a little advantage politically. Oh, why not be fair about the entire matter? This Congress should do its duty by the ex-service men, even as they did their duty by us, by our Nation, and by all humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back any time I might have remaining.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, the political party which, in the last and best analysis, truly merits the respect and confidence of the people is the political party that is sincere in its platform declarations, honestly endeavors to carry them into effect, and courageously meets its obligations.

The Republican national platform in 1920 declared as follows:

We hold in imperishable remembrance the valor and the patriotism of the soldiers and sailors of America who fought in the Great War for human liberty, and we pledge ourselves to discharge to the fullest the obligations which a grateful Nation justly should fulfill in appreciation of the services rendered by its defenders on sea and on land.

Although this declaration consists largely of generalities, it was made at a time when the question of adjusted compensation for ex-service men of the World War was attracting national attention, and was written into the platform as a result of the sentiment for legislation of this character, and for the purpose of enlisting soldier support. In view of this fact, no construction can be placed on such utterance other than a declaration in favor of adjusted compensation and a clear recognition of our obligations to the ex-service men. The Republican Party has utterly failed to redeem this pledge. In my opinion, the bill presented falls far short of doing justice to the men who served in the World War and fails to fulfill the obligation we owe to these men, but no choice is left for those who are the real friends of adjusted compensation and who want to do their whole duty to the ex-service men of the Nation. Under a system of "gag" rule which denies amendment or free discussion we are told that we must accept this or nothing. We are not permitted to do that which our conscience dictates we should do. We are not permitted to offer amendments, and discussion of the measure is limited to such an extent that we are even denied the right to express our sentiments while the bill is under consideration.

I shall vote for this measure because the majority of this House says, in effect, "this is all we will give you and you dare not ask for more," and for the reason that under the "gag" rule invoked we can not ask for more. To my mind, the least that could have been done in fairness to the ex-service men of the Nation would have been to have offered a twofold plan, such as the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee desired, giving to these men the option of taking insurance or cash. No additional cost would have been incurred and it would have shown good faith, but this right is denied them and we are denied the right, under the rule invoked by the majority, of offering an amendment to this bill to give them such right of option. We attempted to liberalize the rules in the opening of this session of Congress and certain amendments were made. At that time we were told by the majority party that such amendments would destroy orderly procedure in the House. Now, I am convinced of the fact that we did not go far enough in liberalizing the rules. To deny the right of amendment or discussion of a measure of such consequence as the one before us is, to my mind, wholly undemocratic and not in keeping with a Government such as ours, and I here and now register my protest against such "gag" rule. As I said before, I shall support this measure, because it is all that is left us and because it is a step in the right direction, but I warn you now, you are not deceiving the rank and file of the ex-service men of this country. They will soon recognize that this bill is a subterfuge, will place the responsibility where it properly belongs, and you on the majority side will be called to account.

These men served us faithfully in the greatest crisis of the world's history. Their sacrifices were great, but they faithfully responded to their country's call. It is a well-known fact that the overwhelming majority of the 4,500,000 soldier boys called to the colors in the World War were men of small or moderate means. Called from the farms, the schools, and the sweatshops of the Nation, many of them were just starting or making preparations to start on their chosen vocations. They were compelled to give up their plans for the future, discontinue their education, and forfeit their jobs. In many instances they were forced to sacrifice their crops, property, and business con-nations, yet they went like men, real, courageous, upstanding men. Throughout the war in the training camps, cantonments, and upon the battle field their conduct was such as to win the plaudits of the Nation. For their services they received approximately $1 per day, and of this they contributed liberally in the purchase of Liberty bonds to assist the Government in a financial way. Deductions were made for insurance and allotments were made in many cases out of their small remuneration to the dependents of those who were called into the service.

On the other hand, those who remained at home received wages ranging from $5 to $20 per day, with short hours and secure from the enemy. Business thrived, special interests prospered, and huge fortunes were accumulated. Greed and avarice reared their shaggy heads and the profiteer made war on our resources at home while these boys defended our honor abroad.

The war being over they returned home victorious, amid the acclamation of a grateful people. They were assured that an adjustment of their compensation would be made and that the Government would not be unmindful of its obligation, yet for years action has been delayed. When the matter is discussed the opponents of adjusted compensation plead poverty and lack of money. Already Italy, France, Great Britain, and Canada have met this obligation to their soldiers, yet we, the most powerful, the most wealthy of all nations, are still met with the plea of poverty and lack of funds. There are some men who are honestly and conscientiously opposed to such legislation. To these I have no criticism to offer. For them I have the utmost respect; but the great weight of opposition comes from an entirely different source. Those who plead poverty and lack of funds the loudest are the ones who profited and accumulated fortunes while our boys were in the service.

The oil interests, the steel interests, the munition makers, the sugar barons, the tobacco trusts, and the immensely rich are opposed to adjusted compensation. President Coolidge has declared his opposition to it. Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, who has juggled figures to show surpluses and deficits to suit his whim, is opposed to it. The numerous corporations in which he is interested are opposed to it. A slush fund, to which the great interests of the country have contributed, has been raised to defeat it. Corporations have coerced ex-service men to write Members of Congress expressing opposition to it. I do not want it understood that I am opposed to the accumulation of wealth. On the other hand, I like to see everybody prosper. I believe in organized wealth. When honestly and lawfully managed it becomes a wonderful agency for progress, prosperity, and development. Yet when dishonestly handled it becomes the most dangerous foe to representative government. The slimy hand of wealth has undertaken to exploit the Nation, loot the Treasury, debauch the public, and undermine the Government. It has sought to corrupt elections, bribe officials, and shape legislation. So brazenly and with such arrogant effrontery has it invaded the National Capital and sown its propaganda that the honest man hesitates to advocate anything supported by wealth or the corporate interests of the country, however meritorious it may appear. Incorruptibility in official life, economy in administration of Government, and honesty in the enforcement of all laws are essential to the stability of the Republic, and the public official who tolerates corruption and dishonesty will ultimately be swept from office by the righteous wrath of an indignant people. Since the war, through fraud, flagrant extravagance, and reckless expenditure of public funds, there has been a loss to the Government sufficient to have substantially met the expense of a liberal plan of adjusted compensation. If the present administration will inaugurate a policy of economy, eliminate all needless boards, commissions, and unnecessary employees and strike a death blow to the extravagance and graft that is running rampant, a saving to the Government can be had that will greatly exceed the cost of adjusted compensation.

We are apparently resting upon a colossal mass of putrefaction the odor of which is as destructive to the national welfare as were the poison gases to our boys in the great World War. They successfully combated this enemy of human life in that mighty struggle, and they will as successfully combat corruption, protect the national welfare, and perpetuate the Republic in time of peace. In view of this situation what shall we do? Shall we heed the plea of those who fight our battles in time of war or shall we falter and fail at the behest of those whose creed is avarice and whose god is gold? There can be but one answer. Although the bill presented is not satisfactory, and does not fully discharge our obligation, it is a step in the right direction, and we will take our place on the side of right. How can we contemplate this great contest and the boys who participated therein and hesitate for a moment?

I still hear the echo of the bugle call, the drumbeat, and the tramping of millions of feet at the training camps and cantonments. I see the ships of destiny as they carry the boys across the sea amid the lurking perils of the submarine. I see them land on a foreign soil and rush to the battle front. In the face of every instrument of death that human ingenuity and the genius of man could devise they assumed their place in that mighty orgy of blood and carnage. The poison gases, machine guns, and heavy artillery failed to check their onslaught. At Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, the Argonne, and all along the Hindenburg line their acts of bravery and deeds of daring stunned the allied forces and broke the morale of the Hun. Amid this unparalleled tragedy of the world's history they seized the pen of destiny and, dipping it in the sunset glow of the autocracy, wrote on heaven's blue above them the matchless splendor of American valor and the deathless glory of American arms. Shall we forget them now in the face of such a record as this? Shall we forget their superb courage and matchless achievement? Shall we forget the sacrifices made and the patriotism with which they served? No; in God's great name, no.

Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MAJOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MAJOR of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in response to the memorable address of the late Woodrow Wilson, delivered to Congress on April 2, 1917, the Congress of the United States on the 6th day of April, 1917, in solemn form, declared war and the people of this country entered the great world struggle. Never in the history of this or any other country was a people so stirred to activity of every kind. Funds had to be raised, supplies acquired, munitions and war material manufactured, all to the end of putting across the seas at the earliest possible moment an effective fighting force. In this hour of preparation we all did our bit; throughout the country in every city, town, village, and hamlet, men, women, and children joined in the one great effort of preparation. It was left however, to the young manhood of our country to make the great sacrifice—to furnish the man power, the gun fodder—to the end that our cause should triumph. Twenty-four million young men of military age were registered for military duty. Of this number 4,000,000 were conscripted into the service. They not only left their comfortable homes and loved ones but their various vocations, businesses, and professions to serve their country. When the various calls were made those called were assembled generally at county seats, and taken to some training camp to prepare themselves for duties overseas. How well do I remember those occasions when the boys from my home county, accompanied by their loved ones, would respond to these calls. The good women of the American Red Cross would take them in hand and serve lunch to them, and by acts of kindness and words of love would make their departure as cheerful as possible. As chairman of the American Red Cross in my county, I was generally called upon with others to make a talk to those boys, and how well do I remember how we all assured them that their beloved country would never forget their splendid service and sacrifice nor cease to be grateful to them; and that we would care for and look after their loved ones in their absence and that upon their return from victory nothing would be too good for them. For one I have been and am now willing to keep my word with these boys. In the camps and across the seas their hours were 24, not 8, and their compensation was $1 a day. From this paltry sum was deducted required payments of insurance, allotments, and Liberty bonds. We who remained at home suffered no privations nor hardships, and enjoyed an era of high wages and prosperity, receiving higher wages for our labor and a higher price for our commodities than were ever before known in this country. While we were enjoying this prosperity, these service men worked in the construction of Army camps and cantonments, as carpenters, bricklayers, and other skilled work for the princely sum of $1 a day, while at their side, performing the same character of service, were private citizens receiving from $8 to $10 per day. The families of these men were obliged to meet the constantly increasing cost of living out of the paltry pay of the soldier, who had been taken from his ordinary vocation and forced to work for $30 per month, while the increased cost of living of civilian workers of all classes was met by a greatly increased wage. The comforts of home were displaced by the hardships of camps and trenches, separated from friends and family and loved ones; careers, positions, and professions were abandoned; great sacrifices and privations were endured, and when they finally returned to their homes they found their former positions filled and were compelled to take their places at the foot of the ladder.

The question confronting us at this time is: What shall we do for these men? Not in the way of payment, for services of this kind can not be paid for with money, but in the way of a substantial remembrance to show our appreciation of what they did for us and compensate them for the losses they sustained. What would the people of our country have us do? Individually, what would our constituents have us do? As a Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress I voted for an adjusted compensation bill. It was not such a bill as I would like to have supported, but it was all that was offered by the majority party and I had to take it as it was handed to me or vote against it. In the campaign of 1922, in every speech I made, I told my people that if sent here as their Representative I would vote for a proper measure to compensate these men. While the measure as reported from the Ways and Means Committee is not what I would have given them, yet as in the Sixty-sixth Congress I either have to vote for this measure or vote against it. The manner in which it has been reported and is to be considered does not permit me to even offer an amendment, but I am going to support it as it is because I consider it better than nothing, and it seems to be all that the Republicans, who are now in control here, are willing to grant them. In supporting the measure, I fully realize that I am doing what a number of people throughout the country and in my own district consider improper, but I believe that I am representing the majority of the people of the country and of my own district in supporting this measure, which in a way gives to the ex-service men of the country some form of compensation.

I do not contend that there is only one side to this question, for, like most propositions, it has at least two sides. Neither am I one of those who would define the two sides as "our side and the wrong side," but I am willing to admit that there may be two sides to what may appear to me a one-sided question. What have we done in the way of adjusted compensation? What have others received? Since the armistice Congress has passed laws validating what I considered illegal contracts made by the War Department with the big interests of the country for war supplies amounting to more than three billions of dollars. Congress has appropriated over $600,000,000 to pay money to those war profiteers for supposed profit they would have made out of the Government had the war continued. The railroads were taken over by the Government and operated during the war and the people were taxed about two billions of dollars to pay for losses sustained in this undertaking. Congress passed a law providing several millions of dollars to pay mineral and mining speculators for profits they claimed they would have made had the war gone on. Congress appropriated millions to pay losses sustained by the Shipping Board. Congress voted $100,000,000 to feed Europe and $20,000,000 for Russia; yet when all these expenditures were made those who are now protesting so loudly against paying any bonus to the soldier were silent as the tomb, but when it comes to adjusted compensation for the ex-service men the very interests which so largely profited and profited and which had already made enormous profits out of the Government are the loudest and most vehement in their protests, claiming that the payment of the bonus will prevent reduction of taxes and work havoc and ruin to the business interests of the country.

In addition to all these interests which have already received theirs say to us "through the granting of a bonus the cherished ideals of America would be weakened; obligations of citizenship would seem less insistent, and the right of this Republic to call upon the citizens to bear arms in its defense would be subject to contract negotiations instead of a response to patriotic duty rewarded by the preservation of the country's integrity." They tell us "that these men can not be paid in gold for the sacrifices they made and every honor due them must be jealously guarded." Their admonition is "do not dishonor him."

Let us run back over the history of our country and see what action was taken and what reward, if any, was made to those who served us in other wars.

Gen. George Washington, the Father of his Country, accepted a bonus for services rendered in the French and Indian wars and in the Revolutionary War.

General Lafayette, by a special act of Congress, received $200,000, above all pay and emoluments due him, and 630 acres of land.

Congress in 1779, at the request of General Washington, allowed $100 to every soldier who had enlisted early in the war.

In the Mexican War of 1846 the soldiers were compensated in advance. Congress passed a law providing every soldier who enlisted for 12 months with a bounty on honorable discharge of 160 acres of land, or an equivalent of $100 in Treasury scrip bearing 6 per cent interest.

Abraham Lincoln applied for compensation for his own military service as a captain of mounted volunteers in the Black Hawk War, which application, dated August 21, 1858, is recorded in the General Land Office in Washington.

Lincoln also advocated and signed compensation bills for the soldiers of the Civil War.

Gen. U. S. Grant in 1850 applied for land under the "act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who had been engaged in the military service of the United States approved September 28, 1850." This was for his service in the Fourth Regiment of the United States Infantry during the war with Mexico. His application is dated November 6, 1850.

Gen. Robert E. Lee, on February 20, 1854, applied for bounty lands for services in the war with Mexico, in which he saw service as a captain, Corps of Engineers.

Adjustments of compensation were also made to General Sheridan, General Sherman, Gen. Winfield Scott, and Admiral Farragut. These men are all national heroes, men who have made America what it is to-day, and yet they believed in adjusted compensation and accepted it.

A month's salary was paid by the Government to each member of the crew serving under Capt. James Lawrence, that able naval hero known to fame because when dying and carried below the decks commanded, "Don't give up the ship!"

The soldiers who served the Government in the war with Mexico and the Indian wars and the Civil War were given a bonus in the form of land warrants and bounties. Such is the record of our country on the bonus and compensation paid our soldiers on land and sea. Did we "dishonor" them?

Our Government during the World War paid a bonus, and is still paying it, of $240 per year to each of its civil employees drawing less than $2,500 a year. The total paid these employees amounted to millions, yet they endured no hardships. They worked in steam-heated rooms in the winter and in the breezes of the electric fan in the summer. This extra $20 per month was paid to them that they might meet the increased cost of living.

The United States is the richest country in the world and our indebtedness is the smallest. Notwithstanding the great indebtedness with which our allies are burdened, they have granted substantial bonuses to their soldiers. The bonuses allowed by these countries are as follows:

France, $249; Great Britain, from $142 to a private to about $7,000 to an officer; Italy, $64; Belgium, $462. Canada has paid every private a bonus of $800 and her officers $972, and in addition advanced the soldiers money to buy farms and after discharge made them an allowance each month until they secured employment. Australia and New Zealand have paid their soldiers a bonus.

If our allies, impoverished as they are, can show to their ex-service men an appreciation of their services by a substantial remembrance, why can not we, the richest nation in the world, be as appreciative and as generous to our patriotic sons? It is true we are not legally obligated in any way, but are we not morally bound to grant to these men compensation in some form in addition to the meager pay they received for their services? He who calls a man ungrateful sums up all the evil that a man can be guilty of.

Gratitude is properly a virtue, disposing the mind to an inward sense and an outward acknowledgment of a benefit received, together with a readiness to return the same, or the like, as the occasions of the deed so require and the abilities of the receiver extend to.

Well do I recall the following beautiful tribute to our flag:

Flag of our great Republic, guardian of our honor and inspiration in every battle for the right, whose stars and stripes stand for beauty, purity, justice, liberty, and the Union, we salute thee, and for thy defense we pledge our lives, our hearts, and sacred honor.

It was under this banner that our boys did service; and shall it be said of us that those who fought under the Stars and Stripes are to be denied the token of esteem and gratitude that has been accorded the patriotic sons of France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand? God forbid! A grateful Government should give some substantial evidence of appreciation for the unselfish and heroic services rendered by her patriotic sons. Let it not be said that we were ungrateful. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MAJOR of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] use some of his time?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, doubtless you are aware that up to this time, at this session, and my first session, I have not addressed this House. I would not attempt to do so now were it not for certain events, and for certain addresses made on the floor of this House on last Saturday afternoon. I am going to talk on the subject of the oil-reserve leases, and if I can carry my voice to your ears I think you will be interested. Owing to the limit of time and the impossibility of presenting this tremendous subject within my time limit, I am forced to proceed rather rapidly, and shall have to ask you not to ask me to yield any time for questions.

The pending consideration of and debate on the naval appropriation bill offers, as I understand the rules, the first opportunity for discussion of the matter of the naval-reserve leases. I had not determined to offer any remarks until I heard the several gentlemen on the floor day before yesterday, last Saturday. I wish to say at the outset, so that there may be no mistake and no excuse for a wrong impression, that I am not attempting to defend or extenuate the matter of loans or payments of money to Albert B. Fall by Edward Doheny and Harry F. Sinclair, lessees of Government naval oil reserve lands. I do not stand here either to defend or prosecute those gentlemen. I voted for the resolution to appoint special counsel to bring a court action to test the validity of the leases on naval reserve No. 1 in California, and No. 3, the Teapot Dome, in Wyoming, and the prosecution of any and all wrongdoers in that connection. These matters both as to criminal and civil issues are now where they should be, in the courts of the land.

I so voted for the resolution because of "circumstances indicating fraud and corruption," which, if proven in the courts, would probably justify a cancellation of the leases on the broad principle that fraud vitiates everything.

Let me say further, so that the record may show, that on the 12th day of April, 1922, on the day that word was received in Casper, Wyo., of the lease of the Teapot Dome, I was one of a committee of three, the other two members being H. H. Swartz and Harry B. Durham, of Casper, Wyo., by the Independent or Rocky Mountain Petroleum Association, in a meeting to draft a telegram of protest. This was done, and the records of the Interior Department will show such telegram from the said association.

But this was not a protest against the lease because of any expected corruption or any idea that the lease was illegal or unwise or unfair to the Government. At that date we knew nothing of the terms of the contract. The telegram was a protest against producing any more oil in that region, as the Salt Creek field was then capable of producing three times as much oil as was then being taken and for which there was a market. We objected to the congestion of oil, overproduction already existing and affecting adversely the market price.

We might well, having taken the action to secure a decision by the courts, cease discussion of these things in Congress and give our attention to the legislation the people are demanding. Yet day by day we witness ex parte investigations and partisan attacks in the hope of affecting the national trend in the great political battle about to ensue. No word of proof has been uttered, no evidence has been adduced against any official, in spite of all these attempts, indicating moral turpitude or bribery, excepting the single instance of Mr. Fall. Searchers, inquirers, and the newspapers have raked and scraped the entire area, and nothing more has been found against any agent of the Government. And yet gentlemen on the Democratic side are willing and apparently anxious to continue the making of charges, intimations, covert attacks, insinuating the making of profits out of these leases, and, indeed, in criminal participation by other officials connected with the Naval and Interior Departments.

The gentleman from South Carolina on the floor last Saturday afternoon was willing and apparently anxious to state and did state as a fact that there was ownership of stock in the Sinclair Oil Co. by Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt "at the time the leases were made," notwithstanding the evidence in his hands on which he based the statement did not support the charge and he had no other proof. The statement made was not a fact, as the record now shows; the gentleman from South Carolina was properly excoriated by the gentleman from Kansas. When gentlemen persist in these attacks, unfounded as they are, we must perforce continue to discuss the matter, which has been properly relegated to the courts.

When the facts as to these leases are all brought out before the courts and given publicity so that the people may know, the public is going to be amazed to learn many vital things which have not been brought out, which, if mentioned at all, have been intentionally pushed to one side as though of no importance, which have been hurried past but which have an important bearing on the question of whether the leases bear within themselves any evidence of fraud; whether they involve a change of national policy, and if so, if that change was justified; whether the leases were authorized and legal, and whether they were reasonable and fair to the Government.

Conclusions have been thrown to the whole country, heralded in vociferous and stentorian tones over the land, and written and distributed in printed articles, whose authors were either vicious or ignorant. These statements and articles in many instances purposely ignored important facts.

It is not my purpose to defend these leases, but I say plainly and without hesitation, because all the facts should be known and intelligent and fair judgment arrived at, that so far as these leases are concerned, the naval oil reserves of the Nation, Nos. 1 and 3, in California and Wyoming, have not been "given away," the country has not "lost them" or the oil in them; there was no "wanton waste of $1,000,000,000 worth of oil"; the public domain has not been "looted"; the people of this country have not been "deprived of the means of national defense"; the Navy is not "without adequate oil for Navy fuel to meet any war emergency"; and would not be, and will not be, if these leases continue in operation; these leases were not, in my judgment, aside from the question of fraud, clearly illegal; and there was not by these leases a change of policy with regard to the naval oil reserve.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WINTER. I stated at the outset that I would not desire to do so. On some other occasion I shall be glad to do so.

If the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle contend otherwise they are denouncing their own party and their own officials, and the gentleman from Texas could not say, as he did on Saturday on the floor of the House, that he "derived some little satisfaction that no responsible figure in the party to which I belong was guilty of crime."

I now challenge the attention of the Members of this body to the following facts and records and squarely put it up to you to consider them fairly as unbiased, intelligent, and unprejudiced representatives of the people, and not from the miserable standpoint of partisan advantage:

Naval reserve No. 2 in California was the first of the three naval reserves to be opened to leases to private persons or corporations, and that was done entirely under the administration of Mr. Wilson and under the then Secretary of the Navy, Daniels, and Payne of the Interior Department. I am not criticizing them for doing it. My position is that they were forced to do it to protect the interests of the Government; it was not only their right but it was their duty to save the Nation from loss of its oil. But I am criticizing those who criticized their successors for doing the same things in the interest of the Navy and the Nation's defense.

On January 16, 1920, John Barton Payne, Wilson's Secretary of the Interior, in charge under our laws of the public lands of the country, submitted to Secretary Daniels copies of leases for the drilling of five new wells on reserve No. 2. Under the exigencies existing theretofore wells on the naval reserve had been authorized and drilled. Daniels approved these new leases for five additional wells August 21, 1920. This was done under authority of the general leasing act of February 25, 1920. This is the fundamental law authorizing the leasing of public oil lands. At that time naval oil reserves were excluded and excepted from that law. It applied, however, to existing wells on naval reserves, and placed them in charge of the Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Daniels requested, which request would have been entirely unnecessary if it were possible to conserve the naval oil in the ground, and authority was given by Congress by act of June 4, 1920, to the Secretary of the Navy to operate such existing wells and additional wells and leases which had been entered into on the naval reserve No. 2, but laid the foundation for and authorized, in my judgment, for it could have no other purpose, a new method of conserving the oil of the naval reserves.

The time had come, and it was absolutely inevitable, when the policy of conserving the naval reserve oil under the ground had to be changed to conserve it upon the ground, and there was no other course open. Private wells were draining the oil out from under this naval reserve No. 2, of which I am now speaking. Daniels realized it. The fact of drainage and loss of naval oil was an inescapable fact as to each of the reserves, not only No. 2 but in their turn No. 1 and No. 3, the Teapot Dome. Of No. 1 and No. 3 I will speak presently, in their order. The fact of drainage of No. 2 was unquestioned. It was stated and seen and recognized. Sixty and four-tenths per cent of the area of reserve No. 2 was then privately owned; 20.5 per cent was placed under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior by the general leasing act of February 25, 1920; 10.1 per cent only came under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy. Manifestly, present or future drainage in increasing quantities was inevitable. Daniels thereupon asked for and received from Congress, because of the absolute necessity in protection of the Government, the following broad powers from Congress. I quote from the act of June 4, 1920:

That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to take possession of all properties within the naval petroleum reserves as are or may become subject to the control and use by the United States for naval purposes * * * to conserve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, or sell the oil and gas products thereof, and those from all royalty oil from lands in the naval reserves, for the benefit of the United States.

In this connection I desire to insert in my remarks the 23 questions asked by the Naval Committee of Secretary Denby and the answers by him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to insert the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understand they are in the Record already.

Mr. WINTER. If so, I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understand it is in the Record.

Mr. WINTER. I inquired of a member, I think, of the committee and it was his opinion that they were not in the Record; therefore I proposed to insert them.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Let the gentleman get to the end of his remarks, and then we can see.

Mr. WINTER. The authority that I referred to, as contained in the act of June 4, 1920, I have quoted above. Now, I call your attention to the exceedingly broad language of that authority in the act of June 4, 1920, that vested the power in the Secretary of the Navy, which was given to him by this House and the body at the opposite end of the Capitol. There may have been a mistake in giving him that broad authority. I do not assert for or against, but I do assert that there can be a fair difference of opinion, in legal minds at least, as to whether that authority did not authorize the Secretary of the Navy to do everything, to enter into each and all of the terms incorporated in the leases to Mr. Doheny and Mr. Sinclair.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. I am afraid my time is about up.

The Chairman. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have not had time to verify that, and I do not think I shall object to the gentleman inserting that in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by including the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINTER. I asked for the general right at the outset. The CHAIRMAN. That will be understood as included in the request, without objection.

Mr. WINTER. The act of June 4, 1920, was an amendment to the original leasing act of February 25, 1920, although not so denominated. Did that act give authority to the Secretary of the Navy to lease the naval reserves? It did. That was its object. Did Daniels proceed to act under it? He did. Did he lease to private corporations naval reserve land No. 2 in California? He did. Fifty-eight wells were thus authorized by him and drilled.

At this point I wish to call attention to the character of the quoted statement of Mr. Daniels in attempting to make the public believe that he had not done that which his successor Denby has done. Note the careful insertion of the right words in the right place so that he would not be making a false statement and yet carry the impression to the public that Denby and Fall had done something which was wrong which he had heroically resisted and refrained from doing when he was Secretary and Payne was in the Department of the Interior. At Philadelphia February 25, 1924, he said:

If the Republican committee has any information that I leased or recommended leasing a single foot of naval reserve oil land when the oil could be retained in the ground, that information is manufactured.

No one stated that he leased land in reserve No. 2 "when the oil could be retained in the ground." Neither did Denby and Fall lease "when the oil could be retained in the ground." The fact is, it could not be retained in the ground, and therefore he leased naval reserve No. 2, the first one on which leases were granted. On August 21, 1920, Daniels informed Payne that the lease to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co., covering the drilling of the five new wells on section 32 of naval petroleum reserve No. 2, was satisfactory to the Navy. This lease called for a royalty to the Government of 25 per cent. On January 25, 1921, Payne stated his willingness to lease 120 acres in the eastern part of section 28 of naval oil reserve No. 2 to the Consolidated Mutual Oil Co., without restriction on the number of wells. This tract was so leased just prior to the going out of the last Democratic administration at a graduated royalty of from 12½ to 25 per cent.

And so, as the drilling of private wells on an adjacent ground made it necessary, this policy of leasing to preserve the Government interest was continued and necessarily enlarged. Now, let it be recognized and admitted once and for all that the policy of leasing naval reserves out of necessity began and was accomplished under Wilson, Daniels, and Payne, as to practically all of naval reserve No. 2.

Then came similar conditions to be met on reserve No. 1. The Government interests required that all of the Government area of naval reserve No. 1 be leased for the same reasons, and of necessity and further for the sake of efficiency, for saving, for the accomplishment of development on a systematic, businesslike basis, and to accomplish the proper storage policy which would be most beneficial to the Navy, and to place fuel oil ready for use by the Navy at strategic points to remain in storage permanently until necessary for emergency war use, the lease was let to Mr. Doheny on naval reserve No. 1. At this time not Daniels and Payne but Denby and Fall occupied the offices at the head of the Navy and Interior Departments, respectively. In naval reserve No. 1, 15½ per cent of the total acreage was owned by private parties, who were drilling and taking out the oil. At no point in this structure was there a greater distance than 2 miles between Government area and privately owned area on which wells were drilling or would be drilled in the immediate present. The royalty provision was 12½ to 35 per cent, a higher royalty than on No. 2.

Coming now to naval reserve No. 3, known as the Teapot Dome, located in my district, the State of Wyoming, and within 35 miles from the city of Casper, my residence. Of the situation here as to this reserve, I do not claim to know all. I do not claim to know more or as much as some other men, but I do know many facts which have been ignored or overlooked with reference to this matter. No amount of quibbling or fine-haired theory can change the fact that Teapot Dome was being drained and had been in the process of draining for some time into and through private wells in Salt Creek field immediately adjoining it on the northwest. When the Teapot field came to be actually drilled and the sand penetrated by wells, it was found that contrary to all expectations there was no oil in the first Wall Creek sand which was productive in the contiguous Salt Creek field. The Salt Creek field is the big end, the sole of the oil structure of which the Teapot is a small heel. Nothing was found in this first sand of the Teapot except gas in the south end thereof; and the producing area of the second sand, exceedingly prolific and productive in the Salt Creek field, was disappointingly less than had been anticipated by all operators and experts and Government officials. Its producing power had been diminished from an expected capacity per well of 300 to 500 barrels per well per day to an average proven during the past year of operation of 70 barrels per well per day. Instead of a content of 135,000,000 barrels estimated by all, it was found after drilling had given the necessary data of the thickness of the sand, its porosity and the location of the water line in the sand around the field, that its content is but 26,000,000 barrels. The expert geologists employed by the Government reported that drainage was taking place, though one of the two, I believe, testified that in his opinion the drainage might cease after 4,000,000 barrels had been lost. Other geologists estimated that had no lease been given 70 per cent of the oil would have been drawn out and lost to the Government.

And so that under these conditions it would have been almost criminal carelessness in the Secretary of the Interior on which in after years he would have been denounced, if he had not leased the Teapot Dome, nor would the fact of the presence of Government leased wells across the line on the Salt Creek field which were bringing a royalty to the Government, have justified a failure to lease. For there were also patented lands and State lands in Salt Creek drawing off enormous amounts of oil which paid no royalty to the Government. The evidence of drainage by private wells adjoining was so strong that it was the duty of the Secretary to thus conserve and save to the Government this oil by a proper royalty lease. Indeed it is a fair question against Secretary Daniels and Secretary Payne whether they are not responsible by the failure to lease during their term for the loss of the difference between 26,000,000 barrels that it did contain and the 135,000,000 barrels which the field by all indications and opinions ought to have contained in the first and second Wall Creek sands and upon test did not contain when the experts finally determined its content under the Sinclair lease. Salt Creek field had been producing for several years when the Teapot lease was made and, under the general leasing bill of February 25, 1920, from wells in southeastern Salt Creek in very close proximity to the Teapot line, by reason of sales of leases in Salt Creek by the Government in June, 1921, under plans made by Daniels and Payne in the Wilson administration. Thus went on without attention or safeguarding of the Government interests the drainage of the Teapot Dome until the negotiations were begun promptly upon the coming in of the Republican administration in March, 1921, although not concluded until April, 1922.

The necessity of leasing the Teapot Dome being determined, what was then the situation? Notwithstanding the act of June 4, 1920, giving the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction and power to operate or lease the structure, the fact is—an important, vital fact which has been practically ignored throughout this entire matter in the public print and discussion—the 9,000 acres of this structure within the surrounding walls known as the escarpment were practically all covered by private mining claims located under laws of the United States and the State of Wyoming and recorded prior to the withdrawal of said area as a naval reserve. The figures, as I recall them, show but 440 acres remained open subject to the jurisdiction of the Secretary under the act.

The Supreme Court of the United States has determined by many decisions that a mining claim is property in every sense of the term. It is a vested interest, which can be bought, sold, equated, and inherited. Moreover, under the law the possessor of a mining claim located in conformity with the laws may extract the mineral, including oil and gas, without asking for or receiving patent from the United States. No power can dispossess such mining-claim occupant except by due process of law, by proceedings in court in which the individual citizen claimant or his grantees or heirs shall have his day in court to maintain the validity of his claim and his rights. It has been asserted that these mining claims were "paper locations," lacking a discovery as required by the law, and therefore invalid. However that may be as to the facts, it remains true that some competent authority must declare such claims invalid and some court must issue the writ by which the claimant can be ejected and possession returned to the Government or to such other claimant as may have proven his right thereto.

In deciding the case known as the Cameron case, involving a mining claim on the rim of the Grand Canyon at the Bright Angel Trail, the Supreme Court of the United States finally determined the manner and method of such a judgment and dispossession. The Secretary of the Interior has jurisdiction over all the open unappropriated public lands of the United States. He is the sole judge and court of last resort as to whether an applicant for patent is entitled to a patent, so far as the facts are concerned. In my judgment, while the decisions of the Secretary of the Interior are final and not reviewable as to the facts, yet as to the law every claimant is entitled to have a court determine whether the Secretary of the Interior has properly construed and applied the law. The procedure affirmed as the correct one for the Government regaining possession of a mining claim is that the Secretary of the Interior must serve upon the claimant occupant of the mining claim thought by the Secretary to be invalid a notice to appear at a hearing; such hearing must be held and the evidence taken and a decision rendered on such evidence by the Secretary that the claim is invalid. Then, there being no law giving the Secretary of the Interior authority to enforce his decisions, such judgment must be transferred to the legal arm of the Government, the Department of Justice, and an ejectment action brought by that department in the court where the claim is located. Upon a judgment there a writ of ejectment will be issued, and thus, through an officer empowered by such a writ, the claimant may be forcibly, if necessary, removed from the premises.

In addition to the presence of mining claims of record on practically all of the Teapot structure, four of such claims of 160 acres each, situated in the center of the Teapot field, were before the Secretary of the Interior asking for patent. The undisputed evidence as to these four claims was that wells had been drilled to the depth of several hundred feet to the Shannon sand and that oil had been disclosed thereby and therein to an amount of from 5 to 10 barrels per day production. These claims, in my judgment, having been located in accordance with law and the wells drilled and the oil disclosed, constituting in my opinion a legal discovery as required by the mining law, prior to the withdrawal by the Government in 1915 of the Teapot field, were entitled to patent.

This was the situation confronting Secretaries Denby and Fall, and perhaps it may now be realized, in addition to the right of the Department of the Navy to make use of the Department of the Interior as another agency of the Government to administer work under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Navy, there was the further fact that until cleared by due process in the courts of the mining claims Secretary Fall and not Secretary Denby had jurisdiction over the Teapot structure. Meanwhile drainage of the oil was proceeding. The legal process of clearing the land of the mining claims as outlined above would have taken time and in the end some of said claims might have been proven valid, in which case the entire area could never have been cleared so as to bring the entire area fully under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy or as public land under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. Moreover, the claims entitled to patent would have proceeded to extract oil from 640 acres in the center of the dome.

Hence, in the contemplation of and negotiations for a lease, it was necessary and it was required of any prospective lessee to first purchase all of said mining claims and return them to the Government by quitclaim deed in order that the Government might be in a position to make a lease or to operate the field itself. This was done. According to the evidence, Mr. Sinclair paid in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 for those mining claims and delivered to the Government quitclaim deeds for all of them. At this time and in this connection I call attention to the case of Taylor and others versus Sinclair and the Mammoth Oil Co., involving the southeast quarter of section 20, R. 38, T. 78, which it is of passing interest to note, proved to be, although in the extreme north end, and unexpectedly to all, the most valuable quarter section, the greatest producer of oil of any quarter section of the entire Teapot field. This is the quarter section from which the occupants, the Mutual Oil Co., drilling thereon under a contract from the owners, Taylor and others, were driven by the United States marines, sent out by the Navy Department. This was done, as the evidence showed, at the direction of Mr. Fall. Taylor and others held the quarter section by purchase and deed executed and delivered two years prior to the time when Mr. Sinclair went to the same grantors and secured a second deed, on which alleged title he quitclaimed said quarter section back to the Government. The Taylor deed had been on record giving notice to the world of his prior title to the title of Sinclair. But whatever the condition and legal rights as between the Taylor and Sinclair title, in my judgment, it is perfectly clear that the United States Government itself, through any of its departments or agents, could not, without violation of constitutional rights, forcibly eject the Taylor occupants. It was therefore a mistake and the exercise of unlawful power at the direction of Mr. Fall.

As stated, with the exception of the above quarter section, the titles of all of the Teapot area were quitclaimed back to the Government. Then for the first time, and thus by the only possible means, the Government was in a position to grant a lease on the Teapot to anyone. This procedure required the interposition of the Secretary of the Interior. And thus perhaps we can realize the propriety of—the occasion for—though unwarranted in law, the order of President Harding making the Secretary of the Interior a coadministrator with the Secretary of the Navy and a cocontractor or lessor with the Secretary of the Navy in the lease and contract on behalf of the Government.

The lease was made, both Secretaries signing, the legal right to do so probably residing in the Secretary of the Navy, under the act of June 4, 1920. The terms of that contract and lease required the payment to the Government without a dollar of expenditure of a graduated royalty of from 12½ per cent on wells averaging 50 barrels' production a day up to 50 per cent on wells averaging 1,000 or more production per day. Without argument, I assert that any private individual owning the Teapot field would have been glad to have made a lease bringing him in such amounts of royalty. No independent, intelligent, honest operator or owner of oil land familiar with the oil business will assert that these royalty terms were not fair and good terms to the United States. The lease and contract further required Mr. Sinclair to build a large pipe line a distance of 715 miles from the Teapot field to Freeland, Mo., where connection was made with the through oil trunk lines running east to the center of population and great refining facilities. This line was constructed at the stated cost of from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000. It was completed three weeks ago, and was built and finished prior to the time called for in the contract. Further, under the contract and lease, this line had to give precedence to Government royalty oil both from the Teapot and from the great adjacent Salt Creek field, from which the Government is drawing as royalty 25,000 barrels per day.

As a result of this pipe line the Government was able to secure and did secure at public auction for its royalty Salt Creek and Teapot oil the Mid-Continent price, which, after deducting 18 cents per barrel, the cost of transporting the royalty oil through the pipe line, was 41 cents per barrel more than the posted or field price of Salt Creek oil; whereby the Government has profited by this time by several millions of dollars more than it would have received for its royalty oil.

On May 13, 1922, F. B. Tough, supervisor oil and gas operation, United States Bureau of Mines, issued the following statement:

SOME FACTS ON GOVERNMENT NAVAL RESERVE CONTRACTS.

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding relative to contracts recently made by the Government for its royalty crude oil from naval petroleum reserves Nos. 1 and 2, in California, and especially the Teapot reserve No. 3, in Wyoming. The facts relative to these contracts are as follows:

The act of Congress approved June 4, 1920, directed the Secretary of the Navy to conserve, develop, use, and operate directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise unappropriated lands in the naval reserves.

By presidential proclamation the administration and conservation of all oil and gas-bearing lands in naval petroleum reserves Nos. 1 and 2, in California, and No. 3, in Wyoming, and naval shale reserves in Colorado and Utah were committed to the Secretary of the Interior subject to the supervision of the President. This proclamation stipulated that no general policy as to drilling and reserving lands located in naval reserves should be changed or adopted except upon consultation and in cooperation with the Secretary or Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The present policy of the Navy Department is to trade its crude oil for steel storage facilities filled with fuel oil and situated as specified by the Navy. Since the loss of fuel oil by evaporation is only about one-tenth of 1 per cent a year and probably less than this after a few years in storage, such a policy is entirely practicable. Thus, the reserve of naval petroleum is to be taken from the sands, processed, and placed in steel storage without cash outlay by the Government.

After a year's study and investigation, the Secretary of the Interior, in cooperation with the Navy Department, developed plans for this transaction that were satisfactory to the Navy. Not less than four prominent oil companies were consulted and given an opportunity to make offers to the Government for handling these contracts. In Teapot (reserve No. 3) there were old mining claims which were given consideration, just as has been the policy of the Government in the California naval reserves and under the leasing act of February 25, 1920. It so happened that the Teapot contract was signed in the early part of April, 1922, and the California contract was not concluded until the latter part of the same month. As the Interior and Navy Departments wished to announce these two contracts simultaneously, the Teapot contract was not made public until a little more than two weeks after it had been signed. When rumors of the Teapot contract commenced to circulate and were neither confirmed nor denied by department officials, many conjectures were made as to the reasons for secrecy. The only reason for the temporary secrecy relative to the Teapot contract was the desire for simultaneous announcement of the two contracts, as stated. This is borne out by the fact that both contracts were announced immediately upon the completion of the second.

In conclusion, I wish to call attention to a couple of features of the Teapot contract in which the people of Wyoming are particularly interested:

First. If the Teapot structure proves to be reasonably productive, a pipe line connecting it with trunk lines of Mid-Continent will be built, thus putting the oil industry of the State in direct contact with the large centers of petroleum consumption. Of course, some of us might wish to see all the crude oil from Wyoming refined within its boundaries, just as we might like to see its wool woven into cloth within the State and its cattle slaughtered here, its hides tanned here and here made into shoes, but the economic structure of our Nation is not constructed along these lines. It has been found expedient in most industries to transport raw material to centers of consumption, where it is manufactured and whence the manufactured products can be economically distributed. In no industry is this advantage greater than in the petroleum industry, as crude oil lends itself so readily to comparatively cheap transportation in pipe lines.

Second. This contract makes the pipe line to the Mid-Continent a common carrier and provides that the Government royalty oil from Teapot will be purchased at Mid-Continent prices, or the Salt Creek price in case that price should be higher than Mid-Continent price, and that any Government oil shall have a prior right through this line, being given preference even to the oil produced by the owners of the pipe line. It further provides that Government royalty oil from Salt Creek will be transported at reasonable rates through this line. Of course, the Government has the right to dispose of its royalty crude in any other manner if it so desires.

It is conservatively estimated that had this contract been in operation for the 16 months from January 1, 1921, to May 1, 1922, the total Government royalty from Salt Creek would have amounted to $3,327,000 instead of $2,331,000, an increase of nearly a million dollars over and above the amount actually received. This means that the State of Wyoming would have received $374,000 more than it did, that the Reclamation Service would have received $523,000 more, and the Federal Government $99,000 more. These figures do not include any estimate for additional production expected from Teapot.

The oil resources of Wyoming could hardly be put to more profitable use than the construction and maintenance of roads, educational institutions, and reclamation projects, thus developing a permanent and increasing source of wealth that will support a thriving Commonwealth long after its oil industry has passed into history.

By this contract the Secretary of the Interior has taken the most important step toward realizing Mid-Continent prices for Wyoming crude oil that has yet been made.

F. B. TOUGH,
Supervisor Oil and Gas Operations,
United States Bureau of Mines.

The prophecies made in the above communication are more than justified, as appears from the following article for publication in the Inland Oil Index, published at Casper, Wyo., and which article further shows the opinion of those on the ground and best informed as to the benefits to the Government and the people and producers generally in enhanced prices paid for oil in the Teapot and Salt Creek fields, including the Government royalty oil, by reason of the pipe-line requirement in the Sinclair lease and contract:

According to figures just issued by the Bureau of Mines, the Government received during the calendar year 1923 for the Government royalty oil from the Salt Creek, Wyo., district, under the contract made by the Secretary of the Interior in October, 1922, $3,000,000 more than it would have received under the former contract, which was in force up to the time the new contract took effect, January 1, 1923.

In 1920 Secretary of the Interior John Barton Payne made a contract with the United States Shipping Board under which that corporation purchased the Government royalty oil from the Salt Creek district. Under this contract the Shipping Board paid the Interior Department the current or, as it is called, the posted price for Salt Creek oil. The Shipping Board could not utilize the Salt Creek oil for their purposes, first, because the Salt Creek oil is not a fuel oil, and, second, if it were a fuel oil the cost of transportation to the seaboard would be prohibitive. What the Shipping Board did was to make a contract with the Mid-West Oil Co. under which they exchanged the Salt Creek royalty oil for fuel oils for their ships when and where needed. The Shipping Board made a very good thing out of this exchange contract, and the Government received the same price for its oil at Salt Creek that other people were obtaining.

In the summer of 1922 the Secretary of the Interior, Albert B. Fall, demanded from the United States Shipping Board an increased price for the royalty oil if the Government was to continue its contract with that corporation, but the Shipping Board declined to pay the increase demanded, and therefore in October, 1922, the Secretary of the Interior advertised for bids for the Salt Creek Government royalty oil. The highest and best bid offered was that of the Mammoth Oil Co., which agreed to pay for the Government Salt Creek royalty oil the Mid-Continent price for the same oil. It will be remembered that earlier in the year the Mammoth Oil Co. had made a contract under which it agreed to pay the Mid-Continent price for the royalty oil from the Teapot Dome naval reserve, so that the price offered for the Salt Creek royalty oil was the same as that which the Mammoth was paying for the Teapot Dome royalties.

At the time this contract was let the posted price for Salt Creek oil was about 60 cents a barrel less than the price for oil of the same grade in the Mid-Continent field, so that the new contract boosted the value of the Government Salt Creek royalty oil by that amount.

The Government royalty oil from the Salt Creek field amounted to 6,517,368.60 barrels in the calendar year 1923, the first year of the new contract, and for that year, which ended December 31, 1923, the Government received under the new contract $3,003,709.74 more than it would have received under the old contract. In fact, the Government received that amount more for its Salt Creek royalty oil than a private operator would have received for the same amount of oil, because the operators received the posted Salt Creek price, whereas the Government received from 40 cents to 58 cents a barrel more than that price. Or, to put it in another way, the Mammoth Oil Co. in 1923 paid the Government for Salt Creek oil over $3,000,000 more than it would have paid for the same amount of oil purchased from private producers.

The Government oil royalties are divided as follows: 10 per cent to the Treasury of the United States to meet the cost of administration; 37½ per cent to the State in which the oil is produced, in lieu of taxes; and 52½ per cent to the national reclamation fund. So that in this case the beneficiaries from the royalty oils received the following increases during the calendar year 1923: The United States Treasury, $300,370.97; the State of Wyoming, $1,126,391.16; and the National Reclamation Fund, $1,576,947.61.

The following table, prepared by the Bureau of Mines, shows the increased returns to the Government under the new contract:

Excess revenue for year							$3,003,709.74

Not only has the contract brought additional millions to the Government beneficiaries under the leasing act but it seems to have had a very marked effect on the value of all Salt Creek oil. For instance, reference to the table will show that for the month of January, 1923 (the first month under the new contract), the average differential against Salt Creek oil as compared with Mid-Continent was 58 cents a barrel, and the Government, receiving the Mid-Continent price, therefore received an average of 58 cents a barrel for all its royalty oil above the Salt Creek posted price, but from that time on the differential steadily declined until for the month of December the difference between the posted price of the Salt Creek and Mid-Continent oil was only 40 cents per barrel. In other words, the difference in price between the Salt Creek and the Mid-Continent oil of the same grade, which in January averaged 58 cents, in December was only 40 cents, an increase in the value of Salt Creek oil, compared with Mid-Continent oil, of 18 cents a barrel.

For the entire year the average increase in value of Salt Creek as compared with Mid-Continent oil was 12 cents a barrel. The Salt Creek field produced over 35,000,000 barrels of oil in 1923. At 12 cents a barrel this amounts to $4,200,000, representing the increased value of Salt Creek oil produced during the year 1923, due to the reduction of the differential between Salt Creek and Mid-Continent, which was 58 cents at the beginning and 40 cents at the end of the year. Just how much this increase in Salt Creek values, this narrowing of differential, is due to the new contract for the Government Salt Creek royalty oil and to the Teapot Dome contract, both of which provide for the payment of the Mid-Continent price for the royalties is, of course, a matter of opinion, but that these contracts thus increasing the price paid for a considerable portion of the oil from these fields had a very powerful effect in reducing the differential between the Wyoming and Mid-Continent oil, and consequently increasing the value of Wyoming oil, there can be no question.

The increased sums which the National Treasury, the Reclamation Service, and the State of Wyoming received by reason of the Fall contracts are, of course, clear and definite, and can not be challenged or questioned. They amount to $3,003,709.74. Furthermore, until some one brings forward a better reason for the rise in the value of the oil from these Wyoming fields compared with that of the Mid-Continent field, there is reasonable ground for the claim that the increased price paid for these royalty oils enhanced the value of the other oil of the fields during the year 1923 in the sum of $4,200,000, all of which went to producers.

I therefore maintain that these were fair, reasonable, and good contracts for the Government and that it was necessary to make these or similar contracts and leases with some one in order to carry out the Government's policy of preserving oil in its public lands within oil naval reserves for the future use of the Navy; that the method of preservation in the ground had ceased to be possible, and preservation on the surface became the only other alternative; that this being the alternative it was a wise provision of the leases to build permanent storage tanks at such points as were designated by the Navy officers as the best and most strategic locations for fuel oil, and that the exchange feature in the leases were wise and beneficial for the reason that the Teapot oil is a paraffin-base oil with a large gasoline, kerosene, and wax content impossible to be used and unprofitable to refine for use for fuel oil in our ships. I further contend that even had it been possible to have retained this oil in the ground that it never could have been extracted or refined or exchanged, 2,000 miles from the Atlantic and a thousand miles from the Pacific, for proper fuel oil in time to meet a war emergency after it was upon us.

For all of the above reasons I submit to you as fair-minded, intelligent, unprejudiced, nonpartisan judges whether there is at least not enough honest difference of opinion and closeness of question of law and fact to merit a calm and fair consideration instead of being met with the blasts of partisan prejudices and charges.

INFORMATION FURNISHED THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY UNDER HOUSE RESOLUTION 204, MARCH 7, 1924.

"Question No. 1. Is it a fact that the then Secretary of the Navy, the Hon. Josephus Daniels, sent similar letters to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, dated, respectively, March 29, 1920, and March 5, 1920, stating:

"(a) It therefore becomes imperative when viewed from an economical standpoint only that machinery be provided whereby wells may be drilled for protection against drainage from adjacent lands, or to supply oil for the Government's needs.

"(b) And that excess oil from protective wells may be sold or storage provided for excess oil if considered advisable."

Answer. Yes.

Copies of these letters dated, respectively, March 29, 1920, and March 5, 1920, are inclosed herewith. The letter dated March 5, 1920, to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs may be found on pages 3119 and 3120 of the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, appropriation bill subjects, 1920, volume 2.

"Question No. 2. Is it a fact that in the above-referred-to letters dated March 5, 1920, and March 29, 1920, Secretary Daniels suggested legislation as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to take possession of all properties within the naval petroleum reserves as are or may become vested in the United States; to conserve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, refine, sell, or otherwise dispose of the oil and gas products thereof, and those from all royalty oil for the benefit of the United States."

Answer. Yes; this language is a verbatim quotation.

"Question No. 3. Is it a fact that language practically as suggested by these two letters was enacted into law on June 4, 1920?"

Answer. Yes.

The language of that part of the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 813, 814, ch. 228), referring to naval petroleum reserves reads as follows:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to take possession of all properties within the naval petroleum reserves as are or may become subject to the control and use by the United States for naval purposes, and on which there are no pending claims or applications for permits or leases under the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, entitled 'An act to provide for the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain,' or pending applications for United States patent under any law; to conserve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, or sell the oil and gas products thereof, and those from all royalty oil from lands in the naval reserves, for the benefit of the United States: And provided further, That the rights of any claimant under said act of February 25, 1920, are not affected adversely thereby: And provided further, That such sums as have been or may be turned into the Treasury of the United States from royalties on lands within the naval petroleum reserves prior to July 1, 1921, not to exceed $500,000, are hereby made available for this purpose until July 1, 1922: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be reimbursed from the proper appropriations on account of the oil and gas products from said properties used by the United States at such rate, not in excess of the market value of the oil, as the Secretary of the Navy may direct."

"Question No. 4. Is it a fact that had it been the policy of Secretary Daniels at the time these letters were written to retain the oil in the naval petroleum reserves in the ground no legislation of this character was necessary?"

Answer. It is obvious from the language of the act that no legislation was necessary in order that the oil might be retained in the ground. The retention of oil in the ground is nowhere referred to in this act.

"Question No. 5. Is it a fact that Secretary Daniels approved the leasing without public advertisement by the Hon. John Barton Payne, then Secretary of the Interior, and drilling of new wells on naval oil reserves?"

Answer. Yes. Under date of August 21, 1920, the then Secretary of the Navy informed the then Secretary of the Interior that the lease to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. covering the drilling of five new wells on section 32 of naval petroleum reserve No. 2 was satisfactory to the Navy Department. The correspondence shows that the terms of this lease were agreed upon in conference between the representatives of the oil company and of the Navy Department, and that such new drilling was considered necessary because of drainage by owners of contiguous territory. The royalty accruing to the Government under this lease was 25 per cent. Under the so-called Doheny lease of December 11, 1922, the royalty runs from 12½ to 35 per cent, and the actual net royalty received has amounted to 27.14 per cent.

There are inclosed herewith photostatic copies of letter from the then Secretary of the Interior to the then Secretary of the Navy, dated August 16, 1920; letter from the then Secretary of the Navy to the then Secretary of the Interior, dated August 21, 1920; letter from the then Secretary of the Interior to the then President of the United States, dated December 6, 1920; and the lease to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co., covering the drilling of the five new wells.

Under date of January 25, 1921, the then Secretary of the Navy indicated to the then Secretary of the Interior his willingness to lease 120 acres in the eastern part of section 28 of naval oil reserve No. 2 to the Consolidated Mutual Oil Co., and this land was leased without restriction to the number of wells that might be drilled. The correspondence shows that the reason for the leasing of this land was because of water conditions. The Government royalty provided under this lease was from 12½ per cent to 25 per cent, while the royalty provided by the so-called Doheny lease of December 11, 1922, on naval oil reserve No. 1 is from 12½ per cent to 35 per cent, and the actual net royalty so far received is 27.14 per cent.

There are forwarded herewith photostatic copies of letter of February 8, 1921, from the then Secretary of the Interior to the then President of the United States; letter dated February 16, 1921, from the then Secretary of the Interior to the President of the United States; and copy of lease of the 120 acres of land to the Consolidated Mutual Oil Co.

INTERDEPARTMENT ACCOUNTS.

"Question No. 6. Is it a fact that it has been the practice for many years for one executive department to perform services for another executive department, and that this practice has been recognized by the Congress in the act of May 21, 1920, providing that the funds of one department for which the services are performed may be placed subject to the requisition of the department performing the service?"

Answer. Yes. The Navy Department has for many years performed services for practically all other Government departments and independent offices, and for both Houses of the Congress. It has built and repaired water craft for the Lighthouse Service, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Army Engineers. It has docked and repaired water craft for the War Department, Shipping Board, Coast Guard, Bureau of Fisheries, and the Interior Department. The Ordnance Department of the Navy constantly performs services for the Army, as the Ordnance Department of the Army performs similar services for the Navy. As an example of the magnitude of such services, in the year 1912 there was expended by the Navy Department on services performed for other Government departments $344,438.30, and in the year 1922 there was transferred by the Navy Department to other departments $1,952,557.38 for supplies and services furnished by such other departments. These figures represent only transfers through the Treasury Department and do not cover by any means all transactions of this character, for payment is oftentimes made by check for services performed by or for other departments.

The act of May 21, 1920, provides:

"That whenever any Government bureau or department procures by purchase or manufacture stores of any kind, or performs any service for another bureau or department, the funds of the bureau or department for which stores or materials are to be procured or the services performed may be placed subject to the requisition of the bureau or department making the procurement or performing the service for direct expenditure."

"Question No. 7. Is it a fact that at the time the 'administration and conservation' of the naval oil reserves were transferred to the Interior Department, that department had under lease or permit over 3,500,000 acres of public oil land, and has now under lease or permit over 17,500,000 acres of such land, while the total acreage of the naval oil reserves being operated is less than 52,000 acres?"

Answer. Yes.

These figures are in accordance with the records of the Interior Department.

"Question No. 8. Is it a fact that proposals from three companies were entertained for leasing the Teapot Dome reserve and that five companies were asked to bid on royalty oil from the California naval reserve?"

Answer (a). The Texas Oil Co. submitted a proposal to lease the Teapot Dome oil reserve (see testimony of Mr. Amos L. Beaty, president of the Texas Co., pages 753 et seq. of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys).

Mr. Doheny had an opportunity to bid (see page 1944 of hearings above referred to).

Mr. Harry F. Sinclair was also invited to bid and submit a bid, which was accepted.

(b) Five companies were invited to bid on the royalty from naval petroleum reserve No. 1, namely: Standard Oil Co. of California, the Associated Oil Co., Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., the General Petroleum Co., and the Pacific Oil Co. Three of these five companies submitted bids; namely, the Standard Oil Co., the Associated Oil Co., and the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co. The bids of these three companies are on file in the Interior Department.

"Question No. 9. Is it a fact that the Government received over $3,000,000 premium on its royalty oil from the Salt Creek district in 1923 as a result of the competition promoted by the leasing of Teapot Dome naval reserve?"

Answer. Yes.

The records of the Department of the Interior show definitely that the excess so far received by the Government from its royalty oil in the Salt Creek district amounts to $3,003,709.74.

"Question No. 10. Is it a fact that under its contract for the leasing of Teapot Dome naval reserve the Navy received for the calendar year 1923 41 cents more per barrel for its royalty oil than the selling price of all other producers in that district?"

Answer. Yes.

Under its contract with the Mammoth Oil Co. the Navy received for its royalty oil mid-continental prices. Actual receipts were higher by 41 cents per barrel than the selling price of other producers in the Salt Creek district. Actual receipts were as shown on page 1982 of the hearings before the Senate investigating committee.

"Question No. 11. Is it a fact that had the production from the Teapot Dome naval reserve reached even the minimum of production anticipated, the amount received by the Government on its royalty oil above the daily market price would have been more than $16,000,000 and would have exceeded by many millions of dollars all of the cash bonuses ever received from the sale of Government leases in the entire Salt Creek fields?"

Answer. Yes.

At the time the Teapot Dome lease was executed it was conservatively estimated that the recoverable content from naval petroleum reserve No. 3 would be not less than 135,000,000 barrels. Had the wells been of the size anticipated, the Navy would probably have received, under the terms of the lease, not less than 30 per cent royalty, which would have made the total royalty accruing to the Navy over 40,000,000 barrels of oil, which, at 41 cents, would have exceeded a sum of $15,000,000 accruing to the Navy as an offset to any bonuses which might have been demanded in the making of this contract.

The records of the Department of the Interior show that the total amount received as bonuses from leases in the entire Salt Creek field is $1,687,000, obviously many millions less than $16,000,000.

"Question No. 12. Is it a fact that on the minimum production now anticipated, the sum that will be received from the Teapot Dome naval reserve above the daily market price will exceed the cash bonuses received by the Government from the sale of all Salt Creek leases?"

Answer. Yes.

The Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys has repeatedly used the figure of 25,000,000 barrels as the amount of oil that may ultimately be recovered from the Teapot Dome naval petroleum reserve. The average royalty actually received to date has been about 17 per cent. On this basis, the Government can expect an ultimate royalty of 4,250,000 barrels. Applying the premium of 41 cents per barrel actually received to date, the excess amount the Government would receive will be $1,742,500, which exceeds the $1,687,000 total bonus thus far received from the Salt Creek district.

"Question No. 13. Is it a fact that royalties fixed in the Teapot Dome naval reserve lease exceed the ruling royalties for wells of the same size on other Government leases in the same district?"

Answer. The royalties fixed in the Teapot Dome naval reserve are on what is known as the sliding-scale basis; that is to say, the royalty rate increases if wells of large production are obtained. If the wells are small a less royalty is paid. Had the average production of wells in Teapot Dome been as anticipated at the time the reserve was leased, royalties accruing to the Government under the terms of that lease would have been higher than the ordinary Government rate in the Salt Creek district, and the Teapot Dome royalty was obtained on territory a large part of which was unproven.

"Question No. 14. Is it a fact that the Navy received a large bonus for the lease in the California reservation in the form of high royalties, free storage for its royalty oil, free pipe-line transportation, advance supply of fuel oil in storage, option to purchase at a discount all petroleum products, construction of storage facilities without profit, etc.?"

Answer. Yes.

The contracts made with the Pan-American Petroleum & Transport Co. provide:

- "1. Build and deliver to the Government storage facilities in Hawaii for 4,200,000 barrels of fuel oil and other petroleum products at cost, without profit to the company.
- "2. Royalties of from 12½ to 35 per cent as compared with 12½ to 25 per cent under the leasing act on other Government lands in that district.
- "3. That the royalty oil be accepted in the field, the company bearing all transportation charges to refinery.
- "4. The maintenance in storage on the west coast of 1,000,000 barrels of fuel oil belonging to the company for issue to the Navy at cost.
- "5. The supplying to the Navy of fuel oil and other products at 10 per cent less than the market price at the time of delivery.
- "6. The maintenance at various points on the Atlantic seaboard, upon demand of the Navy, of 3,000,000 barrels of fuel oil belonging to the company available for issue to the Navy."

These considerations greatly exceed any cash bonus which might have been obtained at that time or could be reasonably expected in the future.

These contracts may be found in the printed hearings of the Senate committee on pages 296-298, inclusive, 356-361, inclusive, and 413-416, inclusive.

"Question No. 15. Is it a fact that the average royalties so far accruing under the contract and lease of the Pan-American Petroleum & Transport Co. on naval oil reserve No. 1, in California, amount to 28.50 per cent as compared to 18.14 per cent received under the leases in reserve No. 2, where the royalties were established in accordance with the general leasing act passed by the Congress?"

Answer. The actual figures up to December 1, 1923, show that the Navy has actually received as royalties under its contract of December 11, 1922, with the Doherty Co. 27.14 per cent, nearly 50 per cent greater than the Navy royalties on reserve No. 2, where the leases were made in accordance with the leasing act of February 25, 1920, which only average 18.4 per cent.

"Question No. 16. Is it a fact that the leases and contracts on naval oil reserves Nos. 1, 2, and 3 with the Mammoth Oil Co. and the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co. provide that oil shall remain in the ground in these reserves in the only large areas under naval jurisdiction not subject to drainage?"

Answer. Yes.

The contracts with the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co. specifically exempt from drilling, except by the consent of the Government, nearly all of reserve No. 1 lying to the westward of the range line between ranges 23 and 24. This restriction was included in the contract in the belief that this area was less subject to immediate drainage than the other portions of the reserve. However, it was further provided in the contract that should at any moment this body of oil-bearing land become subject to immediate drainage, such defensive drilling as the Government might direct would be taken immediately and effectively. This area—that is, the western half of naval reserve No. 1—was the only area lying within naval petroleum reserves Nos. 1, 2, and 3 believed not to require immediate drilling to protect the Government's interests.

"Question No. 17. Is it a fact that in May, 1922, before any development work was undertaken under the contracts with either the Mammoth Oil Co. or the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., Secretary Denby informed a committee of the Senate that such leases had been made and of the transfer of the administration and conservation of the naval oil reserves to the Department of the Interior, and of the storage tanks to be built, so that the Congress had full authority to impose any restrictions or regulations desired before any work was undertaken under these contracts?"

Answer. Yes.

At a hearing held before the Subcommittee on Appropriations of the United States Senate on May 4, 1922, within a month after the first leases and agreements with the Mammoth Oil Co. and with the Pan-American Petroleum & Transport Co. and long before the Pan American Co.'s lease dated December 11, 1922, in reply to questions by various members of the committee, Secretary Denby stated:

"Now we are planning to get the war reserve oil above ground because we can not keep it below ground.

"The oil was being drained off.

"The contractors build the tanks at points designated by the department—points along the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast, and in Hawaii.

"The tanks are not yet built.

"The tanks are to be built out of the royalty to be paid to the Government. They are a part of the contract."

This is a matter that the Department of the Interior would know about very much better than we, but as soon as it was discovered (referring to loss of oil by drainage)—

"that such was the situation I asked the Secretary of the Interior if he would undertake to handle it for the Navy thereafter and we went to the President and secured the Executive order transferring the naval oil reserves to the Secretary of the Interior to administer in trust for the Navy, the Secretary of the Navy being a party to the policies but not to the actual administrative work. For instance, I signed the Teapot Dome lease agreeing that it should be opened, because we discovered that that also was being drained off."

The entire hearings from which the above quotations are taken may be found on pages 180-188 of hearing in the House and Senate, naval appropriation bill, 1923, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, March-June, 1922.

No construction work had been begun at the time of this hearing.

"Question No. 18. Is it a fact that by the leasing act of February 25, 1920, the Department of the Interior is charged with the leasing and administration of all then existing producing wells on naval oil reserves?"

Answer. Yes.

Under section 18 of the leasing act of February 25, 1920, it is provided that producing wells on naval petroleum reserves shall be leased by the Secretary of the Interior.

"Question No. 19. Is it a fact that there is now actually in the ground more oil in the naval petroleum reserves than there would have been had the leases above referred to not been negotiated?"

Answer. The naval oil reserves being under lease to competent oil producers capable of drilling wells on short notice and of effectively operating wells so drilled, it has been possible to negotiate agreements with neighbors on privately owned land whereby producing wells could be closed on account of like action by Government lessees. Through agreements of this kind it was possible to close in 43 wells on Government leases within reserves Nos. 1 and 2, and 94 wells on privately owned lands within or adjacent to these reserves.

The very fact that operators on neighboring privately owned land know that any move to drill wells that might drain naval petroleum reserves will be promptly met by an adequate offsetting campaign, vigorously prosecuted, tends to prevent such drilling.

These two causes have undoubtedly conserved large quantities of oil and gas underground.

"Question No. 20. Is it a fact that up to July 1, 1923, there has been turned into the Treasury from royalties received from the naval oil reserves more than $5,000,000?"

Answer. Yes. As shown by the records of the Interior Department, the actual amount turned into the Treasury up to July 1, 1923, is $5,617,130.82.

"Question No. 21. Is it a fact that no officer of the Navy was retired or ordered away from his station of duty in Washington because of his disagreement with Secretary Denby's policy?"

Answer. Yes. There follows a list of officers alleged to have been retired or ordered away from Washington because of opposition to Secretary Denby's petroleum policy and the reasons for their assignment to other duty:

Rear Admiral Seaton Schroeder, now deceased, was retired August 17, 1911, detached from last active duty March 10, 1919. Has never been on duty during Secretary Denby's administration.

Rear Admiral R. S. Griffin, retired on September 27, 1921, having reached the statutory age of retirement.

Capt. John Halligan has never been on duty in Washington during Secretary Denby's administration. Was on duty at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., from November 17, 1920, to April 6, 1923, when he was ordered to command the U. S. S. Detroit, a very desirable command.

Commander H. A. Stuart was detached from duty in Washington on April 5, 1922, after having served three years and seven months in Washington, seven months beyond the normal length of a tour of duty.

Commander J. O. Richardson has never been on duty in Washington during Secretary Denby's administration. He was detached from the Naval Academy on April 24, 1922, at his own request in order to command the U. S. S. Asherville.

Commander N. H. Wright was detached from duty in Washington May 19, 1920, before Secretary Denby came into office, after three years and eight months on shore duty. He is now back on duty in Washington.

Lieut. Commander J. F. Shafroth was detached from duty in Washington on April 17, 1922, upon the request of Rear Admiral W. C. Cole that Shafroth be ordered as aid and flag secretary upon his staff.

Lieut. Commander I. F. Landis has never been on duty in Washington during Secretary Denby's administration. He was in charge of the California oil reserves, with headquarters at San Francisco, and under the policy to discontinue retired officers on active duty prior to July 1, 1922, he was relieved from this duty on June 30, 1922.

"Question No. 22. Is it a fact that none of the officers ever on duty in connection with the naval petroleum reserves had any prior training or experience in connection with the oil-production industry?"

Answer. Yes. According to the records of the Navy Department, that is true.

"Question No. 23. Is it a fact that important portions of the naval reserves never have been under the control of the navy?"

Answer. Within the exterior limits of naval oil reserve No. 1, 5,857.5 acres, 15½ per cent of the total acreage, are owned by private parties. No part of this reserve is farther than 2½ miles from privately owned land over which the Government has no control of drilling.

Of the total acreage in naval oil reserve No. 2, 19,080 acres, or 65.4 per cent of the total acreage, is privately owned, 7,360 acres, or 24.5 per cent of the total acreage, was placed under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior by the leasing act of February 25, 1920, and there remain but 3,040 acres or 10.1 per cent of the total acreage under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy. All of the acreage in this reserve under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department was subject to drainage by privately controlled operations.

All of the naval reserve No. 3 is under naval jurisdiction, but at the time of the signing of the lease of this reserve there were a number of unadjudicated claims to oil rights.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN DENBY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this is the first time I have spoken on the adjusted compensation bill. In the Sixty-seventh Congress I did not do so.

My heart is in this cause for the ex-service men, and I believe that 90 per cent of the men of this country want a cash bonus. I believe that for the best interests of the Government it is better to pay a cash bonus and get through with it than to go on for 20 years under the bill which is proposed. [Applause.]

The history of the bonus or adjusted-compensation legislation in this Congress is this: The service men on the Democratic side met, knowing that the Ways and Means Committee would not report out the four-fold plan of the American Legion, and requested the Ways and Means Committee to report out a bill with a two-fold option, insurance and cash. The committee met, and the record, as shown in the newspapers, is that the Member from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] made a motion for the cash bonus, and this was supported by the entire Democratic membership, and the vote stood 13 to 12.

I am not attacking this bill as to its insurance feature. If there were a cash option in this bill, then there would be nothing wrong with the insurance feature. But I wonder whether the Members know the borrowing power under this plan.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that under the proposed bill it will cost, at the very least, a little more than $2,000,000,000, while under the cash bonus plan the cost would be $1,319,519,000.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am glad the gentleman called that to my attention. In two years from now one of these men—who served his country faithfully and who this Congress has admitted, as well as the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be entitled to adjusted compensation, and admitted by the Ways and Means Committee at this session to be entitled to something—can walk up to a bank with his insurance policy and get the sum of $57.50; in 5 years it would be $153.52, and in 10 years $346.12.

Now, I say the insurance feature is all right at the time of a man's death, but for adjusted compensation never, and no one can justify it for that purpose.

The cost of this will be $2,025,000,000, while the cost of a cash bonus would be $1,346,000,000. That is all it is.

To the members of the Ways and Means Committee I say this, and I say it to the chairman of the committee: That the men from Iowa who went into this fight went into it, when the war came, with their might and main; they never attempted to play politics; they went in, if necessary, to give their very lives for the country they loved. I say this to the gentleman from Illinois, who is on the committee, that on the last day I saw men from Illinois, knowing that the armistice was to be signed at 11 o'clock, but under military necessity, go forward and die, many were wounded, and all in the division did their full duty. They never played politics with you; not at all.

This bill is wrong, men; it is absolutely wrong. The ex-service men should be dealt with fairly if you are going to deal with them at all.

Back in the Sixty-fifth Congress, when the $60 bonus rider was brought in, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADSEN] said, "Is not $60 a measly sum to give them?" And is not this a measly way to treat these men, if you admit they are entitled to anything, and this House has admitted that time and time again?

Is not this a measly way to pay them? Give them the insurance plan, but give them first the option of a cash payment. [Applause.]

Let us be fair; let us deal justly with these men. They are entitled to the best that this House can do for them. I am inserting a telegram received from the State commander of the American Legion in North Carolina and also the estimated cost of the proposed legislation, as well as the estimate of what the men will receive.

WASHINGTON, N. C., March 17, 1924.

Hon. A. L. BULWINKLE,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the floor leader, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] last Friday asked unanimous consent that the Consent Calendar and suspension business of to-day be transferred until to-morrow, I stated that it would be impossible for me to be present in the House to-morrow. Of course, the change was made in the interest of a number of Members who are absent from the House to-day and do not wish to return until to-morrow. Since all the other Members of the House appeared satisfied with the change in the calendar of the business of the House, I did not wish to interpose a more or less selfish objection. It is well known that the purpose to-morrow is that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means shall move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 7969, entitled "A bill to provide adjusted compensation for the veterans of the World War." I am in favor of this bill in the form reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am a member, and hope I shall be so paired when the vote is taken. Not being able to be present during the consideration of the bill in the House, I have secured this opportunity to express some views upon the subject, and this is the first time I have discussed it in the House.

Nor is it improper to interpose these remarks in the consideration of the current appropriation for the Navy Department, that great branch of our national defense which shared with the Army and the Marine Corps the undying honors of the Great War.

There is, also, a large and rather appealing element of sentiment which, while attributable in its inception to emotions of the heart, finds approval in the reactions of the average mind. This feeling or state of mind is not mere sentimentality. It grows, to some extent, out of a demand for fairness and justice. No one will contend that the soldiers were adequately compensated, to say nothing of being rewarded, for their services and sacrifices in the war. It is true that they did not serve for pay or benefit to themselves. Neither did they raise the question of adequacy of compensation before they entered the service. I do not share the view that there is any contractual or in any other sense binding legal obligation on the part of the Government to "adjust" or supplement the recompense of the soldiers. The frequent references to adjustments or settlements that were made, after the war, with contractors, producers, industries, and transportation agencies as being precedents or imposing like obligations for Governmental action are not well founded. It would have been better, and I would have favored, that all citizens, all industries, and all interests had been equally drafted for the war and put on the same basis for financial returns and conditions of existence during the conflict, but that was not done. We can not restore all the equality now. Much of the wealth earned, at least by individuals, during the war has already been dissipated. Much of it was actually given away or spent wastefully during and on account of the war. The war itself produced extraordinary anomalies. Men became reckless in the use of fortunes as well as in the destruction of life and limb.

A species of hysteria seized the people which at the same moment rose to the most sublime heights of patriotism and generosity but also sank to the gross depths of greed and extravagance. It is a serious question whether the average citizen who remained at home, even though he earned large wages during the war, is to-day much better off, even financially, than he would have been if he had gone to the front in the Army or the Navy and returned in as good or better physical condition than he enjoyed when he went away. Contractors and merchants, who had a chance to deal with the Government, and wage earners, who could accept employment in industries in any way connected with production for the prosecution of the war, did receive enhanced returns, but salaried persons, professional men and women, and small merchants, who were unable to get new stocks of merchandise, found their cost of living constantly advancing without any corresponding increase in their incomes. In spite of all this, however, the service man—now one of the veterans of the war, and I prefer to call him even now a veteran—is entitled to the consideration of his Government for such further reward as it may be possible and advisable to give him in view of all existing circumstances. He, the veteran, was after all the great hero of the war. He alone bared his breast and offered his life for his country, whatever other citizens may have done to help to achieve victory. He must not be dismissed with a shrug or a sneer. He must not be called selfish or unpatriotic if he feels and expresses dissatisfaction with conditions that were unfavorable to him upon his return to the country he went out to save and preserve. He loved his country then; he loves his country now. His Army or Navy experience gave him a different outlook upon life. He was separated for a time from the arts and works of peace. He was shaken—unbalanced, if you will—for a while at least, and he was rendered more or less unfit for his former or any new occupation in civil life.

Whatever may have happened to him, whatever change we who did not have his experience may have discerned in him, his present physical, mental, or moral condition, if traceable to the war, is not of his making. Other wars in other lands—and even in our own—have produced something of delinquency and shiftlessness among many of their participants. Thank God, no considerable evidence of so sad an aftermath is discernible in our beloved land. The great mass of our heroes returned, like Cincinnatus, to the plow. They are back in their civil pursuits, quietly, peacefully, efficiently, and patriotically doing their share of the Nation's work, without complaint and without demand for favor or advantage. Other countries have given their soldiers postwar rewards, bonuses, privileges, and benefits of various kinds. Most of the States in the Union have done likewise. The Federal Government has done nothing except for those who have suffered handicaps through illness or disability due directly to war service, save only the bonus of $50 paid each veteran upon his discharge. The mistake was made when that action was taken. The administration which was then in power and which had conducted the war should have finally adjusted the relations of the soldier with his Government when the soldier left the service and returned to civil pursuits. Any expenditure then would have been counted a part of the war cost. The veteran on his return found himself in a whirlpool of disturbed and changing situations. The financial bubble of the war had burst; deflation had set in; prices were falling; industry had not yet returned to a peace-time, instead of a war-time, basis; millions of men needed employment not yet obtainable. The veteran was without money and without work. His relatives and friends received him with open arms and for a while held him a welcome guest who had returned from a great adventure. But very soon he desired again to support himself. Happily our Nation recovered with marvelous speed, and we are now again enjoying general prosperity, except in the case of some forms of agriculture and a few industries which sprang up during the war. But for a while—for quite a while—after his return the veteran found himself at a disadvantage. He was not as favorably situated as many of those about him who had stayed at home. Things got on his nerves; he did not know "where he was at"; he began to wonder whether his sacrifices and sufferings had been appreciated after all.

I believe very few veterans are much differently situated now than the balance of our people. They have found and returned to their places in industry, business, and society. They are the bloom of our manhood. They ask no favors and give no quarter. They can take care of themselves, and they do take care of themselves. But they have the recollection of their immediate return from the war. Many of them feel that they then, for a few months at least, suffered unnecessary hardships and humiliations. They think they are entitled to an adjustment or some consideration. They have not sought to dictate what the action of the Government shall be. Their organization representatives have said repeatedly that they believe the veterans will be content with whatever Congress determines to do. Their largest organization, the American Legion, unanimously indorsed the so-called Fordney bill, passed by the last Congress, because it was the proposal of the people's representatives. Other bodies of veterans have done likewise.

The "fourfold" plan of the Fordney bill provided for no cash payments except to those who would receive $50 or less of the "adjusted service credit," allowed at the rate of $1 per day for home service and $1.25 per day for overseas service, with a limitation of $500 for home service and $625 for overseas service, the latter figure to apply in all cases of overseas service without reference to duration. The former bill also included aid for the acquisition of farms and urban homes and aid for vocational training. It is believed, however, that the demand for these benefits would be very small at this distance from the war, and both of these plans have been eliminated from the bill H. R. 7959, which has now been favorably reported to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means.

I stated in the opening sentence of these remarks that politics have been injected into this legislation. Of course, that is deeply to be regretted. It is a serious question whether support of this legislation, in some parts of the country at least, is an asset or a liability to a Member of Congress. Very many good citizens, and equally good legislators, are opposed to this legislation on principle. With such I have no quarrel. The remarks I have already made, however, indicate my own viewpoint. I think this matter has reached a point, both in the legislative situation in this House and in the history of the country, where it should be finally settled. I would be opposed to the payment of a cash bonus by the Federal Government at this time or, as far as I am now advised, at any time hereafter. I do not believe an immediate distribution of money to the veterans either necessary or desirable. The soldiers have passed the emergency or crisis during which the comparatively small amounts of money that the Nation could afford to pay to the individual veterans would be of substantial personal benefit to them.

On the other hand, the probable immediate expenditure of the large aggregate sum—at least $1,300,000,000, on the basis of the proposed "adjusted-service credit"—would doubtless create at least a temporary inflation and a consequent unwholesome economic condition. Then, too, such an immediate payment could not be made without the sale of a bond issue, the terms of which might adversely affect present outstanding issues and even the credit of the Government.

The attitude of some Members of the House on the question of a cash bonus has been curious, if not amusing. They protest their firmness for such a bonus, but insist that they will be compelled to vote for something else. Why, if they want to do so they can beat the proposed bill to-morrow (Tuesday), first, by voting down the order for a "second" by teller vote on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and then by defeating the bill itself if they have the support of one Member more than one-third of the Members present. They insist that a majority of the House favors a cash bonus. If that is so, they can not only beat the bill on final passage but they can also prevent its consideration on the motion to pass the bill under suspension of the rules. But I predict that these cash-bonus advocates will be very careful not to prevent the consideration of the bill to-morrow, and then they will vote for this bill under "compulsion" of their own making. It is to be noted that this so-called "movement" for a cash bonus is under the leadership of five ex-service men who are Members of the House on the Democratic side, and who were selected by action of the Democratic conference to "advise" with the members of the Ways and Means Committee. Their "advice" consisted in appearing before the committee—as shown by the hearings—and unanimously urging an option for a cash bonus. If this is a Democratic proposal, why did not the Democratic "conference" resolve itself into "caucus" and by a two-thirds vote bind their members—as they did on the Garner plan in the revenue bill—to vote for a cash-bonus option? I think I have proven that politics have been injected into this matter within recent date. I regret that I can not be here to-morrow, but I think I have forecast what is going to happen. Men will denounce the method of procedure and proclaim loudly in favor of a cash bonus, but they will cast no votes that will interfere with or retard the passage of the reported bill under suspension of the rules. A minority of the House—one Member in excess of one-third, to be exact—can defeat the passage of the bill without opportunity for amendment, and thereafter the bill, beyond any question whatever, will be brought before the House under the general rules. But the cash-bonus proponents know, as well as do other Members of the House, that a cash-bonus proposal could not possibly be carried over the inevitable veto of the President; therefore they will not interfere with the passage of this bill.

I have another reason for opposing a cash bonus by the Federal Government.

It would be a duplication of action already taken by many of the States which have voted cash payments to their veterans. At least two ex-service men on the Republican side, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] have proposed insurance plans for adjusted compensation without and instead of cash payments. Their States have paid cash bonuses. So has my State of Illinois. The following States have provided for cash soldiers' bonuses: Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, and Wisconsin—19 States in all, and all in the North!

I respectfully suggest to gentlemen who favor an immediate cash bonus that they secure action to that end in their several States, if their States have not already taken such action. The veterans defended and preserved the several States of the Union as certainly and as fully as they protected the United States.

It will be seen that the States paying the largest shares of the Federal taxes have given State cash bonuses. These States will contribute more than their proportionate shares to the Federal bonus, whatever that may be.

Various kinds of benefits have been given by these and other States to the veterans of the World War. Here are some of these benefits, aside from cash payments: Burial and funeral allowances for deceased veterans; aid in the purchase of homes and farms; aid for education and vocational training; exemption from various forms of taxation and license fees; relief to veterans and their dependents in case of illness and disability; and care for orphans of deceased veterans. Not a single State, so far as a careful search can disclose, has proposed or given any form of life insurance. Such a proposal is necessarily and essentially within the province of the Federal Government. It relates to the future needs of the veterans. It capitalizes not merely what they might have earned during the war, but specifically and especially what they might have saved during the war. It has been truly said that a man's real income is not what he earns or receives but what he saves and retains for future use. The insurance plan gives the veteran his adjusted service credit on the basis to which all have agreed and invests that amount for him to the best possible advantage without any possibility of loss or failure. The Federal Government itself is his banker, his life insurance company, and guarantees the returns provided by legislation. What could be more certain or more secure? It has been argued that the veteran should be permitted to use his adjusted compensation or bonus as he sees fit. That might be true if the veteran were collecting an account or a legal obligation, but he is doing neither. He is receiving additional compensation or reward which a grateful Nation—in loco parentis—has determined to give him in the form and in the manner which the parent—the Nation—knows will be of greatest benefit to the veteran and comes well within the ability of the parent—the Nation—to pay contemporaneously and consistently with the performance of other duties to the remaining hundred millions of its establishment.

I believe the Government—that is, the Nation—should provide adequately, aye, generously, for those who suffered physical or mental handicaps because of their participation in the war. Before very long we will have to provide at least for the care of disabled and diseased veterans, even though their ailments or injuries may not be directly traceable to service origin. In fact, I think the acceptance of a man into the service, after a physical or medical examination provided by the Government itself, should be prima facie proof, at least, that he was in good health when he entered the service, and that immediate subsequent illness resulted from the service. I am certain that the American people will never tolerate that any of their war veterans shall be relegated to almshouses or infirmaries for care and treatment. To those who escape all of these unhappy conditions the insurance plan will be in the nature of a service pension, and the adoption of this plan should postpone and obviate any request or proposal for such pension at least until the benefits of the insurance, after payment under its terms, shall have been fully and economically employed. To this extent and to this end the insurance for the veterans should be an insurance as well for the Nation.

It is difficult to reach a conclusion upon the question of soldiers' adjusted compensation or bonus legislation entirely upon its merits. Politics are almost necessarily injected into the discussion. Happily, the question has so far not become a party issue, but it has been more or less a personal issue between candidates both for nomination and for final election to both Houses of Congress. It seems altogether certain that this question will continue an issue in congressional elections, if not in presidential elections, to the detriment and probably to the exclusion of more important questions, until the issue has been settled. I therefore believe that it is essential that the issue be met and determined now.

The pending bill provides that as soon as practicable, but not earlier than nine months after the enactment of the law, veterans who served in excess of 90 days but who would receive $50 or less, over and above the $60 already paid for their total length of service, shall receive their adjusted service credit in such sum of $50 or less in cash. The cost of these cash payments will be about $15,000,000. In the case of veterans who have already died, their dependents will receive the payments due the deceased veteran for his adjusted service credit. These payments will be made in 10 equal quarterly installments unless the total amount due is less than $50, in which case that amount will be paid on the first installment date. Dependents entitled to such payment include only widows and widowers, children under 18 years of age, and mothers and fathers of the deceased veterans. These payments will require approximately $50,000,000.

All other veterans entitled to adjusted service certificates will receive nonparticipating 20-year endowment insurance for the amount which the adjusted service credit, increased by 25 per cent, would purchase at the age of the veteran's birthday nearest the date of the certificate on a single premium payment and based upon the American experience table of mortality and bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually. No physical examination will be required, but it is believed that the select quality of the risks will bring the insured within the experience of the ordinary life insurance companies. The matured or face value of the policy will be paid to the veteran's beneficiaries upon his death or to the veteran himself upon the termination of the 20-year endowment period. It is estimated that 82 per cent of the soldiers will live the full 20-year period.

After the end of the second certificate year a veteran holder of the certificate may borrow from a bank 90 per cent of the reserved value of the certificate for the current certificate year, but never to exceed 60 per cent of the face value of the certificate. The bank may charge interest not in excess of 2 per cent above the rate charged by the Federal reserve bank in the district in question. After a loan period of six months the Director of the Veterans' Bureau may take over the loan and pay the principal with accrued interest, and thereafter the holder will be charged the amount thus paid with interest at 6 per cent per annum compounded annually. The soldier or his beneficiaries will get the balance due on the certificate, being the difference between the cost of the loan and the face value of the certificate when payable unless the holder meanwhile pays up the loan and redeems his certificate from the lien created upon it. It will be seen that in no event will the certificate be lost to the soldier or his beneficiaries. The difference between the 4 per cent accumulation compounded annually upon the full adjusted service credit, including 25 per cent added to the amount determined by length of service, and the 6 per cent compounded annually upon the loan, will pay the increased cost of administration incurred by the Veterans' Bureau in the handling of the loan.

One other situation merits my attention in this connection. It is well known that I supported the so-called Mellon plan for tax reduction of surtaxes and normal income-tax rates. That plan would have created a loss in revenue of approximately $332,000,000. The Longworth compromise plan adopted by the House will probably create a greater loss in the run of years, because the inducement for investment in active capital rather than tax-exempt and other dormant securities will be largely lacking. It is also known that I have favored the 25 per cent reduction in the individual income-tax payments for the year 1923 payable during the present calendar year. That reduction will leave a substantial balance in the surplus that will be available after June 30 next which can be used for the extra payments beyond the sinking fund necessary under the proposed bill for the calendar years 1925, 1926, and 1927. I have no doubt that the sinking fund of $100,000,000 provided by the pending bill for soldiers' adjusted compensation can be met out of the current revenues of the Government. There should be and will be continued economies in administration and retrenchments in expenditure. We are at present expending approximately $150,000,000 a year for vocational training for disabled veterans of the World War. Those payments will soon be very substantially reduced and ultimately altogether obviated because the soldiers entitled to such vocational training will soon have received the full benefits provided by law for that purpose. We can and should, now that we have started upon the Budget system, and I think we always will balance the Federal Budget so long as we know to a certainty what our expenditures will be. This bill has the added merit of carrying a definitely ascertainable obligation upon the Federal Treasury, which is furthermore the lowest that has hitherto been proposed for the settlement of this proposition. The plan in this bill can be financed without any economic burden to the Government or to the people and without disturbance of business and economic conditions.

From every viewpoint I believe the passage of House bill 7959 at this time will best serve the interests of the entire country, including the veterans themselves.

I will set forth the features of the often-proposed bill more at length in my extension of remarks, but I believe the Members of the House are fairly well informed upon that subject. If there is any feature of the legislation contained in the bill which the committee has reported upon which information is desired, I will pause for a moment in order to answer questions.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes, if it is a question with reference to the plan.

Mr. RANKIN. It is.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me have the question.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman that he is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and this is the only speech from the Ways and Means Committee we have heard on this bill in the House, so that we have a right to ask him some questions and get some information on this proposition.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am making this speech because I can not be here to vote to-morrow. I wish it were possible for me to be here to-morrow, but, as I say, that is impossible.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAMSEYER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the gentleman any more time?

Mr. FRENCH. I am sorry I can not yield any further time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would like to answer some inquiries.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield just a moment in order that I may ask a question?

Mr. FRENCH. I can not yield any more time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY].

Mr. FRENCH. And I will yield three minutes to the same gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY] is recognized for eight minutes.

[Mr. DAVEY was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I wish to talk with further reference to the so-called bonus bill. It has been said rather generally, and the propaganda has been used vigorously by the opponents of bonus legislation, that many of the service men themselves are against the bonus.

In order to answer this obviously false allegation I secured the best available list of ex-service men in my district and sent to each of them an individual letter. I will read the portion of that letter that is pertinent to this discussion, as follows:

The opponents of adjusted compensation for ex-service men in their effort to defeat this measure have been claiming that a large proportion of the soldiers themselves are opposed to it. My own position in favor of this proposition is so well known that I will say nothing further about it. Neither do I wish to advance any argument in support of it. My only desire is to find out what you think.

Do you believe that the Government is under a strong moral obligation to pay adjusted compensation to ex-service men? If so, vote "Yes."

Or, are you more or less indifferent about this question of adjusted compensation but willing to accept payment if the bill is passed by Congress? If so, vote "Yes."

Or, are you opposed to adjusted compensation on principle, and do you believe that Congress ought not to pass such a bill? If so, vote "Yes."

Of the letters which have been returned up to date, the following are the figures. Those who are strongly in favor of it, confined entirely to ex-service men, number 4,007. Those who indicate themselves as indifferent number 279. Those who express themselves as opposed number 121. If you eliminate the middle group who are indifferent, this referendum vote stands better than 30 to 1 as strongly in favor of adjusted compensation.

I would like to bring this point out very forcibly. In the beginning the soldiers were largely indifferent, according to my observation; but they have felt for the last two or three years that this bonus question has been made a football of politics. They have been promised, and promised, and promised that they would be paid a bonus. It has been promised so much that the soldiers felt it was only a question of a little time and they have been made to feel that they are entitled to it. I am prepared now to say to you, as far as my contact with ex-service men in northeastern Ohio is concerned, that these men are becoming embittered because they feel they have been unfairly dealt with.

I will say to the gentlemen on the Republican side that most of the soldiers with whom I have come in contact are against anything that Secretary Mellon is for, because they believe that

Secretary Mellon has been deliberately unfair to them and that he has given out deliberately exaggerated estimates of cost in order to deceive the public. As proof of that unfairness, I want to call your attention to the figures attached to this present bill. They say that this insurance plan will cost $2,119,000,000, after figuring cash compensation, adding 25 per cent to that, and carrying it at 4 per cent compound interest for 20 years. If that is what the insurance plan will cost, it is perfectly obvious that a cash bonus will cost very much less, perhaps one-half, and I will say to you further, as far as my contact with ex-service men goes, they understand a bonus to mean cash and not insurance.

This thing will never satisfy them. They will consider it as a deliberate affront to their intelligence. They will assume that this Congress means that the ex-service men of the United States have not brains enough to spend their own money wisely. We say to them, "You men do not know how to handle money; you are children; you need paternal guidance in money matters. We will give you an insurance policy, so you can not spend the money, and then if you happen to live 20 or 30 years you can have the money. We will give you a piece of paper to that effect. If you need the money now, if it would help you now, even though we admit that you are entitled to the additional pay, it makes no difference—you can not have it now.

Soldiers, like everyone else, understand a bonus to mean cash, and if you do not pay them a cash bonus they will rightly feel that they have been misled and deceived and unfairly dealt with. There is only one square thing to do, and that is to give them a twofold option—either cash or insurance. There is not a man in this House who believes in insurance more than I do. I carry a lot of it myself, largely 20-year endowment, and I believe in it as a matter of principle; but I do not believe that this Congress has any right to say to these men, "You have got to take insurance or nothing; you do not know enough to use cash wisely."

Mr. ABERNETHY. What does the gentleman think about the way they will bring this measure in here, not allowing any amendments to it?

Mr. DAVEY. Well, it is the worst kind of gag rule. I would like to vote against it, as a matter of principle, and if there were enough men in this House to join me I would vote against it and help kill it, and then join in a movement to force the Ways and Means Committee to report out a bona fide bonus bill or forthwith move to discharge that committee and do the right thing here in the House.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. I will vote with you.

Mr. DAVEY. You show me enough men to defeat this and I will vote against it, and gladly, and I will go out and tell the soldiers in my district what kind of a raw deal it was proposed to put over on them in this Congress.

Mr. REID of Illinois, Mr. McSWEENEY, and Mr. SNELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVEY. I will yield gladly.

Mr. SNELL. I understood you to say that you knew this would not be satisfactory to them. That is not the information I get from the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee says he gets his information from the representatives of the Legion. I am interested to know that.

Mr. DAVEY. I am not assuming to take information from the officials of any organization. I am glad to take my information from the boys back home, and I know they want cash.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVEY. Certainly.

Mr. BULWINKLE. We would like to have from the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee the information he has.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose, I will be glad to state.

Mr. DAVEY. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman, although the gentleman refused to yield to me some time ago.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think I have the reputation of yielding to gentlemen when anyone else would, so far as that is concerned. My information, and in fact the statement from the representatives of the Legion, is that this proposition is satisfactory to them, and I have in my office a telegram from the commander of the Legion in my State approving this plan and stating that a vast majority of the men want insurance, and that this plan will be satisfactory to them.

Mr. DAVEY. I will say to the gentleman in reply that when the ex-service men of this country find out what kind of hocus-pocus proposition has been offered to them, they will let the Members of Congress know, in no uncertain terms, that they do not approve of this kind of a deal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, this proposal for adjusted compensation is to be taken up to-morrow under a suspension of the rules, allowing 20 minutes' debate on each side, because the managers of the House are afraid that the House, if it had the opportunity, would vote for a cash bonus. Nothing could be more unfair, but it is another instance of the Republican managers of the House cutting off discussion and preventing any amendment. Why could not this bill be brought in as other measures have been brought in? Why cut off all amendments? Why bring a proposition into the House as great and far-reaching as this and say to the Members of the House, "You must vote it up or vote it down as a whole." I think the managers who are responsible for this arrangement do not receive the approval of a majority of the Members of the House. You will hear from ex-service men all over the country, if you are not hearing from them now, gentlemen of the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You are not fooling anybody. As I stand here to-day ex-service men are sending telegrams asking the Members of this House to vote for the bill which is to be considered to-morrow, and why? Because they know there will be opportunity to amend it in the Senate, and they prefer the bill which will be considered to-morrow to no legislation at all at this session.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad that this matter is being brought to a close. Let us keep history straight. The ex-service men are not responsible for this agitation. The agitation for adjusted compensation started right here at this desk, and I am proud to acknowledge the small part in it that I took. I shall be proud of it as long as I live. Our Nation finds itself placed in a position of which no American can be proud. That is the plain truth. Here is the richest and most powerful of all nations, and yet Canada, England, Italy, New Zealand, and all of the countries that were associated with us in the great World War have done more for their ex-service men than we have done for ours. I would be ashamed to call myself an American if I were willing to rest always under that stigma. We have helped almost everybody except the ex-service men. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to comprehend the viewpoint of the immensely wealthy, but I have some common sense. I believe in property rights; I believe men are entitled to enjoy whatever they honestly earn; I believe our Government is the greatest and best of all the governments of the earth. I pray God it may endure. [Applause.] The best insurance policy this Nation can have is that grand army of 4,000,000 ex-service men contented, convinced also that they offered their lives for a Nation which is not ungrateful. The time may come when these very ex-service men will be called upon to protect some of the great fortunes piled up during and after the war. [Applause.] Gentlemen, you are making a mistake to pass this bill in the way in which you have decided to pass it to-morrow. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for just a moment, before he begins his remarks?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to correct one erroneous statement that was made a few moments ago. It has been repeatedly said here that it would be cheaper to pay these veterans in cash than by the plan which we have. It would be cheaper if in the first place you paid them on a cash proposition of 25 per cent less than what we propose to give them. The rest of the statement is all based on the assumption that a dollar owed 20 years from now is worth in cash a dollar to-day. It is not, and we do not claim that it is. The computation upon the cash value is 25 per cent more. The only way it would be cheaper to pay in cash would be to discount it at 25 per cent.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, some weeks ago I addressed the House in reference to the price of anthracite coal among the consuming public of the Northern States. At a later date the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] made a somewhat similar speech, in most of the details of which he agreed with the statements that I had made, in respect to the reasons for prevailing high prices in anthracite coal. He did, however, take up one special line of argument in opposition to the remarks that I made, namely, in reference to the statements that I made as to the miners' part in the high price. The exceptions that he took to my statements had entirely to do with the miners' interests and in most instances I recognize his right to speak for the miner.

He has information of the practical kind, having lived among the miners, being really one of them, and I congratulate him on his thorough knowledge of their side of the issue. However, he made a few serious blunders, as I see them, in comparison of the statements that I made. I have no quarrel with the miners or the miners' unions, and in fact in reading my remarks I think that one would feel that I have been particularly fair with their position. I do not claim, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] ought not to have insinuated that I did claim, that there was any conspiracy between the operators and the miners to raise the price of anthracite coal to the consumer. I made no such claim as that. I simply said they were taking advantage of the situation as they found it, for which I did not blame them in the slightest degree. He also said that there was no chance of union control under the system of certificates issued to miners. With that statement I have no quarrel, except to the extent that he misquotes the law.

The law under which miners now secure their rights was passed in 1897, rather than 1889, in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and a man to be on the board appointed by the Court of Appeals of the State of Pennsylvania must have served as a miner for five years. Now, the testimony has been brought out very conclusively in the report of the United States Coal Commission that the mines are 100 per cent unionized. All well and good. I have no objection to that, provided it does not stop production, but if anybody can explain to me how a man can be a member of the board and not be a member of the union, requiring five years' actual experience in a mine in order to be appointed, I should be glad to receive it. Then the gentleman makes some reference to a statement I made in regard to what the miners are paid, and facetiously says he thinks I must have visited some mine in Massachusetts to have secured any such information as I gave the House. I can say for the gentleman's information the mine was in Wilkes-Barre. I wish to say that I can positively substantiate the statement I made on this floor in that connection by two miners with whom I talked and whom I had in mind when I made the reference. There is no question of accuracy of that statement, and it can be positively borne out by the facts. Then, too, he said another thing to which I take exception, namely, that the United States Coal Commission was appointed to represent the public in the troubles between the operators and the miners. Why, he ought to have known better than that. The United States Coal Commission had absolutely nothing to do with the relations between the miners and the operators. They were not admitted to the conferences either in New York or in Atlantic City. There was no relation between them whatsoever. If he did not have sufficient information, all he needed to have done was to have seen the phraseology which Congress put in the act under which the United States Coal Commission was appointed. It said:

For the purpose of securing information in connection with questions relative to interstate commerce in coal and all questions and problems arising out of the connection with the coal industry—

And so forth.

Absolutely nothing to do with the relations between the operators and the miners. One other statement appeared in his remarks, namely, that the conditions existing in New England a year ago last winter, during the winter of 1922 and 1923, were not the result of the strike of the previous summer, but were the result of railroad conditions. The strike was the primary cause of the empty bins in New England and the high prices at which coal was sold at that time. You can not get away from that fact, my friends; it is so self-evident it needs no support on my part. So far as any differences are concerned in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, those are of very minor consequence. What I want to see accomplished is a reduction in the price of coal in New England. To-day, in spite of the fact that there is ample coal there, the price has never been so high except during the stress period of a year ago last winter. Can anybody see any justification of coal being sold to-day in New England from $16 to $17.50 a ton that at the mines is costing $9 a ton? Can anybody show a justification for $9 a ton as the price at the mines to-day? There is none. Nobody can rise on this floor and justify the price at which coal is being sold.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not a considerable amount of that anthracite coal come to New England from Canada?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it is just the reverse. We might get a little by way of Canada along the Maine coast, but as far as I know there is no importation. I think the gentleman's question can be answered in the negative. Practically the entire supply of anthracite is within a limited area in Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLEARY. May I suggest an answer?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLEARY. I have been for many years vice president of the Lake Champlain Coal Co., and our territory is in Canada and New England, but all the shipment of anthracite was from Pennsylvania by way of the Hudson River and Lake Champlain, but from Canada not very much, because there is no anthracite, but there is in Nova Scotia some bituminous coal that comes in.

Mr. TREADWAY. But as I was saying, Mr. Chairman, I wish to see if there is not some way we can reach a cure for this situation between now and next winter. Of course the time has gone by when any action on the part of Congress and the State of Pennsylvania can in any way reduce the cost of fuel for the present winter. The emergency is past, the price has been paid. We can only look to the future. I can not conceive of this Congress allowing such information as was afforded by the United States Coal Commission and such a complete report as was made by it not being put to some definite use. So far we have done nothing. There are very pressing matters before the Congress, but I claim there is nothing more pressing than the cost of fuel to the public of the Northern States in view of the conditions that we know to have existed there in the past, and the future possibilities. Therefore as nothing has yet been done with this very complete report of the United States Coal Commission, it leads me to hope that in the near future the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will take up this great subject. I know that they are pressed with numerous duties, and I have not been very urgent in asking for hearings, but I think, however, the time is very near by when that committee should take up this subject. Now I have been using what opportunity has come my way to see if we could not get still further information on the subject. One of the large contributing factors to the cost of fuel is the royalty paid for the use of coal lands. The largest individual landowner is the Girard Estate. They have a 15-year contract with the coal operators for the use of those lands and the royalty is on a sliding scale, and therefore the higher the price that the operator makes on the market value of the coal the greater the royalty.

When these contracts were made, and they have four or five years still to run, 45 cents was the minimum price; to-day it is on an average of over $1.50, from $1.50 to $2 a ton. Therefore the Girard Estate, a charitable organization in the city of Philadelphia, is getting an undue amount for these royalties at the expense of the coal-consuming public of the Northern States. It is a very peculiar situation, and it is one that I have been looking into, and I shall ask permission to insert in the Record some correspondence with the mayor of Philadelphia on it. I have had a most interesting letter from him within the last two days, in which he goes into some details as to the royalty position of the city. It admits that the consuming public is not in any sense a party to the contract. The one who pays the bill has nothing whatever to do with the making of the details of the contract. The lessor is the city of Philadelphia. The lessee is the coal operator, and the consuming public that pays the bill can look on from the outside. There is no consideration for them whatsoever.

Then, too, the State of Pennsylvania comes in for its share of the blame in the situation, and that situation would be more readily corrected if the governor of that great State showed a disposition to help out. He has not sought the removal of the State tax on anthracite coal. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] in the course of his remarks agreed with me that it was an unfair tax, and that he believed it ought to be repealed. Governor Pinchot has prevented its repeal, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] stated it would be repealed as soon as the financial condition of the State of Pennsylvania warranted it.

Can you conceive, gentlemen, of a more ridiculous situation than that the financial condition of the great State of Pennsylvania being taken care of by the coal-consuming public in other States? Since when is one State to pay the taxes of another

State? That is exactly the result of the tax on anthracite coal laid by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman state what the State of Pennsylvania gets each year out of anthracite?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes, sir. At least 10 cents a ton on an output of 80,000,000 tons. They are getting $8,000,000 every year. Not only that, not only are they getting $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 a year from it, but every time an additional 10 cents is put on the coal-consuming public there is nothing to prevent the coal operator from making that 50 cents when he passes it on to the consumer. There is positively no control by the Government or by any governmental agency over the retail price of the coal to the consumer.

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. WELSH. Does not the consumer in Pennsylvania also pay the tax?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am informed that the citizen of Pennsylvania pays the same tax, but in that case the taxpayer is the citizen of the State and should support his State government. Admitting that the citizens of that State are paying that tax, why are the citizens of other States contributing to the coffers of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. CABLE. When they raised that price, that was the price of coal?

Mr. TREADWAY. The operators never take anything less than 50 cents; 50 cents or a dollar. Governor Pinchot raised the wages of the miners 10 per cent last fall, and the president of the miners' union, Mr. Lewis, at the meeting at Indianapolis a few weeks ago made the claim that the miners' pay was increased $44,000,000. Who is paying that $44,000,000? The operators? No. The railroads? No. The selling agents of the coal operators? No. The State of Pennsylvania, the owners of the Girard land? Oh, no. The consuming public is paying that $44,000,000 extra.

It is the same way with every raise that is made, whatever it may be for. It is passed on to the poor consumer who has no rights whatsoever in the case, and nobody is representing him around the council table when the price is fixed.

Mr. CABLE. That shows the fallacy of a sales tax.

Mr. TREADWAY. It shows what great injustice is being done to the public in connection with a commodity that was put in the ground for the benefit of the public, not for the benefit of any class of citizens or the fortunate owners of the land.

Mr. WELSH. Does not the gentleman know that consumers of coal in Pennsylvania do pay the same tax?

Mr. TREADWAY. That makes no difference with the argument. I am arguing that the citizens of other States should not pay the State taxes of Pennsylvania; and if the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, at the behest of the people of the State, has that tax imposed, it does not follow that it should put it onto us also.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAMSEYER). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert certain letters to and from me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. The correspondence to which I refer is as follows:

JANUARY 18, 1924.

HIS HONOR W. FREELAND KENDRICK,

City Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: The subject of reduction of the price of anthracite is a very pressing one throughout New England. From the report of the United States Coal Commission, and from the general discussion of the subject, two things have been amply demonstrated:

One. There is from $1 to $1.50 additional cost to the price of coal owing to royalties. The Girard Estate, being the largest single owner of leasehold anthracite lands, makes the royalty rate. The present leases run until 1928, based on a sliding percentage scale averaging 18 per cent of the value of the coal when ready for shipment.

Two. These royalties are greatly in excess of the expectations of the original owner, Stephen Girard, and are undoubtedly also greatly in excess of the expectations of the trustees making the leases in behalf of the city of Philadelphia.

I appeal to you as mayor of Philadelphia to take up with the board of trustees, of which I infer you are ex officio member, the following suggestions:

Stephen Girard intended to found an educational institution and to support certain charities in a philanthropic and charitable manner. I submit, and this opinion seems to be largely held by the anthracite-consuming public, that the spirit and intent of the donor are entirely lost sight of in the present methods of the trustees. In order that his memory may be held in the reverence it deserves by the people alike of Philadelphia and of the country, the anthracite-consuming public should not be required to pay exorbitant, unfair, and improper royalties into the treasury of the board.

When the present leases were made in 1913 the upset price expected by the trustees was evidently 43 cents. In order to do proper reverence to the memory of Stephen Girard, will you not take the broad-minded view and such legal steps as may be necessary to have the royalty rates returned to the amount the trustees evidently expected to receive in 1913?

Such a move as this on your part would show in practice the spirit of brotherly love.

Sincerely yours,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TREADWAY: I have before me your letter of January 18, relative to royalties paid into the Girard Estate for lands leased in the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania.

I am an ex officio member of the board of city trusts, which controls this Girard Estate, and I will be very glad to present your communication to the members at the next meeting.

Very truly yours,

W. FREELAND KENDRICK.

JANUARY 25, 1924.

Hon. W. FREELAND KENDRICK,

Mayor of Philadelphia, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: I appreciate your courteous reply to my letter on the matter of royalties of the Girard Estate, and shall be glad to know of the result of bringing it to the attention of the board at the next meeting.

Sincerely yours,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
March 14, 1924.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A letter from the secretary of the board of directors of city trusts of Philadelphia directs me to give you the following information in reply to your letter of January, 1924:

"The royalties under the city's leases are based upon the selling prices of the coal at the mines, these prices for each year being the basis upon which the royalty rates are fixed during the succeeding year. We believe that this method of fixing royalty is fair for both the landowner and the lessee. What the coal operators call 'royalties' is the price per ton paid for coal in the ground. By their so-called 'royalties' they pay for the coal itself which ultimately reaches the consumer. The royalties, as already stated, are based upon the price of the coal as ascertained and fixed by its sale by the operators at the mines, and increases and diminishes in accordance therewith. A fixed royalty, particularly under a long-term lease, may prove inequitable at times to the lessor and at other times to the lessee, dependent upon the variation in selling prices. The value of the coal can best be ascertained by the price for which it sells at the mines at or near the time it is mined.

"The owner of the coal lands in question is not a mercantile or business corporation of any kind, but is a governmental institution, namely, the city of Philadelphia, which holds them in trust for public charitable uses. The name commonly applied to them, 'the Girard Estate,' is due to the fact that the city obtained them by the will of Stephen Girard, a great Philadelphia merchant, who died in 1831. He left the bulk of his estate to the city of Philadelphia in trust to establish and maintain a college for poor white male orphans between the ages of 6 and 18. The city duly established this institution, which now steadily houses, supports, clothes, and educates about 1,600 male orphans, and is probably the greatest charity of its kind in the world.

"The government of this State has placed this charitable feature of the municipal government in charge of a board of 12, called directors of city trusts, selected by the judges, to whom are added ex officio the mayor of the city and the presidents of the select and common councils.

"The members of the board devote much time and attention to the execution of these trusts. Needless to say, they serve without salary or other compensation of any kind, direct or indirect.

"One of the duties imposed on the city (of Philadelphia) is the utilization of these coal lands (as trustee) for the support of the Girard College, to which their entire proceeds are devoted by the will of Mr. Girard, and as an illustration of the fairness of the city's royalty rates I refer to one of its leases which is more advantageous to the lessor than any of its other leases. This lease was for coal in land which had not theretofore been opened and was offered to numerous operators, nine of whom submitted competitive bids for it. The highest bidder, to whom the lease was afterwards made, was but slightly in advance of the next highest bidder. It was evident the city thus secured, after open and public bidding, free for all, the market price and no more for this coal. The bids were submitted upon a sliding scale basis. There was no question as to the bidder being influenced by any improvement of his upon the land, for none existed, the proposition being, as above mentioned, for land never before under lease."

The committee also directs me to furnish you with the following additional information:

"The city's contribution to the anthracite output of the State amounted to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1914; 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1915; 4 per cent in 1916; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1917; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1918; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1919; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1920; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1921; 5 per cent in 1922; and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in 1923.

"In view of the small percentage of the whole anthracite output which is yielded by the city's mines, the committee does not believe that a reduction in royalty would affect the market prices to the consumer.

"The board is not convinced that any reduction in the royalty rates paid by the city's lessees would inure to the benefit of the public. No operator has ever claimed to the board that he would sell his coal more cheaply if his royalty were reduced. In fact, it was expressly stated to the board by one of the operators that he, and not the consumer, would be benefited by any such reduction. Therefore, the question resolves itself into one between the lessor and the lessee rather than between the lessor and the retail purchaser, and any reduction the city might make in its royalty would be for the sole benefit of the operators, increasing their profits or diminishing their losses, without any advantage whatever to the lessor or to the public.

"The present leases have been in effect since 1914. The method of calculating the royalty is the same now as at the beginning. The city does not fix the royalty—the lessees do this by their selling prices. To voluntarily change the leases by decreasing the royalty is beyond the authority of the trustee, whose duty is to secure the best results which can be obtained by intelligent bargaining."

Very truly yours,

W. FREELAND KENDRICK, Mayor.

MARCH 17, 1924.

Hon. W. FREELAND KENDRICK,

Mayor City of Philadelphia, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: I beg leave to express my appreciation of the contents of your very courteous letter of March 14, with detailed information relative to the royalty leases of coal lands owned by the city of Philadelphia under the will of Stephen Girard.

I am particularly interested in the attitude of the directors of the City Trusts that the question of royalties is one between the lessor and the lessee. In a narrow sense this is true. In a broad sense it seems to me a factor not recognized by either the lessor or lessee is the one principally at interest, namely the consuming public.

While the sliding scale is not fixed by the directors, it follows that the higher the selling price the larger the royalties received. It also follows that the sliding scale is of no consequence to the operator in that he has absolute power to pass on the royalty to the consumer. It must therefore be perfectly apparent to both parties that the consuming public is the victim and is the only one to whom the price of the coal is of any concern.

This fact is very well borne out by your reference to certain lands being offered to the highest bidder among operating companies. In other words, the more the consumer pays for his coal the better the results for both the owners of the lands and the operators.

Reference is made to the percentage of city-owned lands, it being 5 per cent of the product in 1922 and 4.9 per cent in 1923—a comparatively small amount by percentage but a very large amount in the aggregate of production.

With 80,000,000 tons mined your properties provide about 4,000,000. You are also recognized as the largest owner of royalty-leased land and therefore the example in the market to all other owners of leased land. It is apparent that the city ownership does have a direct bearing on the ultimate price.

It is no doubt true that a spasmodic reduction of royalties would be absorbed by the ever-grasping operators. On the other hand, such a reduction as could readily be afforded by the Girard estate, if made permanent, would command such public attention both for its merits and for charitable instincts of your board that the influence of public opinion would be stronger than the power of the operator. Price reduction to the consumer would necessarily follow.

I regret to note that the board takes the position that it is their duty "to secure the best results which can be obtained by intelligent bargaining." This is but another way of expressing the fact that the Girard trust desires to secure the best rate it can under the sliding scale and pass the amount on through the operators to the suffering, consuming public.

May I ask for information on the following questions, not through curiosity but in the hope that eventually some of the information may result in price reduction to the consumer?

1. What was the average royalty received per ton when the present leases were executed?
2. What is the average royalty per ton received at the present time?
3. How many tons are mined from lands owned by the Girard estate?

May I add that while the letter of the trustees endeavors to justify the board and defends the sliding-scale system of royalties, it only offers still further evidence that there will be no relief in price to the consuming public until governmental control asserts its authority in their behalf.

I look forward with expectancy to legislation of that character.

Again thanking you for the courtesy extended by you and the board and asking for statistical reports on the above inquiries, I am, with highest esteem,

Very truly yours,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

MARCH 4, 1924.

HIS EXCELLENCY GIFFORD PINCHOT,
Harrisburg, Pa.

DEAR GOVERNOR PINCHOT: There has been forwarded to me from my home in Stockbridge, Mass., a pamphlet in an envelope from your office entitled "Wages, Margins, and Anthracite Prices." This is the only acknowledgment I have had of several communications I have addressed to you at various times wherein attention has been called to the weakness of your position in the anthracite mining problem.

You make some statements in your article which call for further reference upon my part.

First, you endeavor to justify the agreement you entered into on August 27 last, whereby there was an increase of 10 per cent in wages of miners and point out that this should not have led to any increase in cost to the consumer. As a matter of fact, you no doubt are well aware that it has resulted in an increase of 75 cents to $1 per ton to all consumers in New England. At the annual meeting of the United Mine Workers Association in Indianapolis a few weeks ago, Mr. Lewis, the president, stated that the wages of the miners had been increased by $44,000,000 as a result of this adjustment, which laid a direct toll on the consuming public.

I am informed there is an ample supply of anthracite in New England at the present time, but it is being sold at the highest price ever known except during the period of the severest weather of last winter.

Let me refer to two other headings: Royalties and the anthracite tax. Both of these seem to me to come very directly within your province as Governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

It is, of course, well known that the royalties are in the form of private contracts and most of them do not expire until December 31, 1928. On the other hand, the amounts being received under these royalties are enormous and are a direct burden upon the coal consumers. I have recently suggested to Mayor Kendrick that the officials who are responsible for these contracts should give careful attention to a voluntary change, realizing that Stephen Girard never intended to require such a toll from the coal-consuming public in behalf of the charities in which he was interested. Your personal influence for this same purpose would be of the very greatest benefit, but I have not heard of any interest being shown by you in this subject. In this connection, I beg to inclose copy of my letter to Mayor Kendrick.

It is surprising that you should defend the anthracite tax of your State. You say "the repeal of this tax was before the legislature of 1923, but failed to pass."

Why do you not state the reason for its failure to pass, namely, your personal influence in opposition to it, even though your campaign committee published flaring advertisements of your support of the repeal?

Your argument of the small amount of this tax is a very weak one. In the aggregate you add from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 of expense to the coal-consuming public in order to care for, as it has been stated, deficiencies in the appropriations of your State.

Should the royalty system be changed through your influence, as I think it very readily could be, and should the repeal of the anthracite tax be secured, also through your influence, the operators and selling agents would be forced to very materially reduce their prices. You would also be providing the very best of argument for Federal legislation looking to control of the product in interstate commerce.

In anticipation of Federal legislation, can Congress look to you for assistance along the line indicated in the foregoing?

Yours sincerely,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have here before me a copy of Mr. GREEN's bill, H. R. 7959, which is called the "World War adjusted compensation act."

The first print of this bill that the Members of the House received was placed in their hands about noon on Saturday, March 15, just the day before yesterday. Members of the House have had but very little time to study the provisions of this bill, and, of course, the ex-service people of the Nation have had no chance at all to learn what sort of a bill it is.

My friends, what does "adjusted compensation" mean? Adjusted compensation means but one thing, and that is adjusted pay.

Now, let us note what this bill offers in the way of adjusted pay. It says that each veteran shall be entitled to receive "adjusted service pay" if the amount of his adjusted service credit is $50 or less. The fellow who is entitled to receive $50 or less will receive his pay in actual money, something that he can make use of for his needs or purposes, according to his own judgment and desire.

But what of the fellow who is to receive more than $50? What does he get in the way of adjusted pay?

Under this bill he receives what is termed an adjusted service "certificate." And no matter how badly that man may be needing a little cash at once, there is no way for him to borrow a cent on that "certificate" until after he has held it for two years.

The certificate will be simply a 20-year endowment insurance policy. If the man or the woman who receives it does not happen to need any cash and can afford to take that policy and let it run for 20 years, it will then—at the end of 20 years—have a face value of just about two and one-half times the amount of adjusted compensation that is due to the man or woman to start with.

For example, if a person is entitled to $100 adjusted compensation, he will be given a policy which he can keep for 20 years, and it will then have a value of about $250. A person who is entitled to about $400 adjusted compensation will have a certificate that will be worth about $1,000 at the end of the 20 years.

But there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of these ex-service men and women who need a little financial aid now which would enable them to start out in a new home, or to pay on a place, or for farming implements, or for a little furniture, or to pay off some obligation—there are many worthy purposes for which they may need a little cash very badly now. What of them?

If their Government says they are due this adjusted compensation or additional pay—and their Government is the greatest and the richest government in the whole world—then these ex-service people of the Nation have a right to feel and believe that their great and rich Government could, if it wanted to, easily afford to offer them their adjusted compensation in the usual currency of the country. Any man has a right to expect to receive his pay in money, so that he may take it where he will and expend it as he deems wisest and best for his own needs and purposes.

But the bill that we have here says if he has more than $50 coming to him he must take a policy.

If he is in urgent need of a little cash, what can he do? Is it arranged so that he can borrow anything on this 20-year insurance policy?

He can not borrow a nickel on that certificate until two years after he gets it. And what can he borrow then? He may then borrow 90 per cent of the amount of the sinking fund that is by that time applicable to his certificate. Not 90 per cent of the amount of his adjusted-compensation credit, mind you, but just 90 per cent of the value of the sinking fund as is applicable to his certificate at that time.

What does that mean? That simply means that a man who is entitled to about $400 adjusted compensation, for example, will receive a certificate that will have a face value of about $1,000 if he will keep it for 20 years. Now, at the end of two years from the time when he receives the policy the amount of the sinking fund that will be applied to that policy by that time will be about $63—I believe it is $63.67. Then how much can the man borrow? He can borrow 90 per cent of that $63.67, or the grand sum of $57.30. And upon that loan he must, of course, pay interest. Then, at the end of the third year he can borrow about $30 more; at end of fourth year, about $32 more; at end of fifth year, about $34 more; and so on each year he may borrow in little dribbles like that. Paying interest every year on all that he has borrowed, and his annual interest may finally amount to enough to eat a big hole in all that he can borrow each year, if, indeed, it would not altogether eat up the new amount that he could borrow.

Take, for example, the case of a man who is due about $100 adjusted compensation, and gets a certificate which will have a face value of about $250 if he lives 20 years. Of course he must wait the two years after he gets the certificate before he can borrow on it, no matter how badly he may need that adjusted compensation of $100 that the Government will have said is rightfully due him, and then at the end of the two years all that he can borrow is the handsome sum of about $14.

Think about it; these little dribbles that will be available in the shape of loans each year will eat the man's policy up so that he will not have anything at the end of the 20 years after all, and that sort of a system of small annual payments or small loans each year will run just as straight into a pension system at the end of that time as any scheme that could be devised.

Gentlemen of the House, it is an infamous subterfuge—this bill that has been ushered in here under the guise of an adjusted compensation measure. It will, I very much fear, prove to be a cheap and disappointing "gold brick" if it ever becomes a law in its present form.

Why are the administration leaders here, who are in charge of the legislative program, not willing to let the light in on this bill? Why are they not willing to allow opportunity for a fair debate here on the floor of the House on this bill? Why is it that they are not going to allow any Member of this House to offer a single amendment to this bill?

Here is one of the most important pieces of legislation that this Congress, or any other Congress, will have before it—the adjusted compensation bill affecting the ex-service people of the Nation, the people who actually saved this country and all that it contains from the ravages of the ruthless German horde. Those are the ones, my friends, in whose interests you will be legislating when you vote upon this bill—four and a half millions of the young people of this Nation. Their families and their dependents are interested. Then, too, all the taxpayers of the Nation are naturally interested in this measure.

And yet this bill is going to be forced up here to-morrow under the "gag" rule. There will be the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. No Member of this body will be allowed the privilege of offering any amendment whatsoever no matter how worthy may be the amendment which the Member wishes to offer. There will not even be the opportunity to offer a motion to recommit the bill to the committee. The administration leaders have determined, it seems, to bring the bill in here to-morrow under suspension of the rules, and say, in effect, "Here is what we are going to pass as adjusted compensation for the ex-service men and women of the Nation. It is the best we will offer and we will not allow anybody any chance to offer any amendment to make it any better."

Has that sort of procedure any of the earmarks of fair play? Is that a decent way to treat this important legislation which embraces the sacred obligation of the Nation to the ex-service men and women of the Nation? Bear in mind that this House has already recognized the obligation by voting favorably three times on adjusted compensation; and if it is an obligation, it is certainly the most sacred obligation that the Nation has or could have.

No, that is not fair play. I believe that the only reason they have hit upon this plan of bringing it up to-morrow under the "gag" rule is because they know it is but a poor substitute for real adjusted compensation, and they do not dare to offer it to the House in the regular, decent way, so that the Members could discuss it on the floor and have the privilege of offering amendments, so therefore they have hit upon the plan to bring it in under the cover and protection of the well-known "gag" rule and jam it through this House in that fashion. We will have only the one vote on the proposition, I understand.

If the ex-service people could have the opportunity to take their compensation or pay in money—and in money is the way compensation or pay ought by rights to be proffered to anyone to whom compensation or pay is due—the matter could be settled expeditiously, and the cost of the cash-settlement plan would be much less than the cost of these insurance policies or any other plan. The cost of the cash-payment plan can be figured definitely while it is difficult to predict what the cost of administering these other plans will be before they are done with.

To include in the adjusted compensation bill a straight cash-payment option would not only be the quickest and the least expensive plan but it would be the most satisfactory proposition that could possibly be made to a vast number of the ex-service people for whose benefit this legislation is supposed to be intended.

And a satisfied feeling in the minds and hearts of our ex-service men and women would be the most valuable result that could come from the settlement of the adjusted compensation question. [Applause.] That is what I want to see more than anything else. They have seen that Congress has already passed favorably on the principle of it several times, and I want them to have a right to feel that the Government has made good on the proposition that has been talked about for so long. I want them to feel satisfied in their hearts. But to those who are in need now of a little financial aid I do not see where these insurance certificates, with no borrowing privileges under two years, and then with very limited borrowing privileges, are going to be much benefit. But if the Government says an ex-service man is due a certain amount of adjusted or additional pay, and if the Government would offer that man his compensation in money and he accepts it, then that transaction is finished, and the man could take his money and put it to whatever use as he sees fit. There would be no aftermath to that in the way of continuous overhead expense to run along year after year for a long period of time, and very likely finally run right along into a pension system.

I know that the argument has been advanced by some that if these ex-service people were paid their compensation in cash they would waste it, and so it would be better for them for Congress to tell them that they can not have cash, but can have an insurance policy instead, on the theory that they would waste the cash. Now, my friends, I think any man ought to be ashamed to offer that argument.

These ex-service men and women are all adult people, just like we are here. Surely they are capable of taking a small sum of money and handling it as would best serve their own interests. What right, I ask you, has any Member of Congress to take the position that he should set himself up as the self-appointed guardian of the ex-service people of the Nation? What right have we to say to these grown men and women that they can not have this compensation in money because they would not have sense enough to handle it if they did get it? I feel that such an argument is a downright insult to them, and I do not take any stock in it. They know what they need better than anyone else knows, and I think they ought to be given the opportunity to take their compensation in cash if they want it that way, so that they can use it to their best advantage as they see fit. They would use it for necessities of life, which they are now in need of in many cases, or it would be used for different kinds of permanent investments, according to the wishes of the individual man or woman, and in any event this money would find its way rapidly into the channels of business in this country and would help business conditions in every nook and corner of the country instead of upsetting the economic conditions of the country.

On March 5 I was given the opportunity to appear before the Ways and Means Committee to testify regarding the form of an adjusted compensation bill. At that time I stated to the committee that I thought the bill should contain a cash settlement provision and also contain the one other option of a paid-up insurance certificate. That would give a man the option of taking his compensation in cash if he needed it and wanted it that way; or if he preferred an insurance certificate, he could choose that option. But let the man make his own choice. My statement before the committee was, in part, as follows:

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, as to the form of a bill to provide for adjusted compensation for ex-service men and women who served in the World War, we respectfully recommend and urge that the bill which will be reported out by your committee shall be a bill providing two options, to wit:

(a) Adjusted compensation in cash to all such ex-service men and women who desire cash;

(b) A paid-up insurance certificate, so that those who would prefer the terms of the paid-up insurance certificate to the cash may accept it instead of cash.

Settlement to be on the basis of $1 a day for home service and $1.25 per day for overseas service, limited to a maximum of $500 for home service and $625 for overseas service.

We are of the opinion that the uncertainties of the probable cost of all other plans and options that have been suggested and the possibility that the administration of the other options would run into endless bureau administration are good and sufficient reasons why no other options except the cash and paid-up insurance should be included in the bill which your committee will bring out.

We believe that a bill containing only the two options—(a) cash and (b) a paid-up insurance certificate—would certainly satisfy a greater per cent of the ex-service men and women, and such a bill would undoubtedly cost the Government much less money than other plans which would require long drawn-out and expensive administration.

In making my statement before the Ways and Means Committee I endeavored to make it perfectly clear that I was appearing there in a strictly nonpartisan way. In order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point, I beg to quote the following extract from my statement before the committee:

I want to make it very clear at the outset that we, as veterans of the war, are endeavoring to present our views to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives as positively and certainly a nonpartisan proposition. We are advising with the entire Ways and Means Committee and do not want to be misunderstood. I thought it was worth while to say that much, so as to have the record straight on that point.

Mr. CHINDELON. By whom were these five men designated?

Mr. JEFFERS. At a conference of the Democratic Members of the House, which was requested by the veterans of the World War on our side of the House, the object being merely to see if there was any unanimity, or what the idea really was about adjusted compensation becoming a law.

It was not a caucus and there was no caucus action, and we were designated to confer with the Ways and Means Committee. It is positively a nonpartisan proposition that we appear here before you.

The following extract from a story which appeared in the Washington Star of March 6, 1924, shows very clearly that it was not with partisan feeling that I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee regarding this legislation:

While the twofold proposition to allow either full cash payments or the insurance policies was advanced by the special committee of veterans named by the House Democratic conference, the plan is not binding on the Democrats as a whole, it was explained, and Representative JEFFERS, Alabama, chairman of the committee, asked that it not be considered as a partisan view.

The proposition received the support of several other spokesmen, including Representative MURPHY, Republican, of Ohio.

As to what the ex-service men and women would probably do with the money—and, personally, I think it is their own business what they would do with it—I beg to include in my remarks the following short extract from the speech made in the House on February 13, 1924, by Congressman EDGAR HOWARD, of Nebraska:

Seeking to know the truth regarding the manner in which the average ex-service man would desire to employ such adjusted compensation as might be paid to him by the Government, I joined with others in circulating among the ex-soldiers of my own Nebraskaland a simple question, reading as follows:

"In event that the Government should award you adjusted compensation, for what purpose would you probably expend the money?"

The plan adopted was to assemble the answers under general headings, showing the following synopsis of the views of the 1,000 men to whom the question was propounded:

As a payment on purchase of homes in cities and towns.....	280
For purchase of teams or additional farm machinery.....	274
For better care, better clothing, and more comforts for wife and children.....	73
For expense of a term in some business college.....	47
For expense of a trip to the battle fields of France.....	62
For expense of a contemplated marriage.....	18
To provide better accommodation for aged parents.....	12
To aid unfortunate and neglected soldiers of the late war.....	22
To aid a brother or sister to attend a teachers' normal school or State university.....	77
To aid in getting into some small business.....	32
To use for "any purpose I damn please".....	44
To help buy an automobile for pleasure or business.....	17
To buy new books for a law library.....	13
Number refusing to answer the question.....	47

Total..... 1,000

Now, much has been said about the possible embarrassment that the passage of a fair adjusted compensation measure would be to the Treasury of the United States. Let us look at that phase of the question.

We will begin with a statement made public a few days ago by the Treasury regarding the present status of the public debt. I have here an item which appeared in the Washington Star of March 3, 1924:

PUBLIC DEBT CUT NEARLY FIVE BILLIONS SINCE WAR.

The public debt has been cut more than $4,800,000,000 in the four and a half years since the Great War indebtedness was at its peak, August 31, 1919.

Figures made public to-day by the Treasury show that at the opening of business Saturday the national debt was $21,781,966,852. It has been reduced $933,000,000 in the last year.

Further regarding that same point is the following item from the Washington Herald of March 4, 1924:

Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, says the national debt has been reduced $933,000,000 in the last year and $4,800,000,000 in four and a half years. Your glorious country now owes $21,781,966,852. It takes a big, prosperous country to owe as much as that. And while we ought to pay off rapidly, we could owe five times that amount, and more, too, and not be bankrupt.

Now they say that if the adjusted compensation measure included a full cash-settlement option it would be necessary for the Treasury Department to issue bonds to take care of it. Well, even so, that would be very much less expensive than the straight insurance-policy plan that is offered here. It is an absolute fallacy to say that this Government is in such financial condition that we must necessarily take a more expensive plan because we can string the cost of it out over a number of years rather than put the full cash-settlement option in the bill. The full cash option included in the bill would take more cash right at first; of course, that is very true; but in the long run it would cost from $500,000,000 to $750,000,000 less than this insurance plan. The twofold plan, (a) cash settlement and (b) a paid-up insurance certificate, letting the man take his choice, would, in my opinion, certainly satisfy a great majority of the ex-service men and women of the Nation; it would be the easiest plan to administer; it would involve the least overhead expense for its administration; it would be by far the least expensive plan in the long run to the taxpayers; and it would be the best plan for the business people of the country, because the money would find its way rapidly into the channels of legitimate business of every description.

While I was before the Ways and Means Committee on this matter the following question was asked me by Mr. YOUNG, of North Dakota, a member of the committee:

Mr. YOUNG. Do you think that Uncle Sam is so hard up he has to pay an extra sum in order to get an extension of time within which to pay it?

My answer was that I did not feel that Uncle Sam was that hard up. Mr. YOUNG's question indicated to me that he felt that there was nothing in the argument that the financial condition of the country is such that the United States could not easily afford to settle this obligation now in cash. It appears that Mr. YOUNG's attitude was so understood also by others besides myself, as a newspaper story the next morning contained the following comment:

Representative YOUNG, of North Dakota, also plainly indicated by his questioning of witnesses he leans to paying cash.

I quote as follows from the story in the Washington Herald of March 6, 1924:

(By Universal Service.)

A cash bonus, coupled with a paid-up insurance option, for soldiers of the World War loomed as a strong possibility when the House Ways and Means Committee concluded hearings last night.

The decision on the form of the bill to be reported out is expected to be reached to-day. There is no longer any doubt a majority of the committee favors some kind of adjusted compensation legislation.

DEMOCRATS A UNIT.

The 11 Democratic members of the committee probably will vote as a unit for the cash feature, it was declared by some of their leaders last night. In addition, Representative FRYAN, progressive Republican, of Wisconsin, is counted on to vote the same way. Representative YOUNG, Republican, of North Dakota, also plainly indicated by his questioning of witnesses he leans to paying cash.

But, after all, when the showdown came in the committee the proposition of including the full cash option in the bill was defeated by just one vote. I am not divulging any committee secrets or any other secrets when I say that, because the story was freely carried in the newspapers that the full cash option in the bill was defeated by the vote of 13 to 12, and that the 12 who voted in favor of including the cash option in the bill were all the 11 Democrats on the committee, together with Mr. CROWTHER (Republican), of New York. If just one more man on the Ways and Means Committee had voted for the full cash option, we would have had it in the bill that is before us now; but it was defeated by just 1 vote when the showdown came in the committee.

Now, from all the estimates it appears that if a bond issue would be needed for the purpose of making cash payments of this adjusted compensation it would not take more than a bond issue of $1,000,000,000 at the very outside.

We have just seen that the present national indebtedness is $21,781,966,852. Could it be contended that it would hurt this Nation financially or seriously disrupt the economic or financial conditions in the United States to increase the public indebtedness only 4½ per cent in order to give to the ex-service people the option of taking their adjusted pay in cash? A few days ago I wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him about the present status of the authority which the Secretary of the Treasury has to issue bonds to meet any governmental expense without any special direction to him by Congress being necessary. On that question Mr. Mellon answered as follows:

From the inclosed pamphlet on Liberty loan legislation, page 11, you will note that the Treasury was authorized by the second Liberty bond act, as amended by the third and fourth Liberty bond acts and the victory Liberty loan act, to issue bonds for national security and defense and other public purposes authorized by law not exceeding in the aggregate $20,000,000,000 at a rate not exceeding 4½ per cent. On December 31, 1923, there were outstanding $13,462,000,000 of bonds issued under these acts, leaving a balance of about $6,500,000,000 which may still be issued under their provisions.

So we can readily see that the Secretary of the Treasury already has the power and authority to issue the bonds if they are needed, and when we compare the $1,000,000,000 worth of bonds that may be needed if we pay this compensation in money with the present national indebtedness of nearly $22,000,000,000 we can see how small a figure that would cut in the national economic life and we can see that the cry which has been raised that it would be a wholesale raid on the Treasury of the United States and would ruin the country financially is nothing but a smoke screen behind which the interests that are fighting adjusted compensation would hide themselves.

And who are these interests that are putting up such a determined fight to kill off any legislation providing for adjusted compensation for American ex-service men and women?

I will show you conclusively here to-day that those interests that are known as and are referred to in the parlance of finance as "the Mellon interests" are not the least of the great interests that have interested themselves in trying to defeat this cause.

In the first place, when the great propaganda campaign was launched in favor of the so-called Mellon tax plan it was linked, in nearly every case where the giant interests connected themselves with the propaganda, with propaganda to beat the adjusted compensation measure. Every Member of Congress well remembers the flood of that two-ply propaganda that reached his desk.

They were not only interested in the passage of a tax reduction program but they said that they wanted Mr. Mellon's plan adopted, and at the same time, with amazing uniformity, they all asked for the defeat of what they termed the "soldier's bonus." Here is a fair illustration from the Harriman National Bank, which is located on Fifth Avenue in New York City:

HARRIMAN NATIONAL BANK,
New York, January 8, 1924.

HON. LAMAR JEFFERS,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Harriman National Bank, serving approximately 10,000 customers, believes that the continuation of business prosperity in the United States is dependent upon the reduction of taxes, and it further believes that this can not be accomplished with the enactment of a bonus bill.

The bank has already devoted a great deal of space through its advertising in the New York daily newspapers toward apprising the public of their real and close interest in the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury for the reduction of taxes and the impossibility of such a reduction with the passage of a bonus bill.

In furtherance of its plan of campaign, the bank is desirous of ascertaining the attitude of the Congressmen upon the Mellon plan, and should therefore be pleased to learn your attitude toward the proposed legislation.

Very truly yours,

J. W. HARRIMAN, President.

You see that the Harriman National Bank, of New York City, says they have devoted a "great deal of space" in advertising in the New York daily newspapers in furthering their campaign for the Mellon tax plan and against what they call the "bonus," and everyone knows, of course, that a "great deal" of advertising space in the New York daily newspapers can not have been had by the Harriman National Bank without the expenditure on their part of a great deal of money.

Then let us look into the opposition to the adjusted compensation measure which has been offered by the Ex-Service Men's Anti-Bonus League and see if we can find the source of their great inspiration in this work.

Here we have a letter written by the national president of the Anti-Bonus League, Mr. Knowlton Durham, to Mr. James S. McCulloh, of New York City. Mr. McCulloh is vice president of the New York Telephone Co. To the wording of this letter I invite your careful attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman think this bill will be satisfactory to the majority of the ex-service men?

Mr. JEFFERS. I am right in the midst of a letter, but I will answer my friend. I have just said that I am afraid this bill is going to prove a disappointing gold brick to the ex-service men and women of the Nation if it ever becomes a law in its present shape. I do not think it is a satisfactory bill as it is, but what can we do? I want to finish the reading of this letter that I started out to read from Mr. Durham to Mr. McCulloh, of New York. He says:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS
EX-SERVICE MEN'S ANTI-BONUS LEAGUE,
New York, November 23, 1923.

Mr. JAMES S. MCCULLOH,
58 East Fifty-Fifth Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. MCCULLOH: Secretary Mellon's tax-reduction plan has started the antibonus forces over the top. We are on our way. And we are going to win.

All that we need now to make victory sure is to carry through the reorganization plans we have so carefully prepared during the past year. Our membership drive for a million members started last Thursday and is going strong all over the country.

Senators and other prominent interests leading the fight against the bonus state that no greater support could be given them than the development of organized veteran opposition to such legislation. We are going to provide it.

Twenty-five experienced organizers are to be kept at work throughout the Nation forming units and State divisions of our league up to the very moment the issue is decided. Concurrently 20,000,000 copies of the inclosed pamphlet—our message of principle and facts—will be effectively distributed to voters. This work in itself, with its attendant publicity, will produce a profound impression on the public mind and Congress.

It will require approximately $200,000 to carry out this program. A large part of it is needed immediately, and the only way we can raise it, Mr. McCulloh, is by appealing to public-spirited citizens, such as yourself. We therefore ask you to make immediate and substantial contribution to this fund.

We dislike to seem insistent, but if your help is to be effective it must be given now. Congress convenes one week from next Monday. May we hear from you by return mail? Every hour is precious.

Sincerely yours,

KNOWLTON DURHAM, National President.

Now, gentlemen, Mr. McCulloh sent his answer right back to Mr. Durham on the same sheet of paper. He wrote right across the face of the letter, in blue pencil, as follows:

I am with you and have given $50 through the joint committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce and Merchants Association.

J. S. MCCULLOH.

Here is the original letter that I hold in my hand, and the copy that I have just read to you is a true copy of this original.

You see Mr. McCulloch made his contribution through a committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce and Merchants Association. They were raising this money.

You see in the opening of the letter to Mr. McCulloch it is stated that "Secretary Mellon's tax-reduction plan has started the antibonus forces over the top."

You recall that when Secretary Mellon put out his first statement regarding his tax plan he warned the public that if the American people wanted tax reduction they could have no "luxuries," and he singled out one thing as his horrible example to hold up before the eyes of the public, and that one thing was the soldier's adjusted compensation. He started the propaganda himself, and here we find the so-called antibonus league begging rich men for money on the strength of the fact that they say that the Mellon tax-reduction plan has "started the antibonus forces over the top."

It looks, gentlemen, like one of the objects of the launching of the so-called Mellon tax-reduction plan, just at the time when it was brought out, accompanied as it was with the statement of the Secretary that adjusted compensation for the ex-service people was the one particular luxury that the country could not have if it wanted tax reduction, was to kill off the adjusted compensation measure.

Then here follows a letter written by Mr. R. S. Buck, of the Brooklyn City Railroad Co.—called Major Buck—and a member of the Anti-Bonus League, to Mr. George S. Davison. Mr. Davison is at the head of the Gulf Refining, which everyone knows is a "Mellon interest."

THE BROOKLYN CITY RAILROAD CO.,
Brooklyn, N. Y., October 2, 1923.

MR. GEORGE S. DAVISON,
Frick Annex Building, Pittsburgh, Pa.

DEAR MR. DAVISON: This will introduce to you Mr. Edward L. Allen, executive director of the Ex-Service Men's Anti-Bonus League, and I earnestly hope that, with such counsel and assistance as you can secure for him, he may inaugurate a strong and effective branch of the league in Pittsburgh.

My conviction is that unless we can make the vast silent army of antibonus veterans vocal, and that quickly, the threatened bonus will be passed even over the President's veto. The plan Mr. Allen will present, I believe, is the only one on which we can pin any hope of blocking this.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) R. S. BUCK.

P. S.—If you deem it advisable, I would like you to introduce Mr. Allen to Mr. R. B. Mellon and get the personal views of the latter as an out-of-New York banker on this whole proposition of the antibonus fight, viewed through the light of information Mr. Allen will give.

We see that in this letter Major Buck introduces a representative of the league to Mr. Davison, of the Gulf Refining Co., and also to Mr. R. B. Mellon, the brother of the Secretary of the Treasury, who stepped into most of the corporation offices and directorships for his brother, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, when the latter was made Secretary of the Treasury.

Then what follows? Evidently Mr. Davison got busy at once. Here is a letter from Mr. H. B. Rust, president of the Koppers Co., of Pittsburgh, to Mr. Knowlton Durham, of the Anti-Bonus League:

THE KOPPERS CO.,
Pittsburgh, Pa., November 17, 1923.

CAPT. KNOWLTON DURHAM,
President Ex-Service Men's Anti-Bonus League,
29 West Forty-fourth Street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR CAPTAIN DURHAM: Your letter of November 9 was found here on my return to Pittsburgh yesterday.

I heartily approve of what you are doing in this matter, and my first impulse was to send you my personal check; but I took the matter up in a quiet way and found that my friend, Mr. George Davison, was raising some funds for you and he wanted me to make my contribution through him. I saw Mr. Davison again last night and told him I felt time was the essence of this plan and that he should hurry his contributions to you. I am going to see him again on Monday and hope to make through him a substantial contribution to your cause, in which, as I have said above, I am most thoroughly in sympathy.

I think you are doing a great work for the country and for all the world. I agree with your position on the matter 100 per cent.

Very truly yours,

H. B. RUST.

Now, this Koppers Co. is another of the great Mellon interests. They are among those who would contribute money to a slush fund with the avowed purpose of trying to see to it that adjusted-service pay is never granted to the ex-service people of our country. Mr. George Davison was busily engaged in raising that fund in November, 1923.

These great interests were not only giving money to defeat the cause of the soldiers who stood between them and destruction in 1918, but they were using absolute coercion upon their employees to make their employees write to Members of Congress telling them that they were opposed to adjusted compensation. Here is an extract from a letter that was written on the stationery of the Chicago By-Product Coke Co., Thirty-first Street and Kostner Avenue, Chicago. The letter was written by an employee, whose name I will not disclose for obvious reasons. This letter was received by John R. Quinn, national commander of the American Legion. Listen to this:

I am inclosing two form letters which this corporation is distributing to its employees in wholesale quantities. The fact that the anti-adjusted compensation faction has stooped to this is sufficient proof of the hole in which they find themselves. You will note that in the inclosed letter, in which instructions are given as to exactly what is to be written, the employees are "commanded" to tell their representatives in Congress certain things, and it will require no exhausted stretch of the imagination to visualize what would happen to the employee (and his family) who disregarded the command. I have personally seen scores of the letters which are the fruits of this campaign. They are collected and brought to the main office where stenographers are worked far into the night typewriting them.

I hope this will reach our legislative committee in Washington where they may be used to advantage. Inasmuch as I am dependent upon my salary from this corporation while supporting my wife and myself, and educating myself, you will readily understand that it will not be to my advantage to have my connection with this matter made public.

Respectfully,

Now, this Chicago By-Product Coke Co. is one of "the Mellon interests." It is a branch or subsidiary of the Koppers Co. of Pittsburgh, and Mr. H. B. Rust is president of both. Here we have the Mellon interests forcing their employees to write antiadjusted compensation letters, under fear of the loss of their jobs, and here we have them contributing to this slush fund with which to fight the adjusted compensation measure, and not only contributing to that fund but actually helping to raise it.

And I want to tell you gentlemen one more thing about the Koppers Co. Here they are giving money to help defeat the cause of our own ex-soldiers and using coercive methods to force American citizens in their employ to sign letters against adjusted compensation, when it is a matter of record that one of the profit-taking members of that company was Heinrich Koppers, one-time minister of munitions in the German Government, who was actually in Germany during the war. We have record of a man connected with that company, Mr. H. B. Rust, contributing money to help defeat this cause. Let me refer you to House of Representatives hearings on war expenditures—what was known as the Graham committee—volume 2, serial 6, page 1279:

Secretary BAKER. Yes. Well, my whole contact with the matter grew out of the representations in favor of the Roberts oven. I investigated it at that time to find out whether it was true that the Roberts oven was a perfected process and was being discriminated against, as Mr. Roberts thought, in favor of the Koppers oven—and the latter it was thought was really the property of alien enemies, as the Koppers Co. was originally a German company, and, as I now recall it, some profit-taking member of that company was actually in Germany during the war.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Heinrich Koppers was minister of munitions in the German Government at one time, I believe. But that is not concerning us here.

Oh, of course, I know that in a letter to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] Secretary Andrew W. Mellon has disclaimed any knowledge of what these men connected with these "Mellon interests" were doing about this slush fund that was being raised, but he did not deny his interest in those business organizations.

But let us look now into a sworn statement prepared by Mr. Edward L. Allen, who was formerly executive director of this Anti-Bonus League, and see what that discloses as to whether Mr. Mellon knew anything at all about these matters or not.

In his affidavit, sworn to on February 21, 1924, Mr. Allen has to say, in part, as follows:

Shortly after said Batchelor—Bronson Batchelor—was employed he told me that he had secured an appointment to see Andrew W. Mellon through his intimate acquaintance with John T. Adams, chairman of the Republican National Committee. A few days later he advised me that he had gone to Washington and kept his appointment with Mr. Mellon. Where they met he did not say. At the same time he stated to me that Mr. Mellon had given his complete approval to certain plans—not explained to me—that he had submitted to Mr. Mellon.

• • • • •
 Maj. Richard S. Buck, a member of the executive committee of the league, and a consulting engineer for the Brooklyn Cities Railway, stated to me that he was intimately acquainted with Mr. George W. Davison, of Pittsburgh, Pa., who, Major Buck also stated, was very close to the Mellon interests of the same city.

Buck told me that Davison had talked to him while on a trip to New York, and that he would undertake to raise money for the league in Pittsburgh. On two different occasions Buck told me that he had talked to Davison on the telephone regarding the raising of money; the last phone conversation being held one Saturday afternoon immediately after Mr. Davison had been in conference with Mr. Andrew W. Mellon in Washington. Major Buck told me upon that occasion Mr. Davison told him that he had up to that time raised $7,500 for the league, and that the balance of $20,000 would be forthcoming shortly after his return to Pittsburgh. None of this was turned in to the league while I was in office.

• • • • •
 I am confident that not only is the man Batchelor being paid from this joint fund but that part of it was and is being used to promote and finance the operations of the recently formed national citizens' tax reduction committee, headed by Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan.

• • • • •
 I asked Mr. Allen what caused him to feel confident that some of this fund was being used to further the work of the National Citizens' Tax Reduction Committee, headed by Gen. John F. O'Ryan, which committee is an organization working in support of Mellon's tax-reduction proposals and which is not supposed to have anything to do with the effort to defeat the adjusted compensation legislation, and Mr. Allen stated that he was told by a member of the national board of the Anti-Bonus League that at a meeting of the board held in the board room of the Irving Bank-Columbia Trust Co., at its main office in the Woolworth Building, New York City, this same Mr. Bronson Batchelor, publicity man and propagandist for the Anti-Bonus League, made a verbal report, in which he stated that progress had been made in forming the National Citizens' Committee, whose function, he stated, was to work with the league along different lines in accomplishing the defeat of the bonus. It is said that Mr. Batchelor announced at this meeting that he had been successful in securing Major General O'Ryan to head the committee.

So we see the propaganda that was employed for a twofold purpose—to try to put the Mellon tax plan over the top and to defeat adjusted compensation.

We see what was behind the so-called Ex-Service Men's Anti-Bonus League. It all goes right back to that statement in this letter from Mr. Knowlton Durham to Mr. James S. McCulloh where he says, "Secretary Mellon's tax-reduction plan has started the antibonus forces over the top."

The propaganda campaign was un-American and some of the methods employed were unfair and unjust, and the result has been that people were soon disgusted with it and more people are in favor of adjusted compensation to-day than have ever been before. [Applause.]

Another thing which disgusted the people was the juggling of figures by the Treasury Department to make things look one way at one time and another way at another time. In other words, it has appeared that the Treasury Department has been able to give "made-to-order" estimates to suit the occasion.

When President Harding vetoed the adjusted compensation bill he stated, in his veto message of September 19, 1922, that there would be a deficit of more than $650,000,000 for the fiscal year and a further deficit for the year succeeding, even after counting upon all interest collections on foreign indebtedness which our Government was likely to receive at that time. Of course, those figures for the President's veto message were prepared under Mr. Mellon's supervision as the head of the Treasury Department.

What happened? The fiscal year 1923 ended with a surplus of $309,000,000.

The difference between that predicted deficit of $650,000,000 and the actual surplus of $309,000,000 amounts to a total of $959,000,000—almost an even billion dollars wrong. That was the "billion-dollar error" that we have heard about.

Was it an error, or was it plain juggling of figures and estimates? The World's Work is a well-informed magazine and enjoys an enviable reputation for reliability. Let us see what the World's Work had to say as to that. I may say that this magazine is opposed to adjusted compensation, but it appears that they do believe in facing plain facts. In the January, 1924, issue we find the following in their editorial comment on the subject:

His—President Harding's—campaign against the measure, however, has been based upon lack of money. The course of events made his plea a little ridiculous; instead of the enormous deficit which the Treasury Department had foretold, the Government ended the year more than $300,000,000 to the good.

The editorial in the World's Work says further:

In view of the strange course of national finances a year ago, this conclusion (that we can not have both the tax reduction and adjusted compensation) does not necessarily follow. If the Treasury forecast was so many hundreds of millions wrong in 1922-23, is it impossible that it will be so in the year 1923-24?

So there we have the World's Work, on its responsibility in its editorial columns, asking embarrassing questions of the Treasury Department.

Commander John R. Quinn, of the American Legion, has officially called attention to the now famous "billion-dollar error."

Then, gentlemen, just one month ago to-day, in New York City, Congressman BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, a Republican Member of this House, stated in a speech that Secretary Mellon had "misled" the late President Harding and that he was "now misleading President Coolidge." At that time Congressman FAIRCHILD, according to the press report, stated that Secretary Mellon had misled President Harding "as to the deficit of more than $600,000,000, which prevented President Harding, perhaps more than any other feature, from signing the bonus bill." And, "as it turned out," he added, "they were $300,000,000 ahead."

Furthermore, on that same day in New York City, Col. Thomas W. Miller, the present Alien Property Custodian, an official of this administration, just like Secretary Mellon is, stated, according to press report, that the Treasury Department had increased its estimates on the cost of adjusted compensation every time Congress asked them for estimates, because "it was felt necessary at the Treasury Department to use stronger and stronger arguments against the bonus each time it came up." Colonel Miller made flat charges of deliberate "juggling of figures" by the Treasury Department. Here is the article as it appeared in the Washington Post of February 18, 1924:

NEW YORK, February 17.—Charges by Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, that a "high Treasury official" admitted that department estimates on the bonus were "juggled" to deceive, and by Representative BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, Republican, of New York, that Secretary Mellon "misled" the late President Harding and "now is misleading President Coolidge," were made at bonus meetings under American Legion auspices to-day.

Mr. Miller did not name any official of the Treasury, but Representative FAIRCHILD specified that the head of the Treasury had—

"misled . . . as to the deficit of more than $600,000,000, which prevented President Harding, perhaps more than any other feature, from signing the bonus bill."

"As it turned out," he added, "they were $300,000,000 ahead."

Each time Congress asked for a revised estimate, Mr. Miller said, he was informed the Treasury increased previous estimates "because it was felt necessary at the Treasury Department to use stronger and stronger arguments against the bonus each time it came up."

When asked the next day if he had anything to say about the charges that he had made the day before, Colonel Miller stated that while he had nothing further to say at that time, that he would say that he would "stand right behind that," indicating the newspaper story that had appeared in the morning paper.

I believe Colonel Miller knew what he was talking about and that he was right when he said the Treasury Department was guilty of deliberate juggling of figures on the estimates at different times concerning the adjusted-compensation measure.

Since we have seen what Commander Quinn of the Legion, and the World's Work magazine, and Col. Thomas W. Miller, the Alien Property Custodian, have all had to say about the "billion-dollar error," let me show you what a young man down in my district has said about it in a letter to me:

I am writing to let you know that we ex-service men of your district are behind you in your fight for a just adjustment for those who served with the colors during the World War, and to call your attention to the fact that the same Mr. Mellon that asked President Harding to veto the "bonus bill" on the ground that at the end of the fiscal year 1923 there would be a deficit in the National Treasury of something like $650,000,000, whereas in reality there was a surplus of $313,000,000, is leaving out of all his figures of the present time some $160,000,000 that is coming to the Treasury each year as interest payment on the loan to Great Britain, more than twice as much as the $80,000,000—which is estimated would be the annual cost of the bonus. Mr. Mellon realizes that if this fact was common knowledge his slogan of "no tax reduction if we have a soldiers' bonus" would fall as flat as the head of a war profiteer or Le Boche. As I sum it up, Major, the fight is between the "great" interests and us ex-service folks. So "let's go," we are with you to a man.

Now, that boy has a pretty good view of the whole situation, and I may say that it appears to me that the "slogan" he mentions in his letter has already fallen pretty flat; whether it is "as flat as the head of a war profiteer" I do not know.

Other countries owe us more than $10,000,000,000. They have paid adjusted compensation to their veterans of the World War. Surely we can do as much for ours as they have done for theirs. We are immeasurably better off than they are financially. After the war was over the Treasury Department loaned $1,500,000,000 to foreign governments. They used it for what? Why, to pay adjusted compensation to their soldiers. Can we say that the United States is too poor to do for ours what they have done for theirs? England is paying us back now under the refunding agreement which has been reached with that country. In December last she handed over to us a $92,000,000 installment. That was $69,000,000 for interest and $23,000,000 on the principal. Do we still have those who would talk about the unbearable strain that it would be on our Treasury if this great, rich country of ours should award adjusted compensation to our ex-service men and women?

As Will Rogers said in his speech entitled "It Is Worth a Bonus to Wear Hand-knit Sox"—

That old alibi about the country not being able to pay is all apple sauce. There is no debt in the world too big for this country to pay if they owe it. If you owed it to some foreign country, you would talk about honor and then pay it. Now, what do you want to beat your own kin out of anything for? You say, "Oh, it's not enough to do him any good, anyway." Well, if it's not enough to do him any good, it's not enough to do you any harm when you pay it.

The following extract from Will Rogers's famous speech will be interesting to you, too, if you have not read it:

We never looked on a soldier in his uniform but what we who didn't go felt he was worth 10 of us. He went—did more than we even expected him to; now why is he not just as much to us to-day? What has he done to lower himself in our estimation? He still looks like 10 to 1 to me, and the same to a lot of others, if they will be honest and tell the truth.

You promised them everything but the kitchen stove if they would go to war. Now, a lot of our wealthy men are saying, "Oh, I am willing to do anything for the disabled but nothing for the well." It wasn't these boys' fault they didn't get shot. (I don't see them doing anything for the sick.) When he went away you didn't tell him he had to come home on a stretcher before you would give him anything, did you?

We promised them everything, and all they got was $1.25 a day and some knitted sweaters and sox. And after examining them, they wore the sox for sweaters and the sweaters for sox. They deserve a bonus just for trying to utilize what was sent to them.

They got a dollar and a quarter a day. Out of the millions of bullets fired by the Germans every day, statistics have proven that an average of 25 bullets were fired at each man each day. That figures out at the rate of 5 cents a bullet. Now, I am no agitator for an unfair wage, or trying to hold anyone up, but the boys in this bonus want the salary at least doubled. And I do not think that 10 cents a bullet is an exorbitant price.

At the price things are to-day, I believe that to offer yourself as a target at 10 cents a shot is not too much. Some days he worked 24 hours, but the pay was just the same. Those Germans would not observe the eight-hour law. Then they are not asking anything extra for gas bombs, air raids, and cooties. Those things they accepted gratis.

Now, the only way to arrive at the worth of anything is by comparison. Take shipbuilding, wooden ones, for instance. (That is the only way they ever were taken—for instance. They were never taken for use.) Statistics show that the men working on them got, at the lowest, $12.50 per day, and, by an odd coincidence, statistics also show that each workman drove at the rate of 25 nails a day—the same number of nails as bullets stopped or evaded by each soldier per day. That makes 50 cents a nail.

Now, I am broad-minded enough to admit that there is a difference between the grade of these two employments. But I do not think that there is 45 cents per piece difference. I know that bullet stopping comes under the heading of unskilled labor, and that shipbuilding by us during the war was an art. But I do not think that there is that much difference between skilled and unskilled. That makes him ten times better than the unskilled, while I claim that he is only five times as good.

I may be wrong in my estimation of the two jobs. Kareful Kal Kooldge is against me on this. It is the first time he and I have disagreed on one of the big questions. He is new and I want to give him the benefit of the doubt. I realize that our opinions have been formed somewhat by our associations. He has been thrown, especially lately, with the wealthy, while I have, except on very rare occasions, been thrown with the common herd.

Now, as I say, while the soldiers got no overtime, the nail expert got time and a half for overtime, up to a certain time then double time and salary after that. Of course, he lost some time in the morning selecting which silk shirt he should nail in that day. And it was always a source of annoyance as to what car to go to work in.

Let us not overlook the fact that since the war our Government has paid to the railroads of the country more than $1,500,000,000 as an adjustment of the war-time service of the railroads. Remember that that amounts to more than would be the total cost of cash settlement of adjusted compensation for our ex-service people. That compensation was paid to the railroads in money; it was not handed to them in any sort of script, or in an insurance policy. There was not any talk on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody else, about any bond issue, or any other special method of raising revenue, being necessary to settle with the railroads. Mr. Mellon did not say anything about that being a luxury—that was called a square deal for the railroads.

War contractors have been paid over $700,000,000 as adjusted compensation for their losses, in addition to profits amounting to billions of dollars. That was all paid to them in money; they were not required to accept insurance certificates for their adjusted compensation. There was no talk about hanging a special tax around the necks of the people of the country and telling the people that it was a tax to pay adjusted compensation to the war contractors or to the railroads. Mr. Mellon did not say anything about that being a luxury—that was called a square deal for the war contractors.

We well know that civilian employees have received adjusted compensation at the rate of $20 per month, or $240 per year. And this adjusted compensation is still being paid them every month. This has amounted to nearly $300,000,000 and no objection has been made to this on the ground that it was unpatriotic for them to receive adjusted compensation. We do not begrudge it to them. We know they need it, and I am glad they are getting it. That is a square deal for the war workers, or civilian employees.

Secretary Mellon is right now asking for a deficiency appropriation from Congress to pay taxes refunded for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1923, amounting to the huge sum of $123,592,820. That immense amount of tax money is to be refunded to big taxpayers because of alleged errors made in collecting those taxes. Some of these refunds run into the millions to certain taxpayers. That is a monstrous amount to be refunded. Yet Mr. Mellon calmly asks for the appropriation and does not say anything about it being a drain on the Treasury or anything about special or new taxes being needed to pay it; he does not bring up any of the pet things he always mentions when anyone says anything to him about adjusted compensation for the soldiers. I guess Mr. Mellon claims to be giving a square deal to these taxpayers to whom he is refunding this $123,592,820.

If a square deal for the railroads of the country to the tune of more than a billion and a half; if a square deal for the war contractors to the tune of nearly a billion dollars; if a square deal for the civilian employees or war workers to the tune of $300,000,000; if a square deal to certain taxpayers in refunds of $123,592,820 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1923; then why, I ask, in the name of common decency and justice, not some semblance of a square deal to the poor devils of American doughboy soldiers who sweat blood and slept in the mud for the homes and the wives and the mothers and children of America; for the preservation of the Stars and Stripes that we love so well; and to keep this beloved country of ours safe for the continued operations of the profiteers? Yes, to keep safe the great interests of the aluminum king of America, the great oil baron, Sir Andrew Mellon, who rolls in wealth and rides around in a big limousine and poses as this administration's first and foremost and most conspicuous conscientious objector to a very modest adjustment of the compensation of our ex-service people.

If anyone had told me five years ago that at this time I would be hearing the soldiers of our country referred to in terms that are now being used by some people in this country toward them, I would not have believed it possible. Letters have come in indicating that our ex-service people are unworthy now of our respect or our esteem or our affection. I would not have believed that it would be possible for such references to have come from American citizens whose lives and whose property were actually saved by these very young men of America whom they are now discrediting. They defended the Nation and saved it. They performed honorable service and deserve better than to be so talked about now. I am reminded of these lines of Kipling:

I went into a public 'ouse to get a pint o' beer,
The publican 'e up and sez, "We serve no redecoats 'ere;
The girls behind the bar they laughed an' giggled fit to die,
I outs into the street again an' to myself sez I:

O, it's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy go away,"
But it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins," when the band begins to play,
The band begins to play, my boys, the band begins to play,
O, it's "Thank you, Mr. Atkins," when the band begins to play.

I went into a theater as sober as could be,
They gave a drunk civilian room but 'adn't none for me;
They sent me to the gallery, or round the music 'alls,
But when it comes to fightin', Lord! they shove me in the stalls.

For it's Tommy this and Tommy that, and "Chuck him out, the brat!"
But it's "savior of 'is country" when the guns begin to shoot;
An' it's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' anything you please;
But Tommy ain't no bloomin' fool—you bet that Tommy sees.

You can just bet, too, my friends, that the American soldier sees the situation here in our own country since the war. As an illustration, let me read to you an extract from a letter from a young man who lives in Pennsylvania. I happen to know him quite well. He says in his letter here that he has just written to his Senator from Pennsylvania, and goes on to say:

I feel just as the little boy must feel who does not believe in Santa Claus—that it will not do any harm to write him anyway.

We have had a hard fight in this territory to maintain our strength in favor of adjusted compensation. We have been branded as profiteers, Treasury raiders, and penny patriots by all the newspapers, the chambers of commerce, and the president of every bank and corporation in the country. But, then, this is Mr. Mellon's home, and what Mr. Mellon does not control is controlled by men who are desirous of standing well in Mr. Mellon's opinion.

Do you know of anything that I can do to help pry our reactionary Senators and Representatives loose from their present moorings?

You can see that that young man has the situation sized up perfectly so far as the Pittsburgh situation is concerned. You can not fool them; they know.

The veteran knows you are just jockeying him now when you trot out this insurance policy and call it "adjusted compensation." He can very readily see that it is not compensation at all. He knows what it is. He knows that it is one of these "you-have-to-die-to-win" propositions. It is all very well for the fellow who is able to afford to carry the policy along for 20 years. But the man who really needs this adjusted compensation most is the fellow who is in urgent need of a little ready cash right now.

The man who is entitled to less than $50 gets his pay in cash, while the man who is entitled to $100, we will say, gets an insurance certificate. He can not borrow anything on it until he has kept it two years, and then he can borrow only about $14. He had rather have the $50 that is coming to the other fellow than to have the $100 that is coming to him if he has to take it in a policy, and if anybody will give him $50 for his policy, or even $25, he will, in a great many instances, be needing a little cash so urgently that he would be willing to sell his policy to anybody who would give him $25 or $50 for it.

The veteran knows now, after all the juggling of figures by the Treasury Department and after he has seen all these other vast obligations paid without disrupting the financial status of this country, that it is all a fake when you tell him that you can not pay him his compensation in cash because our financial condition in the United States can not stand it. The World's Work magazine, itself opposed to adjusted compensation for reasons of its own, has been fair and square enough to come out editorially, as I have shown you, and knock the props out from under that absolutely groundless contention.

Let me read you from a letter just received a few days ago from an ex-service man right here in Washington, D. C.:

Hon. LAMAR JEFFERS,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This morning's paper reported you as being in favor of a cash payment or paid-up insurance for the former service men. I have been heartily in favor of these two plans from the beginning and feel that between the two, that is, cash and insurance policy, they will satisfy 90 per cent of the former service men, whereas a straight-out insurance plan will only satisfy a very small percentage of the soldiers. Thousands of the boys are in desperate need of cash, and giving these men a paid-up insurance policy on which they could not realize any cash now would be just like feeding nails to a starving man.

The result of this would be that the country would spend from $2,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 and would only benefit the former service men who do not actually need cash now.

The magazine, Life, in a campaign in opposition to adjusted compensation, even went so far as to publish a cartoon which indicated that it was the voices of that vast army of American heroes who sleep under endless rows of little white crosses, tenderly and warmly enfolded in the flowered bosom of mother earth, and the cartoon indicated that those voices were protesting against their buddies receiving any adjusted compensation. The cartoon attracted a good deal of attention at the time. It was entitled "Voices of our dead: 'Keep the dollar sign off our shield!'" The American Legion Weekly, of January 2, 1922, carried the following article about it, which I think is very fine, indeed:

A GOLD STAR MOTHER'S REBUKE.

Life, as a climax to a campaign in opposition to the adjusted compensation bill, published in a recent issue the cartoon bearing the caption "Voices of our dead: 'Keep the dollar sign off our shield!'" Ex-service men everywhere were disgusted by the drawing and the sentiment. Of all the protests inspired by the drawing, none is more forceful than that addressed to the editor of Life by Mrs. Edna M. Barcus, president of the Indiana department of the American Legion Auxiliary.

Mrs. Barcus's only son, Earl R. Barcus, of the Rainbow Division, was wounded during the fighting in Champagne and sent to a field hospital. The field hospital was bombed and he suffered an additional and more serious wound. He was then transferred to a base hospital at Chalons in which he was killed during another bombing raid.

Mrs. Barcus's letter to the editor of Life was as follows:

"I have looked with eyes aflame with indignation on the disgraceful and insulting cartoon you publish in your issue of April 13.

"It is your right to oppose the American Legion in its effort to obtain a small measure of justice for those who were gallant enough to go forth in the defense of our country at great financial sacrifice. I can bear in silence the libels and the calumnies you see fit to heap upon the heads of those who yesterday were on the fighting front, fighting for you and for me, standing between your home and mine and destruction, standing between your bank account and mine (since money seems to be to you so dear a treasure) and the German indemnity collector. They were heroes then, but 'footers of the Treasury' now. I can tolerate your cheap cry that these same men now seek to impose a 'price' upon their patriotism. I can tolerate these things because the objects of your derision are here to speak in their own behalf, if speech is necessary in answer to such charges, so unworthy and so untrue.

"But what I can not tolerate in silence is your desecration of our gallant dead, 'Keep the dollar sign off our shield!' These are the words which you in your impudence put in the mouths that have turned to dust; this is your rebuke of the dead to the living. Is there a 'dollar sign' on those white crosses by reason of the fact that our Government has provided for the dependents the men who repose under them left behind? Did the shipyard worker and the munition-plant employee, who earned more in 1 hour than a soldier did in 24, put a price on his patriotism or the dollar sign on his shield?

"Say what you will of the living. Their backs are broad and their arms are strong. They can bear it as they have borne graver trials in the days gone by. But this I say to you:

"Leave our dead, of whom my only son is one, alone!"

In conclusion, there is no doubt but that the ex-service people of the Nation are themselves in favor of adjusted compensation. All the organizations of ex-service people are heartily in favor of it—this includes the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other organizations. We are all aware of the fact that many individual ex-service people have expressed themselves to us on the subject.

I just want to read one or two extracts from letters from individuals. Here is one from out in Texas. He says:

As one of the thousands of ex-service men who reentered civilian life badly handicapped by the debts unavoidably incurred in making the necessary purchases and other expenses in reentering civilian life, I want to thank you for your efforts in behalf of the ex-service man.

Here is an extract from a letter from my own State, Alabama. This boy says:

Will you kindly do me the favor to use your influence in securing the passage of a soldier bonus bill? I was a buck private in the World War, serving 2 months in the States and 11 months overseas. I think we bucks should have a bonus of some sort, especially as everybody else who wanted one from the Government seems to have gotten one, provided giving a bonus to us does not bankrupt the country and give the Secretary of the Treasury nervous prostration.

I thank you for whatever effort you may put forth in behalf of us bucks.

As a closing word, my colleagues, let me say that I am in favor of fair adjusted compensation for the ex-service people of our Nation as a matter of right, looking at it from the standpoint of merit, fairness, and justice. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, concerning the present bill for adjusted compensation to the soldiers of the World War, in which it is proposed in place of the cash to grant to the soldiers an insurance maturing in 20 years, and paying in cash all compensation that is less than $50, I want to say that this paid-up insurance may be desired by some of the ex-service men who served their country during the World War, but in my opinion, and especially in my State where the boys need the money, it will not be satisfactory in a State where its citizens are in distress on account of the depressed agricultural and livestock conditions. This bonus to many of these boys means much; the insurance means some recognition for adjusted compensation, but they can not use that for a period of two years and nine months, and then those who are not inclined to save will borrow.

Both forms should be presented to the soldiers; the cash if desired, and if not the insurance feature. We should be fair, just, and true to those who so bravely defended the Government, and to whom we promised to pay the sum, not as an insurance, but a sum due them for services rendered. Let us be honest and faithful to a trust; the boys have been honest with us.

The adjusted service bill to be presented to-morrow will give cash compensation to the soldiers having claims under $50, which they can secure payment of not before nine months after the passage of the act. It provides further that all others entitled shall receive paid-up insurance at $1 per day of home service and $1.25 each day overseas, deducting in each case the first period of 60 days' service. No credit of home service to exceed $500 and overseas $625, increased by 25 per cent of insurance that could be purchased at the birthday nearest the date of certificate. No loan application can be made for two years and nine months from the passage of the bill, if it was to become a law to-morrow, and it must show 20 years after January, 1925, before finally paid.

BONUS.

The ordinary American citizen in place of speaking of the bonus desires to say in plain English adjusted compensation, because it is not a gift; it is simply proper pay to the American soldier boy who gave his service to his Government in the hour of need during the World War.

It is so easy to pass up the services rendered the Government by these boys to this Nation and to the world and now say it was a public duty that each owed to the Nation; that it is unpatriotic and profiteering for them to come in now and ask for additional pay, while the slacker remained at home and received five times the wages the boys received, and while the profiteer fattened and made millions from the war by profiteering on the supplies and exploiting the necessities that were needed in the conduct of the war. It has so frequently been said that the boys were told that if they survived the war anything at the disposal of the Nation would be at their service; in other words, nothing that a grateful people could do for them within reasonable bounds would be withheld. Even political parties, both State and National, have promised the boys that the so-called adjusted compensation would be paid them not now, but shortly after the war.

Nearly every man in political life has made these boys this promise; from presidential candidates, Senators, Members of Congress, governors, on down the line in all political parties. Now let us make good.

It was so easy to promise and cause the boys to create a desire for this money, and it is so easy now to try to forget it, and put up all sorts of excuses and say it will bankrupt the Government if we pay it.

After the close of the war the Treasury of the United States found $1,500,000,000 of Liberty loan money, which we readily loaned to foreign Governments so they could pay adjusted compensation to their soldiers. This sum paid to our soldier boys in cash would settle this debt that we justly owe.

Canada to the north found a way to settle with her soldiers, England, France, Australia, New Zealand, and other nations made settlement. How about this Nation that boasts about equal rights to all and special privileges to none? Are we carrying this doctrine into full force and effect in dealing with our soldier boys?

Statistics show that there are employed upon the Government pay roll 3,400,000 people out of a total population of 110,000,000. The average pay can not be less than $1,000 each, and perhaps very much higher than this. Do we need three people as bookkeepers, Government employees, or Government servants so to speak, for every 100 of our population of the Nation, or 1 Government employee to every 11 working-men in the Nation?

Does it not appear that there is something radically wrong in the management and affairs of Government that needs that number of employees? Can this Government pay the adjusted compensation? Yes, most emphatically; separate 500,000 of these surplus, unnecessary, underpaid help from the Government pay rolls, increase the pay of the others employed at least 20 per cent, and still have money to expend upon the compensation due the soldier.

What class of citizen is complaining that there is no proper solution of the payment due the soldier of the World War? Is it the American farmer, who has profited less than anyone from the war and who furnished the food and to a large extent the soldier? Is it the laboring man, who always pays his part of the expenses of Government whether his name appears upon the tax roll of the county, State, or Nation; whose name though not appearing upon the rolls of income-tax payer, yet contributes his part toward the income tax in every way?

Now, who are complaining? It is principally the 22,000 millionaires of our country who do not want to yield over a penny by taxation toward the settlement of this proper, equitable, and just debt.

This Government did not shirk its responsibility to the veterans of the War of 1812, nor to the Mexican War, veterans of the Civil War, veterans of the Spanish-American War. Why should the exceedingly lavish, extravagant rich now be permitted to come in and say to this Congress "You must not favor the payment of this back pay due the soldier in cash, it will bankrupt the Nation"? Yet their funds can go untouched into undistributed stock dividends and tax-free securities.

The rich of this Nation have set up a golden calf and are worshiping it with all the selfishness that is possible. They are not compensating the soldier boy for what he has done to save humanity, although all this and much more has been promised from the press, pulpit, and political platforms.

We found the money necessary to send to Europe and every allied country found, either through us or by their own resources, money to pay their soldiers.

The position of saying that we can not pay this adjusted compensation in cash to our soldiers at this time is entirely wrong and from every viewpoint indefensible. Many of the wealthy of this Nation would bestow upon the soldier only the memory of the World War. Those who went to the front do not need this reminder; it was depicted upon their minds for all time and visited upon the bodies of many never to be erased.

Just recall the heatless days in the cold, wet, and miserable trenches. It has also been calculated that the boys on the front during the days of fighting had 25 bullets fired at them each day; they got $1.25 per day for this, or an average of 5 cents per bullet, for exposing their bodies to the enemy, while the shipbuilder or mechanic at home received $12.50 per day with a good home, food, comfort, and happy surroundings. Is this equality, justice, and equity, a motto made much of in this land of freedom?

England gave her soldiers in settlement of compensation $140; France, $233; Canada, $600; Australia and New Zealand, $409 each. So far our country has given $60 additional. Twenty-six State legislatures have indorsed the cash-compensation measure by resolution, 33 governors have indorsed the same.

Can Congress now say, "There is no method that can be worked out to solve the problem for cash payment"? The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee stated that there would be a hundred million dollar surplus in the Treasury under the Republican tax measure just recently passed by the House, and upon that statement the House felt justified in returning to the income-tax payer $332,000,000 income taxes for 1923. It is up to the backers behind the legislation just recently passed for raising revenue now to explain to the country and that they take charge of and pay this debt due our soldiers in cash.

Would it not be better to issue some more bonds and settle this debt in cash, pay the soldier just what the Nation has promised him, then provide proper, adequate, honest, and fair dealing with those who are disabled and need the Government's care and supervision when they can not provide for themselves, placing in charge of the Veterans' Bureau men of standing who have the care of the soldier at heart, whose conscience means protection against unjust and dishonest methods?

Adjusted compensation in cash to the veterans of the World War would pass both Houses of Congress and, if permitted, be put up to the President for his signature. The soldier who served in this war whether across seas or preparing to cross if needed, is entitled to this additional pay, and every right-thinking American who believes in the Constitution of this Government and in the principles of equal justice believes and sanctions this payment in cash to the boys who so valiantly defended humanity and protected the honor and integrity of this Nation when its honor was at stake.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one minute.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I did not know this morning that I was to have an opportunity to speak on this subject, so I received permission to extend my remarks in the Record, and my real speech will appear there to-morrow morning.

However, while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHANDLER], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, was making his speech, I tried to ask him a question but could not, and I would like the other members of the Ways and Means Committee to make a statement in regard to the question I am now about to propound. Last year the press of the country said of the bonus bill:

That spineless piece of unsound legislation, the certificate of cashless bonus bill.

The gold-brick bonus bill.

The pawnbrokers' bill, designed not to help the soldiers but to save political lives.

The bill provides certificates which they may "hock" at the bank or the pawn shop or the private loan shark's office on the best terms they may.

Does any Congress imagine that a hard-up soldier, out of a job, can make a loan on better terms than the Government of the United States?

Why tolerate a cowardly enactment like that with which Mr. Fordney and his confederates tried to soothe the taxpayers and the veterans?

Now, as I understand it, this bill is not much better, and, as I said, I hope the members of the Ways and Means Committee, as they talk on this bill, will explain the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, the Sixty-sixth Congress gave to each veteran the sum of $60, which at that period would just about buy a civilian outfit to replace the uniform.

The Sixty-seventh Congress presented a measure which was not intended to become operative, which would not have satisfied the veterans, but which would have disarranged the finances of our Government and made uncertain the responsibility of taxpayers.

The Sixty-eighth Congress again has before it the matter of adjusted compensation, and some measure will be passed, and the probabilities are that it will pass both Houses by two-thirds majorities.

A cash compensation will be the cheapest for the taxpayer, the most satisfactory to the largest number of ex-service men and women, without creating a new bureau with thousands of new Government employees.

Thirteen members of the Ways and Means Committee will report to this House a plan of paid-up life insurance, with the opportunity of only 20 minutes' discussion on the part of any of the 435 Members in House who may be opposed to their plan.

Millions of letters and telegrams have been sent on this subject; hundreds of thousands of resolutions have been passed for and against a bonus. Every great newspaper, every great magazine, every great labor organization, every great business organization, every public man, every political party, every candidate for office has discussed this question for the last five years.

And yet the Representatives of the people, coming from 48 States, 435 in number, are by this gag rule to be permitted a total of 20 minutes time in disagreement with the plans of 13 men.

This is monstrous! It is autocracy gone mad! It deprives the Nation of the united judgment of its Representatives. It eliminates free speech and destroys the theory of democratic government.

It is a repetition of the performance by the Sixty-seventh Congress, except that the proposed plan is less elastic, the limitation of debate is greater, and the gag-rule method is more extreme.

I voted against the so-called bonus bill in the Sixty-seventh Congress for reasons which I gave at the time; I have introduced a cash compensation bill in this session and, if given an opportunity, will vote for a cash compensation, because it is the cheapest, best, and most satisfactory final settlement that could be made.

I can not subscribe to a program which provides that no amendments can be made; that no appeal from the judgment of 13 men can be taken; that no discussion can be had; and which, reduced to a final analysis, means do what 13 men tell you to do or do without. It is a "take it or leave it" program.

It is a proposition which has not been submitted to the Nation or to the ex-service men.

It is a defiance and a challenge which should be answered.

These 13 Members know that if debate and amendment is permitted the majority of this House will provide for a cash option, and knowing this, they deliberately deny the right of expression by the majority of the House.

The right of examination by the public, the right of examination by the ex-service men and women, the right of examination and discussion by the Members of this House is to be denied.

This bill is unsatisfactory.

First. It will disappoint and anger 90 per cent of the ex-service men and women.

Second. It will cost more than the cash plan.

Third. It will create another bureau, at enormous expense, with thousands of employees, and prepare the way for premature pensions which will add annually billions of dollars to the burden of taxpayers.

Fourth. It will not settle this question, but will merely open up a new controversy and start new discussions, which will arise with continued and greater vehemence.

Fifth. It will crowd banks and trust companies with loans, raise the rate of interest, and withdraw from investment capital badly needed for expansion, building, farming, and trading.

Sixth. It will start endless discussion and disputes about the rate of interest charged by various banking institutions and create discord, uncertainty, and trouble.

Seventh. It will throw the whole matter back into politics, to become a football to be tossed back and forth for partisan political purposes.

It is time we stopped "playing politics" with this serious subject. It should be settled right and settled now.

The very uncertainty created by an unsatisfactory settlement will in itself be expensive.

Most service men are now in the splendor of young manhood. If they desire compensation because of loss suffered during war service, they want this compensation in cash, so they may use it to pay debts, to get married, to buy something, to invest it in their own way according to their own judgment.

To offer a small paid-up life insurance policy bearing its full fruit after death is a gruesome thing. It is a gamble with death. It means a coffin first and a settlement over a tombstone.

Veterans want to enjoy spending the money themselves. They want to spend and buy and enjoy now.

It may be a horse and buggy; it may be a "silver"; it may be a start in business; it may be a trip for pleasure; it may be a few acres of land; it may be stock in business; it may mean marriage; it may mean something for the old folks; it may mean clothes or books or tools or a present for the sweetheart, a radio set, or a coat of paint for the old house. It may be a wild "joy ride"; it may go to the church.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three additional minutes.

Mr. HAWES. But it is his or her business, not ours; it is their decision, not ours, that should control its disposition.

If we give anything, give it wholeheartedly, generously. Do not send a present with a skull and cross-bones on the wrapper.

Why not buy 4,500,000 coffins, with 4,500,000 cemetery lots, and 4,500,000 tombstones, and add so much more for hearses and flowers?

Why not issue a certificate which can hang in the home, which will say when John Smith dies the Nation's gratitude will be expressed by a fine funeral? Let John and his wife and children look at it every day and wonder whether smallpox, typhoid, or kidney trouble will finally pull the lever that opens the coffers of a grateful Nation.

When John Smith dies, Mrs. John Smith may buy a new dress, but John will not see it. Little Mary Smith may have a new doll, but John will not witness Mary's joy.

Why not do something for John Smith while he lives, while he can enjoy, while he can smile, while he can spend? Why wait until John Smith dies?

When a Legion post meets after the passage of this tombstone bill and each soldier lad carries his "pay-after-death" envelope and puts it on the table and then looks over his buddies and considers their state of health, he will wonder who will be first to cash on the Nation's gratitude.

Why make them gamble with death? Why not let them gamble with the vicissitudes of life while they are strong, in full manhood and vigor? Why not let them invest their own money in their own way?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield three more minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three additional minutes.

Mr. HAWES. Why make them gamble with death? Why not let them gamble with the vicissitudes of life while they are strong, in full manhood and vigor? Why not let them invest their own money in their own way?

Some will make it pay a thousand times. Some will waste it in a few weeks. That is the way of human nature. Let them take their chances while alive. Why force them to choose death as their paymaster? Let them spend their own money with a smile and see it grow, or see it go, in their own way. Let each man take his chance according to his own light, according to his own inclination, upon his own responsibility, and at his own cost.

Why should the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee set up their judgment as better than the judgment of over 4,000,000 men and women?

Are these ex-service men to be treated as wards of the Nation, without ability to select what is best for them? Are they to be treated as feeble-minded weaklings who can not be trusted to know what they want?

Do not present coffins as presents to men between 20 and 40 years of age. Do not treat our soldiers as though they were half-wits who require nurses or guardians.

We have had enough of death, of high taxes, of worry and pain and sacrifice. If we pay, let our boys have some joy and pleasure out of it now, when life is sweet, when ambition burns and pulses leap to the tune of life.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we could get up the gentleman's bill and muster enough votes to stop this bill to-morrow and pass the gentleman's bill, we would not be handing these men a gold brick. I am in favor of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I arise this afternoon for the purpose of giving the membership of this House and the country the benefit of some information which has come to me during the past three weeks with regard to the increased cost of the operation of the Veterans' Bureau.

Recently at a conference with the steering committee of the Republican side and other Members of the House I was asked to estimate, to the best of my ability, the appropriations which would be asked for in this session by the committees over which I then had the honor to preside.

Temporarily, for the last three weeks, as most of you know, I have been acting as chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. This committee was established in this House for the purpose of finding out, if possible, what the difficulties were with the veterans here, particularly those which could be rectified by legislation.

It has before it several bills proposed for the purpose of rectifying these errors and modifying and broadening the activities of the bureau.

For about five weeks now we have been studying the provisions of the so-called Johnson bill and the consensus of all these bills. Mr. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, is chairman of this committee, but is now absent.

We have had before us the officials of the various veterans' organizations. We have had before us the director of the bureau and some of the experts connected with different divisions of the Veterans' Bureau service. We have had also technical medical experts before us, and their testimony will make a large volume—and we have only about begun.

But what I am more particularly interested in, and what you will be more particularly interested in, is this: Perhaps two weeks ago I discovered of my own knowledge that proposals which were being made were going to add tremendously to the cost of operating the bureau and to the expense that would accrue by the proposals in the payment of compensation, dependency pay, and so forth.

And so I requested the director of the Veterans' Bureau to follow the testimony daily, and to compute as nearly as he could what each of these proposals would cost the Government in addition to the present cost of operating the bureau.

These figures become very apropos at this time, due to the fact that I have read within a day or two a statement from the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in which he is reported to have said that the reduction in the cost of operating the Veterans' Bureau for the future would be sufficient to compensate for the annual expense of paying the proposed soldiers' bonus—about $100,000,000 per annum.

And since my understanding is that the Legion was originally organized for the purpose of seeing to it that the sick, disabled, and wounded and their dependents in this country should have every care to which they were entitled and that the country could afford to give them, it seems to me that the figures I am about to put into the Record will demonstrate that unless we are to do away with the thought of all tax reduction, and unless we are willing to forget for the time being that we have a surplus in the Treasury, it will certainly be very disappointing to the public if we pass through this House to-morrow, or any other time, a bonus bill for able-bodied soldiers in the face of the necessities that it is claimed by the bureau and the officials of the various veterans' societies in the country should be first taken care of.

It has been stated on the floor by several distinguished gentlemen that the proposed bonus bill is not satisfactory to the Legion men themselves.

It has been stated, and you will find this statement on page 4180 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 14th, that the veterans of this country would not be satisfied with this bill, and would keep on coming back until they did get what they desired.

I refer to questions and answers between Mr. HUDSPETH and Mr. BROWNING:

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman is a member of the American Legion, is he not?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Are they fooling the ex-service men by making them believe that they are giving them a real bonus? The American Legion boys do not believe that they are going to give them a real bonus.

Mr. BROWNING. I do not think so.

Mr. HUDSPETH. After the next election the Democratic Party will give the ex-service men a real bonus.

This statement was met with applause.

Mr. BROWNING. I will say to the gentleman that if the Congress expects to get rid of this question, since the men feel that they are entitled to a real adjustment, it had better realize now that 90 per cent of the men want cash and are entitled to it, and they will not let us rest until we give them the right kind of an adjustment.

Now, gentlemen, I take it that that statement means that if we pass this bonus bill and it becomes a law, it will be considered by the able-bodied veterans an acknowledgment of the obligation of the Government, and a part payment on account, and that they will be back here next year, or the year following, for what they believe they are still entitled to—and the statement by these two distinguished gentlemen seems to me to be an invitation for them to do it.

What I am attempting to demonstrate here this afternoon is, that if it is going to cost in addition to the present cost of $500,000,000, $131,959,000 more, plus back payments, because of the retroactive provisions, also proposed, amounting to $112,400,000, making a total of $244,359,000 the first year, which figures I am going to put in the RECORD this afternoon show will be necessary to operate the Veterans' Bureau in the future in the way the veterans themselves, and the director to some extent, and the Legion chiefs demand, there will not be sufficient money in the surplus of the Treasury to pay the bonus and the actual necessities of these disabled and sick and wounded veterans and their dependents. And my first desire and wish is—and I believe I am expressing the opinion of 95 per cent of the people in this country—that first we should take care of all the justifiable requirements of the disabled veterans before any money is paid out to the able-bodied, if ever.

Of course, my own personal opinion on the bonus is so well known that it is unnecessary for me to make any statement with regard to that at this time. I would like, however, to make reference to a paragraph in a letter which I received this morning from a veteran high in the councils of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, in which he states:

While our post has deemed it advisable not to take any action on the proposed bonus, the consensus of opinion, as I find by sounding out the individual members, is against any form of "paid patriotism." We signed no contract with the Government for adjusted compensation when we entered the service and feel that we have no just claim upon the Government, unless we have suffered disability from services rendered, such as would incapacitate us from earning a living in civil life.

This man has practically stated my attitude on the bonus question as of to-day, and as of heretofore.

In giving you these figures covering the proposals I have referred to before, I want to say that no one can guarantee the authenticity of the figures—but the estimates have been made based upon a five-years' experience, and are the best we can get at this time, and can be considered reasonably correct.

In response to my request for estimates of the cost of these proposals, the director has advised me that as yet he has not been able to give me a formal official reply. However, he has been good enough to put at my disposal the data in the bureau from which he will have to form his estimates, from which data I am myself able to state as follows:

Repeal of section 310 describes the means by which he arrives at the result that this action will mean an additional cost of approximately $40,238,000.

Increase in the amounts of death compensation—an annual increase of $5,554,000.

3. Increasing the presumptive period of neuropathic and tubercular cases to five years, and including under the presumptive clauses organic diseases and constitutional psychoneurosis, would increase the annual cost $18,720,000.

If retroactive and the time limits are removed, there will be an additional cost of $71,000,000.

4. Neuropathic cases under this proposal would increase the cost annually $10,800,000. And it is proposed to make all these claims retroactive, which would increase the cost $41,400,000 over the annual increase.

5. Including the organic diseases in the presumption, which it is proposed to include, might cause a cost increase of approximately $6,435,000 annually.

6. Figuring the increased cost on account of insurance for three preceding classes of cases, would increase the expenditures by approximately $6,278,000 annually.

7. Repeal section 309. Repeal of this time limit would increase the annual expenditures by approximately $5,000,000.

8. Removing the prohibition of misconduct cases would cost an increase of approximately $2,500,000.

9. The proposal to extend the time for the filing of applications for training of those beneficiaries in hospitals would require an increase in the current appropriations of $4,368,000; and an increase of $13,104,000 would be required to complete the cost of training thus provided for.

10. The extension of training into employment as it is proposed would cost approximately $9,600,000 to train the present run, without figuring on any future run.

11. The proposal for home treatment with dependency allowance of $75 per month would increase the cost annually by $675,000.

12. The proposal to pay on the basis of permanent total disability all persons hospitalized for 12 months would cost approximately $800,000 annually.

13. To allow compensation as proposed for the hospitalization of those disabled less than 10 per cent would entail a yearly increase of $378,000.

14. The proposal for family allowances in permanent and total cases in the same amount as to trainees would increase the annual expenditure by $1,738,000.

The expense of the burial privileges as proposed by the Johnson bill would ultimately cost the Government, if availed of by everybody entitled to the benefit, $969,000,000.

The proposal of the director, extending the benefit to all burials without regard to exigency, at the increase he recommends of $50 over the $100 now allowed for burials, would cost $240,000 a year.

The general hospitalization proposal as recommended by the director would probably cost approximately $8,000,000.

The last two proposals referring particularly to the general hospitalization and burials are included in the director's proposal to the board; the others are all proposed by the Johnson bill and suggestions that have come to the committee from the different veteran societies.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Are these the figures which have been furnished to the gentleman by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. SNYDER. To some extent; yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Do they represent the maximum amount?

Mr. SNYDER. Well, it is impossible to get a maximum. We are just as liable to go wrong on the long side as we are on the short side. But I can give in detail what some of them are, if the gentleman desires, although I did not have time to get all of the figures ready for my speech.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Is the gentleman prepared to state whether he favors any of the propositions made by the three organizations?

Mr. SNYDER. I am not prepared to say which of these proposals I will support, but if I were and if I wanted to put into these figures the amounts which are proposed, I could add a billion dollars to them.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman says he is prepared to give us those figures, although he has not written them.

Mr. SNYDER. I have some of them in my mind.

Mr. RANKIN. If it will not take too much of the gentleman's time I would like to have them.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will ask me for the figures he desires I will try to give them to him.

Mr. RANKIN. For instance, the gentleman says that according to information received from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau it will be necessary to increase the appropriations for that institution $131,000,000 next year—is that correct?

Mr. SNYDER. That is correct, plus $112,000,000 which it would have to pay by reason of the retroactive features of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. That would be $243,000,000?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. By adding that to the $467,000,000 which it is now costing it would make the Veterans' Bureau cost around $700,000,000 for the coming year?

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. RANKIN. Does not the gentleman think that a great deal of that money is being used in a rather extravagant manner in administration?

Mr. SNYDER. I certainly do.

Mr. RANKIN. And that a good deal of that expense can be cut out?

Mr. SNYDER. But nothing that would be comparable with the amount that is proposed in these bills; under the head of administration you might cut off a few million dollars, $6,000,000, $8,000,000, or $10,000,000.

But one item alone, the extending of the period of time to five years in which to connect the disability with the service, will take in of tuberculosis cases alone 26,000 men and of neuropsychosis cases 18,000 more men, and the payment of the compensation to the 26,000 annually would be $40,000,000 a year, and the net amount for retroactive pay would be $71,000,000.

Mr. RANKIN. For the entire 43,000 it would be $71,000,000?

Mr. SNYDER. It would be $40,000,000 annually, and $71,000,000 the first year.

Mr. RANKIN. Would that be money going to these men or would that include the extra cost of administration?

Mr. SNYDER. That includes the money that goes to the men. I have an item of something like $8,000,000 that would be the extra cost of administration.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not want to take up too much of the gentleman's time—

Mr. SNYDER. I have about two minutes more of my speech.

Mr. RANKIN. Then I will not bother the gentleman further at this time.

Mr. SNYDER. If I have time then I will gladly yield. In closing, in order to restate my attitude on bonus legislation, I am now reading into the Record the last paragraph of a speech which I made on the bonus question on March 23, 1922, in this House:

I am absolutely opposed to subterfuge or camouflage in legislation of every form; and I am convinced that there is not one out of ten of the men in this House who are to vote for this measure who believe that it will ever become a law in the form that it now appears. If we owe the able-bodied veteran additional compensation, there is just one thing to do, and that is to create whatever burden is necessary to be paid into the Treasury, by some reasonable form of taxation, and to pay off that obligation to the veterans of the World War in actual money worth 100 cents on the dollar, that will be current for his expenditures on the day that he receives it. This bill does not pretend to do anything of the sort, and therefore for this and other reasons which time does not permit me to state, I am unalterably opposed to it.

Gentlemen, I made that statement two years ago. I see nothing in this bill which causes me to change my mind on the subject.

If any of the gentlemen have questions to ask me, I will be glad to try to answer them.

Mr. RANKIN. In that connection, did not the Director of the Veterans' Bureau state that men were being rehabilitated and turned loose now at the rate of about 25,000 a year, or possibly more? I have not the exact figures.

Mr. SNYDER. That is quite true. It was something like that.

Mr. RANKIN. That fact alone would offset the 26,000 extra tubercular patients that the new law would take care of, would it not?

Mr. SNYDER. Not by any means.

Mr. RANKIN. You do not think so?

Mr. SNYDER. Not in my judgment, no; because the gentleman is overlooking a provision in the bill which proposes to take all trainees and keep them in the employ of the Government until such time as they are mutually employed between themselves and their employer.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will be pleased to.

Mr. BLANTON. Within the last three days I have heard Member after Member get up here and, to use a slang phrase, "cuss out" the bill we are going to pass to-morrow under a suspension.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is one of them himself.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I have not found anybody who is in favor of it.

Mr. SNYDER. No.

Mr. BLANTON. If that is the case and if we men want to pass a real, bona fide bonus bill for the ex-service men, why do we sit here like children and let them push this bill through?

Mr. SNYDER. As I told some gentlemen here the other day, we have this procedure where 150 or 100 men can bring in a rule, why do they not use that.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I would like to see put in operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the national defense act of 1916, section 124, recognizes the necessity of establishing at some point in this country a place where nitrates can be best made or produced. This statute provides, among other things, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a site, the construction of dams, locks, power houses, and other plants and equipment where nitrates can be made in the best and cheapest manner, and convenient for the generation of electrical or other power for the production of nitrates needed for the munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers. The President of the United States is authorized and empowered to make such investigation as is necessary to determine the site upon any navigable or nonnavigable river where such nitrates can be manufactured best and cheapest. In other words, three things are contemplated: First, the production of nitrates for use in time of war; second, the production of nitrates for use as fertilizers in time of peace; and third, an additional aid to navigation.

The President of the United States, or those authorized to act for him, selected as the most available site for the construction of such an enterprise that part of the Tennessee River familiarly known as Muscle Shoals, and work was immediately begun in the usual war-time methods. Nearly $100,000,000 has been spent, or was spent during the war and up to April, 1921, in building the Wilson Dam, in constructing two immense nitrate plants, in constructing an auxiliary steam plant, in the acquisition of Waco Quarry, and the doing of many other things necessary to carry into effect the purposes of the law. This outlay does not represent the worth of the property. In spite of the $100,000,000 dollars spent, the entire work is now appraised at less than $16,000,000.

With the ending of the war the work was not finished, and during the past four or five years but little has been done toward completing it. In fact, all work was stopped in April of 1921 because of the refusal of Congress to appropriate additional funds for the completion of the Wilson Dam or for the completion of any other part of the work. The reasons for this are apparent. Public officials generally were against the Government operation of such a plant. They believed that it was wrong in principle for this Nation to engage in the manufacture and sale of commercial fertilizer in competition with private concerns already active in such a business. They wanted private individuals to do this. So a campaign was carried on for a long time by the War Department for the Government through the public press and by other methods, having for its object the leasing of this great Government enterprise to private individuals or a corporation, with the understanding that the lessee should carry out the original purposes of the legislation. No offers were made, however, notwithstanding this strenuous and far-reaching advertising for bids. The Alabama Power Co. and those other concerns that are now protesting so vigorously against the offer of Ford were besought for offers, but none were made. They wanted the Government to abandon the enterprise entirely, and, indeed, the whole Muscle Shoals project appeared to be a dead one.

The original enemies of the enterprise were encouraged as the scrap heap seemed to be its ultimate end. Friends of the enterprise seemed to have deserted it, and predictions were made that it would go as had other war-time enterprises, lost and unheeded. The Alabama Power Co. and its allies were laying back all this time, looking for what seemed to be the inevitable, whetting their knives to carve up the carcass. And no set of men were ever more disconcerted than were these same interests when Ford came forward in July, 1921, with his famous offer to lease the whole thing and to carry out all the terms proposed in the original legislation.

THE FORD OFFER FAIR TO THE GOVERNMENT.

The more the Ford offer is studied the fairer seem its many provisions. He agrees and binds himself to manufacture for 100 years, either as unmixed nitrates or nitrates mixed with other plant foods according to demand, and with a minimum annual production of at least 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen. This is a sufficient quantity of nitrogen to make 250,000 tons of fixed nitrogen. This is a sufficient quantity of nitrogen to make 250,000 tons of Chilean nitrate or 2,000,000 tons of 2-3-2 mixed fertilizer. And he agrees that his profits shall not exceed 8 per cent of the fair, actual, annual cost of production thereof. And this agreement is so hedged about that it will be impossible for him to make more than 8 per cent on the operation of this plant. This one provision of the bill will cut the cost of commercial fertilizer in two and will save the farmers of the United States during the 100-year lease period the sum of between $2,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000. And let it be understood here and now that the Ford offer is the only one that has been submitted that undertakes the manufacture of commercial fertilizer.

SOIL FERTILITY.

Few questions more vitally affect the welfare of the people of the country than increased soil fertility, and this can be brought about only by balanced fertilization.

We do not secure from our soil the maximum production. More cotton, corn, and farm products must be taken from each acre of the soil in order that the farmer may furnish the amount expected from him for general consumption. In order to increase this acreage yield, proper fertilizers must be utilized. Balanced fertilizers of necessity contain fixed nitrogen, which is introduced in the form of ammoniacal compounds, sodium nitrate, or organic wastes. What they signify in the production of food is revealed by the following statistics:

Fertilizer used per cultivated acre and average yield in bushels per acre, 1905-1913.

Country.	Pounds.	Wheat.	Rye.	Oats.	Potatoes.
United States.....	37	14.6	18.0	29.5	96.0
France.....	111	20.2	16.9	30.6	130.7
Germany.....	207	30.9	27.4	53.6	204.8
Great Britain and Ireland.....	244	33.4	29.1	43.5	211.7
Belgium.....	495	37.0	34.7	71.5	306.0

Prior to the intensive use of artificial fertilizers in Europe the productivity of the soils was similar to our own. The increase in food supply without additional labor and at costs wholly incommensurate with the gains has grown in direct proportion to the amount of fertilizer employed. Recent issues of "Semaine," Economiste Française, explains this stimulation of agriculture as follows:

In 1880, before the use of artificial fertilizers had become general, the average yield of wheat per hect, both in France and Germany was calculated to be about 11 quintals, but by 1913 the increased use of fertilizers had given an average of 13 quintals per hect. in France and 20 quintals in Germany. In Denmark, whose soil is poorer and climate less clement than that of France, a scientific use of fertilizer resulted in a yield of 32 to 33 quintals per hect. Specialists estimate that French farmers, by an increased use of machinery and chemical fertilizers, could, according to variations of the seasons, extract from average corn land from 20 to 25 and from the richer land from 25 to 30 quintals per hect. [A French quintal is 220 pounds. Hct. is an abbreviation for hectare and is 2.47 acres.]

CHILEAN NITRATE TRUST.

The principal source of nitrate is Chile, South America. Before the war about two and a half million tons of nitrate was sold annually by nitrate producers in Chile. The depression in Europe has cut down materially her market there. Potentially the United States is a market that these producers hope will make up for the loss of previous outlets in central Europe. At the present time nitrates imported into the United States are used by our cotton planters; they are also employed by sugar raisers and other farmers.

All of these Chilean nitrate producers, with a very few exceptions, are in a hidebound trust and are injuriously taking toll from every farmer by well-known trust methods. Previous to the year 1919 the nitrate producers in Chile were united in a cooperative advertising association. In January of that year this organization was changed into the Chilean Nitrate Producers' Association, which is a producing and selling trust controlling more than 95 per cent of the total production of Chilean nitrate of soda. The trust was formed only with the active assistance of the Chilean Government, and many producers were only induced to enter the combination by the threat that discriminating export duties would be imposed on the output of independents and that police protection would be withdrawn from their plants. The German firms held out until late in 1920 and only joined after the Chilean Government had tried to exert diplomatic pressure in Berlin and after they had been paid a large sum in compensation for their existing contracts. This sum was made up by a pro rata assessment upon their producers and, of course, eventually was recouped from American and other consumers of nitrate of soda.

The first work of the Chilean Nitrate Producers' Association was to run up the price of nitrate to 18 shillings per hundred pounds, which is about twice a fair price. It was found that there was no market for nitrate at this price and, to protect the speculators who had bought, the industry was practically shut down for a year, throwing thousands of laborers out of employment and causing indescribable suffering.

Because of the American antitrust laws the three American plants in Chile were excused from joining the association, but they do not come into competition, as they belong to the Du Ponts and to W. R. Grace & Co., and do not produce enough for their requirements, so that both of these firms buy nitrate in addition to what they produce.

Before the beginning of the nitrate year, on each July 1, each plant is assigned its production quota. Plants which for any reason can not operate may sell their quotas to others, and for the present season many of them have done so. They get 1 shilling per quintal—100 pounds—or about $4.48 per ton, merely for letting another plant work, at the same time saving their nitrate ores. The larger and better plants pay this amount for the mere privilege of working at capacity, and, of course, this unnecessary expenditure also comes out of the consumer in the United States and other countries.

With the exception of one new firm of fair size and two or three so small as to be almost insignificant, the Nitrate Producers' Association is the only seller of nitrate in Chile. It is highly probable that if there were no trust nitrate of soda would be much cheaper to the consumer, and nothing is more certain than with the least sign of reviving world demand "all the traffic will bear" will be the line of action.

The Chilean Government imposes an export tax on nitrate of soda amounting to 55 cents per hundred pounds, or $12.32 per long ton, and in recent years American farmers and other consumers of nitrate have paid annually millions of dollars in taxes to the Chilean Government. Surely this is enough, without having that Government support and defend an iniquitous trust for the purpose of further increasing the price. This trust agreement expired in January, 1924, but the Chilean Government and the owners of these plants—mostly British—have renewed it, so I am advised.

We must aim at a much more extended use of fertilizers in agriculture by a campaign of educative propaganda. Much has already been done in this direction, but anybody possessing a wide experience of agricultural conditions knows that the use of fertilizers is not anything like as extensive as it should be.

NITRATES FOR WAR PURPOSES.

The Ford offer likewise provides that should the Government require the use of this plant, or others which shall be constructed at Muscle Shoals, for the production of materials necessary in the manufacture of explosives or other war materials, then the United States shall have the immediate right, upon five days' notice to the company, to take over and to operate the same with hydroelectric power necessary for such operation, together with the use of all patented processes which have been developed by his company, and for a very reasonable compensation for the use thereof.

In this connection the fact worthy of remembrance is that this is a war enterprise, constructed to produce nitrates in the United States for the use of the United States. During the war and now the only available source of nitrate was Chile. We were compelled to transport this Chilean nitrate more than 4,000 miles in order to manufacture explosives out of it. The transportation of this nitrate, forced as we were to have it, was in itself a serious problem. If the supply had been cut off by reason of submarine effectiveness of enemy fleets our Nation would have been rendered helpless unless we should immediately obtain an enterprise such as was planned by the defense act. During this period we chartered Dutch, Scandinavian, and Japanese steamers to transport our nitrate from Chile. We built a fleet of 616 vessels, with a tonnage of nearly 4,000,000 tons, and of these we used 128, or 20 per cent of them, for bringing Chilean nitrate to the United States. If we are so unfortunate as to be compelled to engage in another war, the saving on this one item alone will run into the billions of dollars. And let us again remember that the Ford offer is the only one that guarantees that the United States will be supplied with nitrates in time of war.

AID TO NAVIGATION.

The Ford offer provides that the company to be formed by him will pay annually in installments the amount necessary for the operation of the locks and will supply the Government with power necessary for their operation. And it also agrees to pay annually in installments amounts necessary to keep the dams in repair. These dams and locks will make the Tennessee River navigable to Knoxville.

About $4,000,000 was spent up to 1890 on certain improvements on this river in order to make it navigable above Muscle Shoals, but none of these improvements were ever completed, and this money was virtually wasted. The construction of these dams now by the Government for the purpose of manufacturing nitrates will save the Government many millions of dollars that would otherwise have to be spent eventually in order to make the river navigable above the Shoals. And, again, let us remember that the Ford offer is the only one that agrees to keep the dams in repair and the locks in operation and without expense to the Government.

OTHER PROVISIONS OF THE OFFER.

Ford agrees in this offer to pay to the Government 4 per cent interest annually on all money spent by the Government from the date of the offer in acquiring land and flowage rights and in the completion of the locks, dams, and power-house facilities. Of course he agrees to buy outright nitrate plants Nos. 1 and 2 and pay the Government $5,000,000 therefor. He also pays to the Government semiannually amounts which are to go into a sinking fund, which if loaned at 4 per cent will reach the sum of $49,071,935 at the end of the lease period; if loaned out at 4½ per cent, it will amount to $58,570,003; if loaned out at 4¾ per cent, the fund will be $70,100,049; at 5 per cent, $100,869,642; and at 6 per cent, $213,134,690.

This is a novel feature of the offer and one which Mr. Ford wanted incorporated in the bill because it is his desire that the people of the United States shall have this plant at the end of this hundred-year lease period, cost free. The usual heavy investment requiring an annual interest return, which interest load is added to the cost of whatever is produced will be absent here, and the prices of the commodities produced will be much less because of this.

There are many other meritorious features of the bill; most of them have been covered by those speaking on the subject.

There is but one further thing that I want to mention here. It has been frequently charged that Ford will not supply surplus power to private enterprises, and this statement has been sent broadcast throughout the country in order to prejudice the public against the acceptance by Congress of his offer. Those circulating this information have forgotten the statement made by Mr. Ford on October 11, 1923, and which remarks of his were carried by all the newspapers at that time:

My offer is still before Congress. I shall not withdraw it * * * but I want to say this: If I get Muscle Shoals we shall run power lines 200 miles in every direction from Muscle Shoals. We have been working and have learned how to send power long distances without loss by leakage.

NO MEMBER SPONSORS ANY OF THE OTHER OFFERS.

Very significant is the fact that not a single man in this House has had the temerity to favor any bid submitted by any of the other bidders. Those Members of the Military Affairs Committee who filed a minority report refused to sponsor any of the other offers. They do not even favor Government operation. They place themselves, therefore, in the attitude of having no plan for the utilization of a water power which would produce 800,000 horsepower units. I realize that there are concerns in this country like the Alabama Power Co. and allied interests which are in reality foreign-controlled companies, whose selfish plans demand that they fight the Ford offer. I realize, too, that those of us who vote and support this offer are going to feel the weight of their opposition in some form. In my State, for instance, there are numerous periodicals which are carrying huge advertisements paid for by these same companies for the purpose of prejudicing the public against me and the others who believe in the utilization of this great power for the benefit of the mass of the people of this country. But the incalculable good that will come to the farmers and to all who are benefited directly or indirectly by the prosperity that will follow this development makes me wholeheartedly befriend this offer. I trust that this Congress will accept it and let us get Muscle Shoals to moving that it may deliver in reality the power that is lying potential and unused at the present time and is necessary for our convenience and prosperity.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GARDNER].

[Mr. GARDNER of Indiana was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I realize that this question of adjusted compensation has been thoroughly discussed, yet I am unwilling to permit a bill in which I am so much interested—that of adjusted compensation—and one of so much importance to be acted on without expressing my view on the subject. A short time ago at a conference of my party a committee of five ex-service men were appointed to confer with the Committee on Ways and Means as to the form and substance of a bill for adjusted compensation for the World War veterans. This committee of ex-service men recommended a twofold plan for such adjusted compensation—one the insurance plan and the other the cash plan, at the option of the veteran. This twofold plan is the one I am in favor of, and the one I had hoped to be able to vote for, and it is the one I think most of the ex-service men of my district are in favor of.

When I was a candidate for Congress I, in good faith, told the World War veterans that I was in favor of adjusted compensation for these veterans, and have been since telling them so, and I think the majority of the Members of Congress have made a like declaration. I have not changed my mind. I am still for adjusted compensation for these veterans. But I am for an adjusted compensation that is actual and real, one that they can use to their immediate relief and benefit; but I am not favorable to an adjusted compensation that postpones this payment for 20 years or until after the death of the veteran. I had hoped that a matter so important as this would be brought out in the open where each Member of Congress could have an opportunity to express himself on the subject, and, if he desired to do so, to offer an amendment to this bill and let the majority of the House rule instead of a majority of the Ways and Means Committee.

But, instead, this bill is reported out of the Committee on Ways and Means and is to be brought up to-morrow under the suspension of the rules, thereby eliminating all possibilities of amendment, and giving only 20 minutes' debate on each side and thus forcing a Member, if he votes against the suspension of the rules, to at the same time vote against the passage of the bill. This being such an important subject and being a subject so important to these World War veterans, it to my mind is an outrage, and it should be beneath the dignity of the House to act on this bill in this manner and under this rule. I would favor this bill if the veteran had the option of receiving his compensation not in a promise or certificate of any kind or insurance but in cash. I feel that if we owe this debt, which I contend we do, then it should be paid, and I do not feel that this Government is in such financial condition that we have come to the point where we are unable to pay our just debts. We were financially able to and did compensate the railroad companies for the use of their properties; we paid war contractors damages sustained by reason of cancellation of contracts, and paid the mine owners for the use of the mines taken over during the war, and such other obligations, in large sums; and if the Government was able to adjust and pay these large sums, why are we unable to pay the veteran what is justly due him for his honorable service? During the war he received for his services at home $1 per day and for his services overseas $1.10, while men not in the service were receiving four times and many ten times that amount; and he is now asking only an additional $1 for his services on this side and $1.25 for his services overseas. Was he under more obligation to defend his country in time of need than were these other persons with whom we have made settlement? Yes; we have done more than settle with these persons and concerns. Just a few days ago—February 29, 1924—Congress passed the revenue bill, a provision of which will refund 25 per cent of the income taxes of the year 1923 payable in 1924 to the taxpayer, amounting to approximately $232,000,000; and following the theory expressed by our President in his New York speech this tax has already been passed on to the consumer by a large number of the taxpayers. In other words, the business concerns have considered this tax in their overhead expenses, and it has been paid by the consumer; and when this 25 per cent tax is refunded it will not be refunded to the consumer but will be refunded to the taxpayer, who has already been reimbursed by the consumer.

Congress voted to this class of taxpayers, not an adjusted compensation but a bonus or donation. I am glad to say I voted against this provision of the revenue bill, because I had in mind at that time, and think now, that this amount of money should be used in helping to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation. I feel that the soldier is entitled to this compensation, and do not feel in his asking such compensation he is commercializing his patriotism, and I feel that he is entitled to the option of receiving this compensation in a cash payment; and I do not feel that the Government or Congress has the right to act as his guardian or say that he is not qualified to look after his own affairs, and use his adjusted compensation in whatever manner he sees fit and in the manner that pleases him. In the district I represent I have many soldiers who, as a result of their service, are incapacitated from earning a livelihood and who have contracted for homes and are now unable to make their payments. To hand this man an insurance policy payable after his death or in 20 years is a mere mockery of adjusted compensation. I would favor the issuance of long-term bonds for the payment of the adjusted compensation, to be paid in cash; and I feel that the payment of this adjusted compensation by issuing long-term bonds would not be a waste of money for the Government for the reason that the large majority of these veterans in the district I represent—and I take it that other districts are similar—are becoming our best citizens and are taking their places in the business world; and these men, if they receive a cash bonus, will expend it on their homes or in their business and thus make them more valuable citizens and taxpayers in the support of their State and their Nation. This money will practically all be expended in such a way as to be an aid and a producer of revenues for the State and Nation, and bonds issued for this purpose could be paid from the moneys due us from other nations.

It is my information, and is so reported by the newspapers, that 12 of the 25 men on the Ways and Means Committee were favorable to a provision in this bill giving an optional cash payment, and I feel like the veterans are entitled to this provision being written in this bill; and I feel sure that the large majority of these veterans favor such a provision, and it is disappointing to me to be unable to vote for such a provision, and I feel that they will and should resent this action of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I have expressed my views of what I think the law to be written for adjusted compensation should be, yet I am going to vote for this bill for the reason that it is the only bill for adjusted compensation I will have an opportunity to vote for at this time, and I am hoping if it is not amended before it becomes a law that a future Congress will correct it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dickinson].

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, during this general debate on the naval appropriation bill, under permission given, I desire to extend some remarks and express some views on H. R. 7959, a bill to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and which will come before the House to-morrow, on a motion to take up and pass the bill without right of amendment, and which will only permit 40 minutes debate. Therefore, I desire to say now that in the Sixty-sixth Congress in 1920 I voted for and made a separate report in behalf of a soldiers' adjusted compensation bill with a provision in it providing for a cash feature. It passed the House, but failed of enactment into law. I was not in the Sixty-seventh Congress, when the World War adjusted compensation act, known as the McKenzie bill, passed Congress, and was vetoed by President Harding September 10, 1922, on the assurance of Mr. Mellon that there would be a deficit in the United States Treasury of more than $650,000,000, and a further deficit for the succeeding year. What happened? The fiscal year of 1923 ended with a surplus of $309,000,000, making a total difference of $959,000,000—nearly a billion dollar error in the guess of Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon. Was it fair treatment of President Harding? And now, with this surplus of $309,000,000, Mr. Mellon presents the Mellon plan to reduce this surplus by turning it over to those who have paid income taxes out of their abundance, and calling it tax reduction, and saying you can not have tax reduction and also an adjusted compensation law, and through the Literary Digest and the promise of President Coolidge, and a propaganda without parallel, Mr. Mellon tries to compel Congress to do his bidding.

The Republican majority is controlled through its steering committee and a Republican conference; and the plan advocated by the Democratic minority and desired by 90 per cent of the ex-service men is defeated. And now this bill is here for action to-morrow, providing for insurance, maturing in 20 years. I have favored in this Congress an optional plan for cash or insurance. It is well understood that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee stood for and voted for an adjusted compensation bill, with both cash and insurance provisions therein, optional to the veteran's desire. This I have heartily favored and I have not ceased to protest against this bill in its present form, which omits a cash option. The bill now comes without right or opportunity for amendment in the House, it being controlled by the majority party, that controls the machinery of the House and refuses to permit an opportunity for amendment, and those who favor adjusted compensation for the ex-service men are compelled to vote for the bill in its objectionable shape, hoping that when it goes to the Senate, where they can amend it, that it will be amended and come back to this House with a cash option provided therein, so the House can vote again and for a real adjusted compensation measure, desired by 90 per cent of the ex-service men, who prefer cash to insurance. Such a bill would be cheaper by half a billion dollars or more, but those responsible for this measure in its present shape care neither for the increased expense nor the wishes of the ex-service men.

Great Britain, France, Belgium, New Zealand, Australia, Italy, and Canada quickly provided for adjusted compensation for those who served in the World War; but this country, the richest in the world, refuses here and now to submit a proper measure for our ex-service men. They prefer to do the bidding of big business and of special interests that have already been cared for by liberal legislation than to respond to the just demands of those who fought and won the war. The country will have a right to say that you have not been honest with the ex-service men. We are threatened with a veto if any measure at all is passed, and the majority here refuse to do full justice to the ex-service men. Its delay is due to the opposition of those on the other side, who have been in control in the Sixty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, and this Sixty-eighth Congress.

The borrowing opportunity on the proposed insurance plan is small and long delayed. Those favoring adjusted compensation insist on both cash and insurance provisions, and hope before final action that such a measure will be enacted into law.

If President Coolidge vetoes the revenue bill as it may be enacted into law, far different from the original Mellon plan, and if he also vetoes the adjusted compensation measure as it may be enacted into law, he will get his answer at the polls next November. If he does the bidding of big business that stood for the original Mellon plan and against the adjusted compensation bill, he may be nominated as desired by big business, but he deserves to and will be defeated by the masses at the polls, for they will not bow to the will of special interests, even if they do finance the campaigns of those who do their bidding.

The results of the World War have been worse, by reason of the unequal treatment to the soldier, who fought for his country and those who profited by the war. The country is not endangered so much from those who came back from the war, nor labor that toils while big business profits, as from the unreasonable demands and exactions of selfish interests. It has been well expressed by high authority that—unworthy profiteers have flouted their gains, crimes of violence have increased until they are appalling. Graft, connivance, corruption have affected law enforcement and at length the track of guilt has led into a President's Cabinet, and the whole Nation has been stunned by the revelation.

Men in high places and with exceptional opportunities for profit have wronged the country, while the masses struggle, and while the ex-service men naturally feel that they have not been accorded fair treatment.

The American Legion in national conventions assembled has repeatedly declared by unanimous vote in favor of an adjusted compensation law. Both the Democratic and Republican Parties in their national conventions have declared in favor of and promised to enact such a law. President Harding in November, 1920, in a speech at Cincinnati, Ohio, said the following:

I want to say to the ex-service men here that I want an America that will never forget its gratitude for the service they rendered the country. A Republican House passed the bonus bill, and it is now up to the Senate. I, myself, think it ought to pass.

And yet he vetoed the only adjusted compensation bill presented to him for approval. And President Coolidge, in his message to Congress in December, declared his opposition to the bonus. What happened? Why this delay with three terms of Congress, with a Republican majority in each term?

Turn your eyes to the Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew Mellon, who is said to be the third richest man in the world, the representative of big business, the beneficiary of special legislation, the most powerful factor in all legislation concerning enactment of laws affecting the revenues. He misled President Harding and caused him to veto the so-called bonus bill, claiming an impending deficit of six hundred and fifty millions, which turned out to be a surplus of $309,000,000. Now he seeks to control the action of President Coolidge by saying that tax reduction must fail if an adjusted compensation law is enacted. When the fiscal year of 1923 ended with a surplus of three hundred and nine millions the World's Work, in the January, 1924, issue, in its editorial comment on this subject says:

His—

campaign against the measure, however, has been based upon the lack of money. The course of events made his plea a little ridiculous; instead of the enormous deficit which the Treasury Department had foretold the Government ended the year more than $300,000,000 to the good.

The editorial in the World's Work says further:

In view of the strange course of national finances a year ago, this conclusion (that we can not have both the tax reduction and adjusted compensation) does not necessarily follow. If the Treasury forecast was so many hundreds of millions wrong in 1922-23, is it impossible that it will be so in the year 1923-24?

So there we have the World's Work, on its responsibility in its editorial columns, asking embarrassing questions of the Treasury Department.

And Col. Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, charged that a "high Treasury official" admitted that the department's estimates on the bonus were "juggled to deceive"—no just excuse for such conduct or for such mistakes in estimating the revenues of the Government for the purpose of defeating legislation in behalf of those entitled to the gratitude of the Nation and worthy of at least fair treatment.

Those in control can not say they are not responsible for the delay or refusal to give a cash option. Whence comes the main opposition? It comes from big business, that suffered no loss in time of war, but profited by every contract made, and had every claim liberally adjusted, and the enormous debt that burdens our country to-day is a legacy of the war, as a result of the more than generous treatment accorded those who profited by the war, while the soldier boy was drafted and given nominal pay. It comes with little grace from the war profiteers, and those who fattened from war contracts, and those cared for by legislation fixing their profits, running into millions of dollars, to influence this country to do less for the American soldier than was done readily by our allies in the war. No more wars in the future unless wealth is drafted, and no business or men hereafter will be permitted to profit by war at the expense of the manhood and womanhood of the world. Wars will cease when wealth and property are conscripted as manhood has been in the past.

In conclusion, I am more than gratified by a letter of appreciation of my support and aid given the ex-service men in committee and on the floor of the House for a bill that would have been satisfactory to the ex-service men, carrying two options—one a paid-up insurance policy, the other a cash payment, at the option of the ex-service man—and also for my assistance in helping to create a veterans' legislative committee to handle legislation in behalf of the disabled ex-service men, the creation of which will do a great deal to aid the disabled in obtaining justice at the hands of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity for the fourth time in this House to indorse the adjusted compensation for ex-soldiers, because to-morrow, under motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, there will be only 40 minutes' debate, and that time will undoubtedly be taken by the members of the Ways and Means Committee reporting this bill.

The bill is not as I would like to have it, and there will be no opportunity to amend it under the proceedings thus proposed, so we must accept it, for I do not believe anybody who has the soldiers' cause at heart will put himself on record as opposed. It is the principle that is highly involved at this time after five years of unnecessary delay, and it will come with poor grace for us to turn down our Ways and Means Committee, who have done their level best to adjust such differences as arose that the bill might be reported out at all.

There is a conspiracy among the ultrawealthy to take the soldier's penny. The management of the dollars begrudge paying for their protection. Selfish interests are fostering propaganda. Clever holders of swollen fortunes are greedily watchful lest they be deprived of any small part of them.

No country can exist without the spirit of patriotism. The nation that no longer sings the valor of its brave, that no longer crowns the deeds of the hero with laurels, that is indifferent to great achievement, is on the way to decadence. So to deny to the soldier this little paltry bonus is a species of treason, materialistic treason, all part and parcel of the terrible trail of graft and waste leading all across our Nation and into the heart and vitals of our Government.

Asleep in the face of danger, unconscious of the tragedy that impends, by repudiating the words we spoke so glibly of a grateful nation rewarding its soldiers, we render of no avail the bond entered into with the ex-service man and plant in his heart distrust of the pledge given in all honor.

Promises made to these men when we needed them must not be brushed aside, pledges broken and forgotten. Where are the safe jobs so solemnly guaranteed by the wildly promising poster or recruiter? Bitter must be the reflection of the men when they contrast those bursts of spurious patriotic frenzy with the coldness, ingratitude, injured, suspicious, withholding of those who jeopardized neither their jobs, their health, nor their lives, but stayed home and gleaned in their profiteering hoard.

Do not be misled by the tom-toms of the propagandists. The people want this legislation. State legislatures have petitioned, governors of States have requested, the House has three times passed it, and the Senate once; both political parties indorsed it. Recent county, district, and State conventions of my State, that send delegates for Coolidge, unanimously indorse it, and our President will not lack that intelligence, that balance of judgment that a man in his representative position should have, that when he sees he is wrong gives him the courage to claim the right. The country can afford what it wants. Can not afford it? Why, we can not afford not to pay it. No one but the farmers are going without the extravagances they like. We as a Nation are not too poor to keep an army of bootleggers in luxury. We are not too poor to keep the automobile factories rushing to fill their orders. The whole Nation is smoking to its liking. It is just that the pocketbook nerve has been touched by the published statement of our new dictator, that if the bonus is paid taxes will not be cut. How can he maintain that statement when that ill-bred, irrepressible youngster, the surplus, will not keep out of sight? These opponents of the bonus are twisting figures into strange and tortuous shapes to prove that the payment of our just debt will render us paupers. Smoke screens to hide pirate craft. The only industry we have neglected is the farm, abandoned in its extremity when the war was over. The ones who got the worst of it in the war were the men at the front line and the man in the home trench furnishing the supplies.

The way we have kept our promise to the farmer corresponds very well with the way we have kept it to the soldier. It is high time to redeem ourselves to both the ex-soldier and the farmer.

When labor was drafted during the war it was bonused. The Government employees are still drawing the war bonus, and look upon it as a rightful part of their wages. The Government drafted the railroads and at once adjusted their compensation without considering the act socialistic or paternalistic or in any way belittling to the morals or conscience of the owners by guaranteeing them a return equal to their average for the three years preceding. Contractors and manufacturers, munition makers, and all who were by way of suffering loss when the war ended were reimbursed.

As an act of simple justice to all, the five-year delay of the adjusted compensation of the soldier should be ended and that speedily. The matter would have been settled in 1921 had it not been vetoed by President Harding, and he would not have vetoed it had it not been for the billion dollar mistake of that wonderfully scientific juggler of figures, the Secretary of the Treasury.

The soldier did not stop to reckon the cost to himself. Canada has given her soldiers $540 each in adjusted compensation. England, France, and Australia—in fact, all our allies—have given their ex-soldiers bonuses. The Civil War veterans got substantial remembrances in the way of land.

It did not seem to hurt the per cent of patriotism of Lincoln or Washington or Grant or Sheridan or Farragut that they were bonused. This talk about patriotism for sale comes loudest from the throats of those who kick on paying war taxes. They say, "The war is over. It is ridiculous to ask us to keep on paying war taxes." But the war debt is not over. So let those pay for whom most of all the war was fought, who gave least and received most. And let them not be penny-wise with the boys. I hate to think that if it passes now it goes all smeared up, grudged, talked out, the fine flavor of a spontaneous offering squeezed out, and late—five years too late. The opponents of the bonus have even made it appear that the soldiers themselves are against it. That would not be so hard. They have pride. A lot of them would keep silent, feeling that if the thing did not come freely it was not for them to force it. They grew to be a silent lot over there under their grim and terrible experience. Coming back was like returning to a world that knew nothing of the thing they had seen and been part of. There was no common ground on which to meet. They came into the habit of keeping to themselves all they had felt and suffered, so out of touch and unresponsive they felt all other minds to be with their own. Then employers who were against the bonus would not have to use tremendous pressure to induce the boys to sign an antibonus statement. Jobs are hard to get for the man who lost step, suffered an economic handicap by being gone, and whose whole mental life was jostled out of gear. Hard for him to bear the steady discipline and restraint of the return to normal. If he was fortunate enough to get a job, he would take no chance on losing it. Yes; he would sign such a paper.

I have said before on this floor—but it can not be said too often, in view of the foreign propaganda weighted against it—that it was the soul of America that won the war. It is our business to preserve that soul, that spirit, to keep alive the patriotism that is the defense of the Nation. It is criminal folly and shows a grave lack of moral sense to try to argue down our obligations in this matter. To leave our promises unfulfilled is an aspersion on our flag; we should be remiss in our duty to the Nation and to patriotism if we meanly allow the bribe of a dollar or so apiece in lower taxes to wean us from our obligations.

How many times were we assured that our boys were fighting "to make the world safe for democracy"? But, instead, it seems to be more and more safe for materialism. That very foreign country for which we sacrificed so much is using all her resources to build up a militarism far exceeding in power and autocracy the one we helped her to destroy. We should not be a bit hesitant in demanding that our foreign debts be paid us. The same people that advocate canceling our foreign debts are those most prominent in asking us to repudiate our obligations to our own soldiers. The United States was built on that wonderful soul power. We should cherish, not bruise it; render it honor and homage, not snub it as if it were a pertinacious beggar. The flag means the boys that defended it. Are you for the flag or for self? For the soul of the Nation or for materialism? For keeping our promises or for the paltry dollar and what it represents? Are you for duty, justice, honor, humanity, or are you for Mammon and his millions behind the throne? Are you for Uncle Sam or for imperialistic internationalism? It is a pittance. It can not begin to compensate. I know what the boys went through. I was in the ill-smelling, muddy, filthy, vermin-infested trenches. I know what they suffered in the wrack of strung-up nerves, in the soul-shattering din and confusion, the inexpressible exhaustion, the thirst and hunger, the torture and suffering from shock and gas and wounds.

I know their danger on the sea from lurking submarine. I was on the Mount Vernon when it was torpedoed 250 miles off Brest—the deafening crash, the scalding steam, the tearing splinters of glass and timber; one instant in life and strength; the next crushed, maimed, or dead. Such the hazard of war on sea and land. I know the soul that fought this war and the spirit that won it. They carried on. They did the job they were sent out to do. It is up to us to stop wrangling, do our duty, keep our promise, and erase the tarnish too long sullying our Nation's honor. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. GASQUE].

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the few minutes allotted to me I want to discuss the soldiers' bonus or adjusted compensation measure from the standpoint of one who stayed at home and enjoyed the comforts of life while those brave young men of ours, the flower of our country, went to the front and suffered all the hardships of life, many of them giving their life for the defense of our country and its future. Many of them did not go of their own accord, but went because we sent them; drafted them and told them they must go. I am under no political promise regarding this measure; I made no promises; was not asked my position on this question in my campaign, but want, however, to put myself on record here as being in favor of an adjusted compensation act. I have always been in favor of it and shall support it as a matter of principle. With regards to the bill I understand is to come before us to-morrow, I have this to say: The first question for Congress to decide is, Shall we pay a bonus? If so, why and what kind of a bonus? I say we should. First, because we promised them, from one end of the country to the other when they were sent, that when they came back we would give them anything they wanted. We paid them while in service a niggardly wage, less than one-third the wage the most ordinary common laborer received who stayed at home. Many of them were taken from gainful occupations, were accumulating wealth, succeeding in their professions, and laid down all, left their families and loved ones to defend this country for themselves alone? No.

They came home, some of them; some did not. Those who came back came without a penny. Life had to be begun anew. Many who had stayed at home had, owing to war conditions, accumulated wealth faster than ever before; thousands of fortunes had been made; thousands, it is said, had been made millionaires. In many instances, if not all cases, this was due to the war; and many of these millionaires thus made stayed at home, I am convinced, for this purpose, men who themselves should have gone. However, their success in business, the accumulation of these millions, was made possible by these brave boys who left their all and saved this country from its enemies. These boys, as I have said, came back without money, began life from the start. Trusting in our promises, they asked the Government to do what its people had promised, give them a little additional compensation for their services to enable them to get a start. This great Government refused and told them they ought to be ashamed of themselves to put a price on their patriotism. This was not and is not now the sentiment of the Nation. The very men who profited most by the war, the men who stayed home and accumulated their millions, are now organized in spreading propaganda against the bonus—the very men who should be glad to pay. This is one reason I am so strong for it. A letter received a few days ago from an ex-service officer, who has been against this measure, to some extent states my position from this angle:

FLORENCE PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Florence, S. C., February 19, 1924.

Hon. A. H. GASQUE,

United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GASQUE: Three years ago I was very much opposed to the bonus and was very proud of the stand taken by South Carolina. Until about a year ago I was inclined to be somewhat scornful of the Senators and Congressmen who were coming out in favor of the bonus. In the light of disclosures made during the last 15 months I have changed my mind. Unquestionably many of those most actively opposing the bonus profited in the grossest way during the war, and personally I should like to see them made to disgorge.

I regard it as most regrettable that ex-service men or any ex-service organization should be in the position of asking for adjusted compensation, or any sort of compensation, for the performance of their duty. It seems to me that it would be the proper thing and a fine thing if this movement for adjusted compensation were coming from the very ones who are opposing it. I might say just here that, though I am an ex-service man, I will not participate in the bonus at all, as my rank at any time was not below that of major. Just in conclusion I will say that I hope that the South Carolina delegation to a man will vote against the selfish stand being taken by those who profited highly by the war. I believe you will agree with me that many of them deliberately stayed at home in order to do just the thing that they did.

Cordially yours,

JNO. W. MOORE.

This, to some extent, convinces me that I should vote for it. These men asked for it, and have made a very modest request and we should keep our promise. I propose to keep mine.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GASQUE. Yes; I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman think of one single reason why we should not give them this bonus?

Mr. GASQUE. I can not think of a single reason why we should not. Especially those of us who stayed at home. I am somewhat disappointed, however, Mr. Chairman, because, as I understand it, I shall not be able to vote for the kind of bill they ask for. I understand that the bill that is to come before us to-morrow is a bill that does not give them what they ask. I know that the ex-service men in my part of the country want a cash bonus with an insurance option. I have talked with hundreds of them personally before Congress convened, and this is the information I got, and now the American Legion, I understand, is asking this. One of the principal reasons for the passage of a bonus bill, as I have stated, is to give these boys what they ask for; that is, keep our promise to them. This bill will not do that. It is dodging the issue. It appears to be a measure conceived by those opposed to the real issue and who hope to defeat it. I know that a majority of this House is in favor of a cash bonus with insurance option bill, but we are forced to vote on another bill or none at all. Mr. Mellon and his class will not permit us to vote on a real bonus bill. I shall support this bill, however, as better than nothing, in the hope it will come back from the Senate a real bonus measure, such as is being asked for by the men we should be willing to do anything for. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, at the hearings by a joint subcommittee composed of members of the Senate and House Post Office Committees held in the Senate Office Building, March 3 to 10, 1924, I observed a number of important matters that to my mind the Members of Congress should be acquainted with.

As a member of the joint subcommittee I attended all the meetings and paid strict attention to the Post Office Department officials and representatives of the several groups of postal employees who submitted testimony bearing upon the particular subject. I was greatly impressed at the sight of more than 200 United States Senators and Representatives in Congress who appeared before the joint subcommittee and without exception recorded themselves in favor of legislation for increase in pay for the different groups of employees.

The hearings opened on the morning of March 3 with Mr. Joseph Stewart, special assistant to the Attorney General, who appeared for the Postmaster General. In his opening remarks Mr. Stewart read a letter from the Postmaster General which called attention to the effect that the proposed increases in salaries would have on the revenues of the department if granted. While the Postmaster General did not oppose the proposed legislation, he stated that he was of the opinion that the question should be referred to a commission for investigation. The joint subcommittee was in no mood to seriously consider further delay, as could be noted by the expression of several members of the committee. The chairman informed the representative of the Postmaster General that the committee intended to settle the question at this session of Congress. Other representatives of the department in the persons of the Superintendent of Division of Post Office Service, the chief clerk of the post office inspection division, the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and the General Superintendent of the Division of Rural Mails gave the committee information regarding the cost of the several bills under consideration and the changes they proposed in the present law. It was plainly evident to all present that these department officials were not in favor of increasing the salaries of the postal workers notwithstanding the fact that many of the chiefs of the Post Office Department have had their salaries substantially increased in the Post Office appropriation bill which will become effective July 1, 1924.

When the department officials finished giving their testimony, representatives of the several groups of employees testified in favor of the different bills, and particularly the two bills, H. R. 4123 and S. 1898, known as the Kelly-Edge bill, and H. R. 7016, known as the Paige bill. A number of representatives of the post-office clerks submitted their views. The representatives of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks testified in favor of H. R. 4123 and S. 1898, while the representatives of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks gave testimony in favor of H. R. 7016. The Kelly-Edge bill provides three grades for clerks and carriers, as follows:

	Salary.
First grade.....	$2,000
Second grade.....	2,200
Third grade.....	2,400

The Paige bill provides for five grades for clerks and carriers, as follows:

	Salary.
First grade.....	$1,600
Second grade.....	1,800
Third grade.....	2,000
Fourth grade.....	2,200
Fifth grade.....	2,400

While each group of representatives advocated the same maximum of $2,400, they seemed to differ on the minimum grade. Representatives of the supervisory officials' association, the post-office inspectors, the supervisors of the Railway Mail Service, the railway mail clerks, the post-office laborers, the employees in the motor-vehicle service, the rural delivery carriers, the postmasters of first-class post offices, and representatives of the third and fourth class postmasters, and the National Association of Letter Carriers submitted testimony showing the necessity for an increase in pay for the men they represented.

The council of administration of the National Association of Letter Carriers, through their national secretary, submitted a brief to the committee which contained an argument that in my opinion is unanswerable. The brief contains information on the duties of letter carriers, their training, and apprenticeship, the comparison with other skilled trades, the effect of the increased cost of living on the salaries paid to letter carriers, the present rates of salaries compared with other wage rates, standard minimum budgets, the effect of the present low salaries on the efficiency of the Postal Service, the productivity of letter carriers, the estimated cost of the proposed legislation, and the relation of cost of the service to the postal deficit. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have read and reread this brief and I commend its contents to every Member of this House who desires authentic information regarding the necessity for an increase in salaries not only of letter carriers but of every employee in the Postal Service.

I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams from all sections of my district relative to increase in salaries for postal employees and the betterment of their condition. I have received letters of indorsement from the New York State Legislature, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, Kiwanis and Rotary clubs, labor organizations, women's organizations, and citizens in all walks of life. In fact, I have not heard a word in opposition to the proposed legislation, but on the contrary the sentiment has been unanimous in its favor.

Of the 235 or more Senators and Representatives in Congress who appeared and testified before the joint subcommittee a majority of them informed the committee that they were there not only in behalf of the proposed legislation, but to represent the views of their constituents who, without regard to the business in which they were engaged, had written and indorsed the legislation for increase in salaries for postal workers.

In the course of the hearings on the several bills pending before the joint subcommittee I was greatly impressed with the loyalty of the postal employees as testified by the representatives of the several groups. They did not seek glory either for themselves or the men they represented, but nearly every one of them urged that Congress make the pay and working conditions of postal workers such that the proper class of men will take the civil-service examinations and restore the service to its former state of efficiency. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the Postal Service is not only a public service but is peculiarly a people's service. During the life of this session of Congress I have received thousands of letters from business men's organizations, from clergymen and laymen, and men and women in all conditions, urging me to work and vote for an increase in pay for the postal workers. I am of the opinion that this has been the experience of nearly every Member of this House. The proposed legislation is based on merit and justice. Such a cause should meet with the hearty approval of all of us as the representatives of the people. By enacting legislation that will provide a living wage for the men and women in the Postal Service we will be doing the thing our constituents desire us to do.

I have talked with many of the older Members of Congress regarding these hearings, and many of them inform me that in all their experience they have never known where proposed legislation met with such approval and unanimous indorsement of the people of their districts. They likewise expressed surprise at the outpouring of representatives of both branches of Congress who appeared at the hearings to testify in favor of the proposed legislation.

With such an array of Members of Congress backed by organizations of all kinds, together with all the influential journals of the country, a legislative proposal of this character is one that none of us can ignore.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope that my observations on this question will be of value to the Members of the House, as the statement I have made is based upon facts and observations gained while acting as a member of the joint subcommittee on postal salaries, and I also hope the Members of the House will before many days be offered an opportunity by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to vote and work for a committee bill to increase the pay of the postal workers and send it on its way to the Senate with our blessing and hope that long-delayed justice will be done the employees in the Postal Service.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, the time is fast approaching when the Congress must decide one of the most vital questions that has ever faced the American people. Between now and June 30, 1924, we must determine what the future policy of this Government is to be with respect to immigration. On that date will expire the present 3 per cent law, which limits the number of aliens entering the United States in a single year to 3 per cent of the foreign-born persons of any nationality in the United States as shown by the census of 1910. If we fail to enact any law upon this subject, our failure will be equivalent to opening the gates to the greatest and most dangerous horde of foreigners any nation has ever seen. Millions of aliens of every tongue are looking upon America with longing eyes in the hope that our doors may be opened to them, in order that they may come to this land of opportunity.

I have been greatly interested in the reports and recent utterances of our Secretary of Labor, the Hon. James J. Davis, whose every word has the ring of a true American, though he came to our shores as an immigrant boy. The Secretary in his very thorough annual report informs us that since 1820 there have come to the United States approximately 35,000,000 foreigners, about one-third, or 12,000,000, of whom have come since 1900. From this report we further find that—

The number of immigrants migrating to the United States did not reach 100,000 in any one year until 1842, when 104,565 were admitted, of whom 99,666 were from northern and western Europe. This number included 73,347 from the United Kingdom, constituting 70.1 per cent of the total of immigration for that year.

The next year the number dropped to 52,496. Then it increased year by year to 427,833 in 1854. This wave of immigration brought 272,740 from the United Kingdom in 1851 and 215,009 from Germany in 1854. In 1851, 368,565, or 97.2 per cent of all the 379,466 immigrants arriving, came from northern or western Europe, and of these 345,222 were from the United Kingdom and Germany. In 1854, out of 427,833 immigrants, 402,554 or 94.2 per cent, were from northern and western Europe.

Immigration for 1855 was less than half of that of 1854, being only 200,877. From 1855 to 1864 the amount of immigration was small, getting down to 91,918 in 1861, of which the number 43,472, or 47.3 per cent, came from the United Kingdom and 31,661, or 34.4 per cent, came from Germany.

At the close of the Civil War there was another wave of aliens which began to roll in, reaching its crest in 1873, with 459,803 immigrants arriving; 166,844, or 36.3 per cent, came from the United Kingdom and 149,071, or 32.6 per cent, from Germany and 374,898, or 81.6 per cent, from northern and western Europe as a whole. In 1878 this wave again receded to only 138,469. This second wave, however, brought in an element up to that time of no numerical importance—the immigration from southern and eastern Europe. Indeed, it was not until 1871 that all the southern and eastern European countries together furnished as many as 10,000 immigrants in one year. In 1874 this new class of immigrants numbered 24,584.

The next wave of immigration started in 1880 and reached a height of 788,992 in 1882, with 563,213 coming from northern and western Europe and 84,973 coming from southern and eastern Europe. In 1886 immigration dropped to 334,203.

In the next seven years, from 1887 to 1893, immigration varied from a little above to a little below 500,000 each year. Moreover, changes were taking place in the class of immigrants coming. In 1885 out of 546,889 immigrants 300,792, or 51.9 per cent, were from northern and western Europe and 270,084, or 48.6 per cent, from southern and eastern Europe.

From 1894 to 1901 immigration was under 500,000 a year, but the year 1896 is important, however, in the history of immigration, because in that year, for the first time, southern and eastern Europe furnished more immigrants than northern and western Europe, 195,684 coming from the southern and eastern and only 137,522 from northern and western sections of that continent.

In the year 1901, out of 478,918 immigrants, the northern and western European supplied 115,728, or 23.7 per cent of the total, and the southern and eastern European 359,297, or 73.6 per cent of the total. Each year from 1896 on, southern and eastern Europe has sent more aliens to us than northern and western Europe, save in 1910, when fewer than 25,000 people came from all Europe, and in 1923, when the 3 per cent law was in effect.

In 1902 immigration went above the 500,000 mark, and in 1907 it reached the highest point in any year, 1,285,340 entering the United States, of which number 979,661, or 76.2 per cent, were from southern and eastern Europe and 227,959, or only 17.7 per cent, from northern and western Europe. In the years 1905, 1906, 1907, 1910, 1913, and 1914 immigration was above 1,000,000, and did not drop below 750,000 in any intervening year. The year 1914 saw another high-water mark of immigration, when the number admitted was 1,218,480, of which 915,007, or 75.1 per cent, were from southern and eastern Europe and only 165,100, or 13.6 per cent, from northern and western Europe.

The World War reduced immigration from Europe to small numbers. The year 1917, however, brought in 105,399 immigrants from British North America and 42,380 from Mexico, Central and South America, and the West Indies, the high wages and ample supply of work being an attractive stimulant during that period.

The year 1920 started a new tide of immigration from Europe. The total immigration that year reached 430,001, with 162,595, or 37.7 per cent, from southern and eastern Europe and 88,773, or 20.7 per cent, from northern and western Europe, with countries of North and South America furnishing nearly all the remainder.

The next year, the year 1921, brought 805,228 immigrants, including 620,654, or 64.7 per cent, from southern and eastern Europe and 143,445, or 17.8 per cent, from northern and western Europe. America, with her more than 5,000,000 of unemployed in 1921, could not stand this oncoming flood of immigrants, which could only swell the number of unemployed, so the 2 per cent law was passed, going into effect on June 3, 1921.

This law, still in effect, applies mainly to Europe, but also covers Africa and northern and western Asia. The oriental countries—China, Japan, India, Java, and others of southeastern Asia—remained restricted, as they were under previous laws and treaties. Moreover, no numerical limitation was placed on immigration from our sister countries in America; so that foreigners in those countries can be admitted to the United States regardless of the quota, provided they can show they have been residents of one of those American Continent countries for the period of five years previous to application for entry to the United States.

Under this new act immigration in 1922 numbered 309,556, with 138,541, or 44.8 per cent, from southern and eastern Europe and 79,842 from northern and western Europe. The fiscal year 1923 brought in a total of 522,919 immigrants, with 156,879, or 30 per cent, from northern and western Europe and 153,224, or 29 per cent, from southern and eastern Europe, 117,011, or 22.4 per cent, from British America and 82,961, or 15 per cent, from southern American countries, Mexico, Central and South America, and the West Indies.

It is almost beyond belief and, I am quite sure, contrary to the general impression throughout the country that more than a half million aliens came through our gates last year seeking shelter in our land and protection under our flag. As a prominent writer in the Saturday Evening Post said some time ago in referring to this vast army of immigrants—

If one year's immigrants under existing immigration laws were to be lined up in the same way that an Army division lines up on Fifth Avenue, and hustled into the United States in a solid phalanx, they would be equivalent to more than 27 army divisions and would occupy over 94 hours, or four days and nights, in passing a given point. If a solid army of immigrants were to be seen marching into this country without a halt for four days and nights, every newspaper in the country would carry the story in the right-hand column of its front page, and a cry of protest against the invasion would rise from every corner of the land.

It has been urged by those who favor less restriction that this is the great "melting pot" into which has been poured for a hundred years the people of many races and from which has sprung the hardy, red-blooded, liberty-loving American of whom we love to boast. But those who take this view forget that there is little or no similarity between the clear-thinking, self-governing stocks that sired the American people and this stream of irresponsible and broken wreckage that is pouring into the lifeblood of America the social and political diseases of the Old World. Doctor Ward has admirably answered the argument of those who contend that the "melting pot" will make Americans of these people—

We have deceived ourselves into thinking that we could change inferior beings into superior ones. We have thought that sending the alien children to school, teaching them English, giving them flag drills, and letting them recite the Gettysburg address and read the Declaration of Independence would make Americans of them almost overnight. Yet the laws of heredity are at work. We can not make a heavy horse into a trotter by keeping him in a racing stable. We can not make a well-bred dog out of a mongrel by teaching him tricks. Nor can we make a race true to the old American type by any process of Americanization, essential as that undertaking is for creating better citizenship.

Once within our borders they herd together in the congested centers, seeking out their own countrymen where they read and speak their native language, and soon become the easy prey of those whose highest ambition in life is to destroy the only Government that offers them life, hope, and opportunity. There are more than 2,000 newspapers and periodicals printed in foreign tongues in the United States. Of the 805,000 admitted in 1921, more than 264,000 located in New York State. The greater part of the balance went to Chicago, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and other large cities. They did not come over here to work on the farms, where they are really needed. In fact, if a recent article in the Saturday Evening Post is true, they did not come to work at all. The article states that out of a group of 600 aliens cross-examined at the port in one month exactly 20 expressed an intention to go to work with their hands. The other 580 wanted to become peddlers. It is not work but easy money that inspires the modern immigrant.

According to the Department of Justice, 90 per cent of all the agitation of the country to-day is due to aliens. They are not only fanning the flames of anarchy but are filling our institutions and increasing the tax burden of all the people. According to the commissioner of immigration at Ellis Island, there are 43,000 men, women, and children in various New York institutions who came here as immigrants and who entered because of a let down of the immigration law with respect to the entrance of mental defectives. The foreign-born population represents 14.70 per cent of our people, yet they supply 20.63 per cent of the population of our jails, almshouses, insane asylums, and other public institutions. At this point I want to insert some very interesting and instructive data on aliens:

These figures are, indeed, significant. That table discloses that of 11,896 people in the almshouses of New England 5,706 were foreign born. In the Middle Atlantic States 23,772 are in the poorhouses, of whom 11,712 were foreign born. In the east north Central States, of 21,358 in the poorhouses 8,388 were foreign born. This same table discloses the fact that of 280,700 illiterates in New England 257,207 were born abroad. In the Middle Atlantic States, of 865,382 illiterates, 769,010 were foreign born.

Mr. Chairman, many plans have been presented for protecting our country from this avalanche of undesirables. Some advocate the return to the old system with practically no restrictions. Others prefer the quota principle, but are not agreed upon what census it shall be based. I am inserting here a table prepared for the use of the committee, showing the effect of the several plans proposed:

2 PER CENT PLUS 200 FOR EACH NATIONALITY.

The term "quota" when used in reference to any nationality means 200, and in addition thereto 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in the United States as determined by the United States census of ———.

Of course no one can say definitely what sort of immigration law we can finally pass and place upon the statute books. This is impossible for the very sufficient reason that all legislation here is of necessity a compromise. Personally, I shall support that plan which has the most restrictive features. I shall urge the passage of that bill which is best calculated to preserve America for Americans. I would require all aliens who are lawfully here to become naturalized with the least possible delay or be subject to deportation. Of the 14,000,000 foreign born in the United States, less than half are naturalized. Statistics show that it takes on an average 10 years for an alien to assume the duties of citizenship. Those who are here should be educated in night schools, if necessary, in order that no man, woman, or child beneath the Stars and Stripes shall be unable to speak and read our language. There is no greater need at this time than the making of a bigger and better race of Americans. I would require the payment by every unnaturalized alien of a substantial tax. In this connection I want to indorse every word of an editorial written by the Hon. George B. Lockwood, editor of the National Republican, some time ago, in which he said:

Why not, as a new source of national revenue, a head tax of $100 per year on every unnaturalized alien engaged in a gainful occupation in the United States?

The primary justification for such a tax is that such aliens, while enjoying the protection of our Government and the unusual business opportunities this country affords, are exempt under international law from conscription in time of war. They may accumulate and remove from the country capital earned in the United States without being thereafter liable for the taxes levied on such incomes. Such a tax would be no more than a measure of equalization and not a special hardship upon the alien who does not become a citizen.

Should a soldiers' adjusted compensation measure be passed by Congress, this new source of Federal revenue would pay the interest upon and within a few years retire the principal of the bond issue necessary for its payment. Those who are profiting by residence in the United States without being liable to military duties—many of whom, on the contrary, might be liable for military duty to some other power in conflict with the United States and thus a possible source of danger and expense to our Government—would thus be called upon to foot the obligations based upon the service of others. That obligation discharged, the accruing revenue could be utilized permanently in meeting the continuing bill for soldier relief.

There are some 6,000,000 unnaturalized aliens in the country. There are good reasons why they should be enrolled by the Federal Government. The method used in conscription could be employed. Every unnaturalized alien could be required to register within a given period when information in each case would be required that would assist materially in the proper enforcement of our immigration laws. Deportation should be enforced as against the alien who becomes an undesirable after he gets to this country, as well as against those whose records are bad when they arrive at Ellis Island. Occupational and employment cards could be issued by the Federal Government to those requiring them and penalties, including deportation of the alien could be enforced against those violating or assisting in the violation of the act. The payment of the head tax could be entered quarterly upon the cards which permitted the holders to engage in gainful employment. Of the 6,000,000 unnaturalized aliens probably 2,000,000 are engaged in gainful occupations. This tax would therefore possibly yield the Government a revenue of $200,000,000 or the interest on $5,000,000,000 of Government obligations.

This tax should be levied because it would be a just measure of equalization of burdens as between the citizen and the alien. Doubtless it would be opposed by powerful selfish interests of one sort and another, but the fundamental justice of the plan would appeal to the American people's sense of justice.

I am strongly in favor of the registration of every unnaturalized alien. This Government should require such aliens to register at least once every three months with some designated State, county, or city official. Thus would we always know where they are and what they are doing. Failure to so register should be sufficient ground for deportation, particularly if the subject has a bad record.

For six years, in and out of Congress, I have been preaching restricted immigration. I am ready to vote to close the gates entirely for five years, or longer if necessary, until we can absorb and Americanize those who are within our borders. Those who can not learn to read and speak our language and give evidence of an appreciation of this land of opportunity within that time should be sent back to the country from whence they came. With them I would send a message to all the world that America is for Americans and that our gates will never again swing open to any but those who have been thoroughly investigated and found to be physically, morally, and mentally fit to take upon themselves the duties and obligations of that sacred heritage, American citizenship.

This duty we owe to our country if we are to preserve it and pass it on to Americans. I am anxious that Americans, rather than aliens, shall inherit the land of our fathers. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there will be no opportunity to say anything on the soldiers' adjusted compensation measure to-morrow, I rise to take advantage of this occasion to advocate the passage of that measure and to say that I propose to vote for it at that time, as well as vote to pass it over the presidential veto in case it encounters that storm.

I advocated adjusted compensation in my campaign for Congress, and believing as I do that campaign promises are made to be kept and not merely to gain office, certainly I would be recreant to a trust if I voted otherwise. Not only that, I firmly believe in the virtue of such legislation. With your permission I desire here and now to give my reasons for that stand.

In the first place, we promised the boys when they went to war that we would give them anything they wanted on their return, and that to me is a promise as solemn as the honor of any man here and as sacred as the word of any American citizen anywhere. A nation is as an individual—"Whatsoever it sows, that shall it also reap." If we instill into the hearts of the young men of this Nation the fact that this is a grateful Republic they will transplant that lesson into the hearts of the children of to-morrow, and in the future when this grand and wonderful Nation shall need defenders and sounds its clarion call, to its banners will flock young America—the sons of the soldiers of the World War, the beneficiaries of this proposed legislation.

It is true that the proposed measure is not the kind I prefer. I wrote and introduced the kind of measure that appealed to me. Furthermore, I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in support of that measure; but recognizing the fact that you can not get the very thing you want in the identical form desired, I am practical enough to take the next best thing, for otherwise nothing might be accomplished.

Most timely are the words of Commander Jonez of the American Legion of the State of Washington:

Adjusted compensation for the soldiers and sailors of the United States Army and Navy during the World War has opposition.

This opposition has taken many forms. It has embraced in its membership many of the country's greatest leaders in government, in politics, in industry, in the professions, and in the press. Arguments against adjusted compensation have been devised in every conceivable form of propagandist camouflage that could be draped about the real facts, from platitudes of patriotism to declarations that the veterans themselves, as a class, are opposing the movement.

Veterans find themselves opposed now by the same men who were loudest in their promises of economic help at the time these veterans left civil life to go into the service.

"We'll take care of you; we'll see that the right thing is done by you when you return!"

This was the cry that rang from housetops throughout the country when the Government found itself confronted with the necessity of finding or taking 4,500,000 peaceful men to fight its battles.

This, too, was the cry that cheered the soldier as he gave up everything that he loved.

When he returned, it did not take him long to discover that the emergency over, the big fellow who did the loud talking had been and still was too busy taking care of himself to pay any attention to the man who served.

"Get on the best you can!" was the welcome the veterans received from big business generally.

Its lone purpose is, by false propaganda, to incite opposition to adjusted compensation and help by misrepresentation to cheat the veteran, able-bodied though he may be, out of that which the country recognizes at large as his just due. Exposure of their fake scheme, designed to pretend a referendum was being taken on the compensation question, nipped in the bud one of the most insidious efforts to undermine public opinion.

UNSELFISH AND PATRIOTIC.

Big business would like to have it appear that because of the adjusted-compensation movement the American Legion is a selfish and unpatriotic organization doing selfish, unpatriotic work.

Aside from sponsoring all the legislation and direct help that has been extended to the disabled war veterans, the American Legion has been doing its greatest work in and will continue to make its chief effort that of upbuilding and helping its individual communities. It is true that, as a national organization, it seeks to defend the personal interests of all ex-service men, yet its primary purposes have and always shall be to unselfishly better the condition economically and civilly of all the people of this country.

If unquestioning service under arms in time of war is lack of patriotism, then I do not know what patriotism is. I do not consider it lack of patriotism or an undermining principle of national integrity and defense that the men who serve in the armed forces of a country seek to be recognized properly for that service by an adequate and reasonable compensation for the period served or to be inducted back into civil life with as much consideration as was given them when they were inducted into the fighting forces of that nation.

America is confronted with a debt it can not repudiate by any cry that the service which created the debt was alone sufficient compensation. America has never recognized it as such in its history and has through its Congress always before sought adequately to place its soldiers back in civic life on a sound civic footing.

There is only one argument against adjusted compensation that will hold water—simply this: That big business does not want to spare from its war profits the money needed to give the World War veterans a square deal.

And now, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the pay of the American soldiers was much too small. They received only $30 a month, of which half was withheld for dependent relatives, and $6 for insurance, leaving only about $9 a month that the men could spend. For this 30 cents a day the men took very great risks of disease, danger at sea from submarines, and the perils of battle. The pay ought clearly to be readjusted in consideration of these facts.

All classes of our citizens, railroads, banks, farmers, merchants, workmen of all kinds, got the highest pay in all their history and perhaps in the history of the world. If everyone were deprived of what he gained during the war on the theory that it was "commercializing patriotism," we would have to take away all profits made during the war. Those who remained behind made enormous profits. When you refuse to pay the boys what is their just due, are you at the same time to take away the profits of all those who during the war "commercialized their patriotism"? Unless you do you can not be consistent.

The wealthy men who profited during the war would never have made such profits only for the work of the soldiers in the ranks, and it is not becoming for them to oppose the bonus, as the Chamber of Commerce of the United States has done. It has been said that 23,000 millionaires and 200,000 fortunes of $500,000 or more were created during the war.

Congress has established precedents. Readjusted pay has been provided in three notable cases. When the Government took over the railroads it agreed upon a fixed rental price which produced one of the largest incomes the railroads had ever made up to that time. When the Government raised an Army it fixed a wage scale barely above subsistence costs. When the war was over Congress gave the railroads about $2,000,000,000 additional, thus "readjusting their pay." Furthermore, the wages of civilian employees have been readjusted by the institution of a $240 bonus throughout the Government service. Even war profiteers were awarded large sums in adjustment of contracts because their business was cut off suddenly.

The European nations have paid their soldiers a bonus. The United States furnished the money for these bonuses by advancing loans to Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and possibly other countries.

Let them pay their debts; let us forget this idea and not fall for this propaganda of canceling the debts of foreign nations until we pay our own debts.

The reason that led to President Harding's veto no longer exists. Then President Harding said that the income of the Government would not permit a bonus payment; but now we have a $300,000,000 surplus.

Economy will show the way to find money for the bonus. Enough money has probably been wasted or grafted in the Veterans' Bureau during the past few years to have paid the bonus for that period.

If the Government owes the money to the soldiers they should be paid. It has been urged against the bonus that the men would squander it; but it is no excuse for failure to pay a debt that your creditor may spend the money when he gets it.

George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and others were not averse to adjusted compensation; the American people are not averse to it. It is long since due, and I am proud to be a Member of the Congress which I predict now and here will recognize the debt and manfully meet the obligation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McSweeney].

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that it is proper for me to speak in behalf of my comrades. I feel, however, that there is one group that is to be considered; those men who are not here to answer for themselves, the men who were killed or died. I felt they were the men to be considered when America was facing the peace treaty, considering whether we should take property or not. These men, as you remember, came to the call of President Wilson with the idea that they were fighting against war and not to accrue property for America.

Now, I feel that these same men who responded to that call came without any idea of the bonus, did not think of it, but served their Government in its hour of need. I feel it to be my duty as their comrade and as one of those who had a chance to come home and again take up the march of his existence and meet his obligations. As an original advocate of an adjusted compensation I think I should do everything I can for these men, who as Winkleried of old, "took unto his manly breast the shaft of the hostile spear" to make a path for the oppressed.

My own idea was we should go even further than this bill provides, and I do hope that what we will do will be for the best interest of the soldiers and for the best interests of the citizens of America. Let the gentlemen of the House realize that they came back at a time when we had begun to see the wane of our prosperity; that they came back again into civil life as no other body of soldiers have ever done. Not in all the history of civilization do we find soldiers quietly taking up civil pursuits as did ours. I hope now that we will give them some assistance.

I realize the bill presented now may benefit them, but I think most of them would rather have had a cash payment with which they may support themselves and families. We heard a former speaker [Mr. HOWARD] state that they might wish to enter into the matrimonial state or secure for themselves a home. I realize the present bill only allows 90 per cent loan on the accrued amount for two years, which at present prices gives practically nothing. As an ardent advocate of the bonus, I am ready to support this bill because I have no other alternative. I regret that I am unable to secure for them some cash payment which can give them a start in civil pursuits and some encouragement on the way. Since the armistice many have turned back into civil life and are prosperous, but there are many who are not able to catch up and who would be in need of a cash bonus. I was very much impressed with the idea of doing something for these men, and when I heard our colleague [Mr. SCHALL], who does not behold the responsive appearance of your faces, who does not see the beautiful things of life with which men are blessed, stand up and ask that these men be given justice, I trust that he will be an inspiration to the Members of the House, and I hope you will be imbued with the beautiful sentiment which prompted him to make his statement; and I hope to-morrow if the bill presented is the one you think best you will vote for it, but if you can possibly think of some better plan—for instance, a cash plan—you will give us your best efforts to defeat the present bill, in view of the fact that we may later do better and pass a bill which will bring to these men some cash relief. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWNE of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I am opposed to any form of bonus on the principle that it is merely a gratuity offered to ex-service men irrespective of the individual merits or needs, and, furthermore, that it is improper and impossible to attempt to compensate financially those who served their country in time of war.

While I am well aware that the proponents of the bonus have appropriated for their arguments the symbols of patriotism, it would seem to me that those who consider the country as a whole and its welfare are no less patriotic than those who favor a selected class, even though that class commands the admiration and respect of all. The bonus, by whatever name it be called, is a gratuity given to the ex-soldiers, irrespective of the individual needs or merits. In principle and in effect the bonus is a protest against the excessive wages received by many and the profiteering indulged in by those who did not go into the Army; and if this be so, "adjusted compensation" is neither more nor less than "adjusted profiteering." It is trite to say that two wrongs do not make a right. Moreover, it would seem improper to attempt to compensate financially those who offered themselves to their country in the hour of its need. No monetary compensation could repay them. To be able to serve one's country is a privilege and an honor and seemed to many of us a sacred obligation. None during the war mentioned or even thought of a subsequent bonus or adjusted compensation, nor can we say that the country ever promised such a reward or contemplated a financial settlement. What other countries may or may not have done should not concern us. Ours was a shorter war, and it is undoubtedly true that those of our soldiers who passed through the ordeal with no disability, either mental or physical, were better off for their experience; and while we owe them the undying respect of a grateful country, there should not be a cash reward. On the other hand, our resources should be poured out unstintingly to those who by the merciless fortunes of war were hurt in mind or body; they deserve not only our gratitude and affection but every physical aid.

Not expecting that an opportunity would be offered to speak on this subject to-day, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is the time on this side exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The time is exhausted.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, is the time of this side exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The time on that side has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, two gentlemen who asked for time seem not to be here. Is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] on the other side available? I could yield five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is not here.

Mr. FRENCH. One or two gentlemen on this side have not claimed their time. I want to say this, though: Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, a member of the committee, would probably desire to speak on this bill. He has been detained and has not been able to take part in the general debate. Should he desire time after we shall be under the five-minute rule, I shall be glad to ask unanimous consent for the House to hear him, so that he may have the opportunity to present his views to the House.

I yield back to the House the balance of my time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to me one minute?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have yielded all the time at my disposal to-day for the discussion of the bonus question.

Mr. Chairman, under the general debate on this naval appropriation bill I have yielded time to many gentlemen to discuss the adjusted compensation bill, because that bill will be brought before the House to-morrow on a motion to suspend the rules, which will permit of only 20 minutes' debate and will permit no amendments. A measure of such importance should be debated and the House should have opportunity to amend it if the majority see fit to do so.

I voted for the adjusted compensation bill considered in the last Congress. To-morrow we will have no opportunity to consider that bill. We must vote for the bill as reported by the committee or nothing. I shall vote for it, but with the hope that it will be amended by the friends of this legislation in the Senate, so as to give to the ex-service men the option of receiving either a cash bonus or an insurance policy. The House will then have an opportunity to concur in the Senate amendment. It is admitted the cash bonus will cost less than the insurance policy provision and the option should be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, namely:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it.

Mr. FRENCH. The plan is to rise in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

SALARIES, SECRETARY'S OFFICE, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Secretary of the Navy, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, and other personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $136,080; in all, $148,080: Provided, That in expending appropriations or portions of appropriations contained in this act for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, the average of the salaries of the total number of persons under any grade or class thereof in any bureau, office, or other appropriation unit shall not at any time exceed the average of the compensation rates specified for the grade by such act: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply (1) to grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the clerical-mechanical service, or (2) to require the reduction in salary of any person whose compensation is fixed as of July 1, 1924, in accordance with the rules of section 6 of such act, or (3) to prevent the payment of a salary under any grade at a rate higher than the maximum rate of the grade when such higher rate is permitted by the classification act of 1923 and is specifically authorized by other law.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. FRENCH. Does the gentleman just want to adjourn?

Mr. BLANTON. It is adjourning time.

Mr. FRENCH. What I would like to do is to read to the fourth page. There are a few items here that are not controversial. When we shall reach the fourth page, it is my plan to move to rise.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should we appropriate here $12,000 for a Secretary of the Navy when we have not any?

Mr. FRENCH. This bill is for the next fiscal year, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no definite assurance that we will have one then, is there?

Mr. FRENCH. We will have a Secretary of the Navy, and a very good one.

Mr. MADDEN. And a navy, too.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withdraw my reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, and drawing materials; purchase and exchange of motor trucks or motor delivery wagons, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks or motor delivery wagons, and one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes; garage rent; street-car fares not exceeding $500; freight, expressage, postage, typewriters, and computing machines; and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department and its various bureaus and offices, $78,000; it shall not be lawful to expend, unless otherwise specifically provided herein, for any of the offices or bureaus of the Navy Department in the District of Columbia, any sum out of appropriations made for the naval service for any of the purposes mentioned or authorized in this paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. With reference to this paragraph, embracing this lump sum of $78,000, of which certain of it or all could be expended for furniture, I want to ask the chairman of the committee or any other member here, including the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, what is there about this—it is more than a rumor—this report, which seems to be based on definite information, that in a department of Government furniture may be sold by order of the Secretary and bought in for him and shipped out to his own home in his own State? Has that gone on in the office of the former Secretary?

There is a well-defined report that such did occur in the Department of the Interior. There is a report of several weeks' standing that that has been done. I would like to know something about it?

Here is an item of furniture, and $78,000 appropriated in a lump sum; and I was wondering whether, if it had been done in one department, it could be done in another. I do not know who will be the new Secretary. If I knew, probably I would not be asking these questions.

Mr. FRENCH. Under the law no property of this kind could be disposed of except on the basis of advertisement in the regular way.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman say this, that he has no knowledge whatever of furniture having been sold in that way in the Department of the Interior and bought in for the man who was then Secretary of the department and shipped out to the man's home? Has the gentleman heard anything like that?

Mr. FRENCH. That subject is not involved here.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman heard anything about it?

Mr. FRENCH. I am not familiar with that at all and the matter is before another committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman heard anything about it?

Mr. FRENCH. There have been rumors—

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; ugly rumors. Has the gentleman chased them down in the Committee on Appropriations to find out how much truth there is in those rumors? Here is a committee of 35 Congressmen, who make every appropriation for this Congress. The other 400 Members have no say so as to what they put into these bills with reference to the money coming out of the Treasury. Naturally we have to have absolute confidence in these 35 men, and we have confidence in them. But when a report comes to Congress that a Secretary of a department has had property of the department sold and bought it in and shipped it out to his home State for his private use and benefit, I take it that it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to look into that and find out, and tell this House how much truth and how much falsehood there is in the report.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield. I am sure the gentleman has heard of these reports.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not heard of them?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman must have been asleep, because it has been fairly seething around the Capitol corridors for two or three weeks.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say this much to the gentleman: I have not been asleep. I have been at work. I have not heard any rumors concerning anything about it, and I do not think it has been reported to Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. I put the gentleman on notice now, that there is a definite report to that effect, and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will trace it down and find out what there is in it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say it had been reported to Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it has been reported here in the Capitol; all around Congress, but not to Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not much of a gossip.

Mr. BLANTON. This is more than gossip.

Mr. MADDEN. And rumor rarely tells the truth.

Mr. BLANTON. This is more than rumor. I want to say this: If it had been a Democratic Secretary I would be making this same statement on the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not doubt that. I shall be glad to look into it, and if there is anything in it I will tell the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say it is going to be investigated by his committee?

Mr. MADDEN. It will be investigated.

Mr. BLANTON. But it has not yet been investigated.

Mr. MADDEN. It has not.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the time has come when it ought to be.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, you can not commence to investigate a thing until some smelling committee gets it.

Mr. BLANTON. This is not work for a smelling committee; this is work for a definite, sincere, anxious committee of Congress which has the interests of the people at heart, and which ought to go to the bottom of these things, and if a man—I do not care whether he be Democrat or Republican—will take the property of the people and use it for himself it ought to be found out, and it ought to be reported to this Congress, and there ought to be some decisive action taken.

Mr. MADDEN. And may I ask the gentleman this further question? Was this a former Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, then the gentleman from Illinois has heard about it, and the gentleman is not as innocent as his smile would indicate.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the gentleman has said enough so that I can infer what he means; although he has not named anybody I just assume who he is from the gentleman's remark that he does not care whether he be a Democrat or a Republican. I think the former Secretary of the Interior has been both a Democrat and a Republican at different times.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not mean to say that Mr. Secretary Fall has ever been a Democrat?

Mr. MADDEN. He has been both, as I understand.

Mr. BLANTON. He was good enough Republican to be made a member of a Republican Cabinet.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. When he was a Democrat there was no charge about a satchel of money, but when he was a Republican there was.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not intend to bring anything partisan into this matter, because I was simply looking at it from the standpoint of the interests of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, may I make this further observation: The question which the gentleman asked pertains to a department with which this particular subcommittee has not been dealing. The remarks of the gentleman do not pertain to any paragraph in the bill which the committee has before it. All inquiries and hearings must proceed in an orderly way or we shall get nowhere. However, if the gentleman thinks the matter is not now having the attention that it should, then, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I shall be very glad to cooperate in any way looking to the ferreting out of any reasonable charge that may be brought against any public official.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend as a part of my remarks to-day an editorial called "A gold-star mother's rebuke."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the editorial to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRINTING AND BINDING.

For printing and binding for the Navy Department and the Naval Establishment executed at the Government Printing Office, $475,000, including not exceeding $85,000 for the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 6820) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the adjusted compensation bill which will be taken up in the House to-morrow does not provide for the kind or character of an adjusted compensation for the veterans of the late war that I believe should be paid, nor is it the kind of a bill that would be passed by this House if we were not hog tied by a rule, which makes the membership here vote either for or against this bill. The action of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting a bill which provides merely for the issuance of insurance certificates for ex-service men, for the collection of which they will have to wait 20 years unless they die in the meantime, is bad enough in itself. But they make the situation intolerable when they couple to this proposition a rule which limits the debate on the bill to 20 minutes for each side, and which prohibits amendments or even a motion to recommit, so that even those that are in favor of proper adjusted compensation feel almost persuaded to vote against this measure. I shall give it my vote, however, notwithstanding my objections to the measure.

A CASH COMPENSATION MORE SATISFACTORY TO GOVERNMENT AND SOLDIER.

The Secretary of the Treasury and a whole horde of lesser satellites, such as the Literary Digest, have tried to becloud this issue and lead the American people to believe that if an adjusted compensation act is passed there can be no reduction of Federal taxes, and in a poll arranged by the Literary Digest, alleged to have been submitted to 15,000,000 people, a person voting was compelled to vote against adjusted compensation if he favored tax reduction. Now, I dare to say that there is not a Member of this House who is opposed to tax reduction, nor who would vote against a tax reduction bill that was favorable equally to all classes of taxpayers. And three-fourths of these Members are likewise in favor of an adjusted compensation. Personally, I am for both propositions.

The critics of the ex-soldier, however, contend that the adjusted-compensation measure will cost the Government so much that any tax reduction will be impossible. Mr. Mellon's most recent statement asserts that the adjusted compensation will cost the Nation $4,000,000,000. The truth is wholly at variance with this statement from the Secretary of the Treasury. The report of the Senate Finance Committee of 1921 shows that the approximate cost will be $1,548,000,000. Mr. Mellon himself in a letter to Senator Frelinghuysen in July, 1921, said that the total cost would be approximately $1,500,000,000. Taking these figures as to the cost, if a 50-year bond issue for $1,500,000,000 was floated and allowing 5 per cent per annum as sufficient to take care of both interest and sinking fund, then an annual charge of only $77,000,000 would be imposed upon the people of the United States as the total annual cost of adjusted compensation to these veterans, and this would give to every one of them the cash for immediate use.

The Secretary of the Treasury states that a tax reduction of approximately $325,000,000 can be made at this time without disturbing in the least the sinking fund set aside annually to take care of the national debt. Taking then the $77,000,000 which would annually be required for adjusted compensation from these figures, and we have a balance of $248,000,000 which can be eliminated from the tax burdens of those who are paying an income and other Federal taxes. It has been frequently said on the floor of this House that a tax bill should be framed which would reduce the taxes of those persons who do not pay income taxes.

These statements are made chiefly by those who favor the Mellon rates or the "Mellon plan." If these gentlemen are sincere in these statements and really wish to give to this class of taxpayers real relief in the matter of taxation, it behooves them to favor a cash compensation for ex-service men for the reason that the great majority of these very men make annual salaries that are not of sufficient size to bear an income tax.

THE LAST OF THE WAR CLAIMS.

Those who are opposed to the payment of an adjusted compensation frequently make the statement that if the soldiers' claims are paid by the Government the amount received by them will be immediately wasted and squandered. I wish to deny the truthfulness of this statement. Assuming, however, that it is true, it is none of my business or the business of anyone but the ex-soldier himself what he does with his deserved compensation. No other person or set of persons having just claims against the Government has ever been interrogated about what shall be done with the money owed to him or them, and I fail to see the justice of singling out this class of brave men and assigning to them impulses of incompetency not attributed to other men. The only question which we have to settle is whether the Government owes these men some compensation, and I submit that the Government does so. They left positions and businesses and professions and departed from their homes by voluntary enlistment or by being drafted into the service and went away to engage in the most hazardous of all duties, for which they received from their Government less than $30 a month, which amount was not increased. Their dependents at home received but trifling amounts, sums entirely insufficient to support them. Those men who remained at home doing work of infinitely less importance received compensation many times the wages given to these fighters. No one can deny the truthfulness of these statements, nor that the Government is not justly indebted to these men. Suppose they had faltered and had not done their work so well and so nobly, and the war had been lost as a consequence, the propagandists who are now belittling them and calling them names would be themselves struggling under tax burdens unheard of in immensity. Perhaps confiscation itself would have overtaken them.

Mr. Speaker, the issue presented is a simple one that anyone of even small degree of discernment could see through. The rich taxpayers, who have been accustomed to bonuses from the Government in the way of tax reductions, land grants, and gifts of all kinds, and who are always paid in full for all their losses, real or alleged, caused by the war, firmly believe that if this debt is paid to the real service men their own "bonuses" will be smaller in the future and the justice of their payments will be scrutinized more closely. This, then, is the real basis for their opposition to an adjusted compensation measure that shall be fair and adequate.

Ninety-five per cent of ex-service men believe that they have been treated unfairly in this matter of their compensation and that justice has been denied to them. A Government generous to a degree to everyone else that performed any duty in a war way should not neglect those who really served by giving their all, and who by their faithfulness and valor made success possible.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OLIVER of Alabama (at the request of Mr. JEFFERS), from March 15 to March 19, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEAGALL (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), on account of illness in family.

To Mr. BANKHEAD (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), on account of illness in family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 18, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Committee on Ways and Means. H. R. 7959. A bill to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 313). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FULLER: Committee on Invalid Pensions. H. R. 7963. A bill to increase pensions to persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and of widows and former widows of such persons, and Army nurses of said war; without amendment (Rept. No. 314). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1924.

(Legislative day of Friday, March 14, 1924.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Edwarda	Keyes	Robinson
Ball	Ernst	King	Sheppard
Bayard	Ferris	Ladd	Shields
Borah	Fess	Lodge	Shortridge
Brandegee	Fletcher	McKellar	Simmons
Broussard	Frazier	McKinley	Smith
Bruce	George	McLean	Smoot
Bursum	Gerry	McNary	Stanfield
Cameron	Glass	Mayfield	Stephens
Capper	Gooding	Neely	Swanson
Caraway	Hale	Norris	Wadsworth
Colt	Harrel	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Harris	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Harrison	Pepper	Warren
Curtis	Heflin	Philpps	Watson
Dale	Howell	Pittman	Weller
Dial	Johnson, Minn.	Ralston	Willis
Dill	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell
Edge	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHBURST], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained in a committee meeting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

ACCOUNTS OF THE FARM LOAN COMMISSIONER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to Senate Resolution 190, which, without objection, will lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would like to have the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The reading clerk read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 14, 1924.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: Senate Resolution No. 190, passed March 12, 1924, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to the Senate a statement, in detail, of the funds that have been covered into the account of the Farm Loan Commissioner, together with a statement of the source of said funds in each case, and the date of each disbursement from said account, has been received. Into this account, as I understand it, have been deposited the proceeds from the sale of farm-loan bonds, and checks against this account are drawn by the Farm Loan Commissioner. As far as the Treasury proper is concerned, this account is similar to an ordinary checking account at any commercial bank. The records of the transactions which go through the account are with the Farm Loan Commissioner and not with the Treasury. With the concurrence, however, of the Farm Loan Commissioner, the Treasury has already undertaken a detailed audit and analysis of this account in the office of the Farm Loan Commissioner. In order to prepare an analysis responsive to the Senate resolution and verify items involved, it will be necessary that this Treasury force be occupied for about four weeks. The report will be furnished you as soon as prepared.

Very truly yours,
A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE PRO TEMPORE,
The Capitol.

SALARIES IN THE VETERANS' BUREAU.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau transmitting certain information with respect to the salaries of employees of the bureau in accordance with the provisions of the appropriation act of February 13, 1923.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the letter is not very long, may we have it read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not conversant with the contents of the letter. It may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the subject matter of the communication?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It relates to employees of the Veterans' Bureau, and is in response to a provision contained in the appropriation act of February 13, 1923.

Mr. CURTIS. It should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FLETCHER. And be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed by order of the committee if they so desire. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONDOLENCES ON THE DEATH OF FORMER PRESIDENT WILSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with a request of the French ambassador, a certified copy of an extract from the Journal of the Senate of the French Republic for the session of February 12, 1924, on which occasion that body unanimously passed a resolution in honor of the memory of the late Woodrow Wilson, former President of the United States, expressing its fraternal sympathy, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting copy of a letter from the officers of the general convention of the Liberal Radical Party, at Asuncion, Paraguay, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 12, 1924.

The Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore, United States Senate.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit a copy of a letter addressed to the American minister at Asuncion from Mr. Emiliana Gonzalez Navero and Dr. Raul Casal Ribiero, president and secretary, respectively, of the general convention of the Liberal Radical Party, conveying the sympathy of that body to the Senate of the United States on the occasion of the death of Mr. Woodrow Wilson, former President of the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

[Translation.]

LIBERAL PARTY,
Asuncion, February 5, 1924.
His Excellency MINISTER Plenipotentiary of the United States OF AMERICA.

Mr. MINISTER: By unanimous resolution of the convention of the Liberal Party, I beg your excellency to kindly transmit to the Senate of the United States of America the condolence and profound sentiments of this assembly for the death of the illustrious ex-President and champion of right, Woodrow Wilson.

I wish to thank your excellency for your compliance with this request, and to express the assurances of my highest consideration,
E. GONZALEZ NAVERO,
RAUL CASAL RIBIERO,
Secretary.

CAUSE DISMISSED BY THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, informing the Senate that the cause of the International Telefre Co., of Boston, Mass., v. The United States, congressional, No. 15,259, which was referred to the Court of Claims by resolution of the Senate on February 21, 1911, was dismissed by the court for nonprosecution, on motion of the defendant, on January 15, 1924, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of State, fiscal year 1924, for the payment of the expenses of delegates to the General Assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture to be held at Rome, Italy, and for the payment of additional quotas incident to the admission of Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands to membership in the institute, $15,045, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 73).

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate for the Treasury Department, fiscal year 1924, for providing water supply at the Key West (Fla.) Marine Hospital, $5,500, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 72).

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting deficiency estimates of appropriations for the Department of State for the fiscal years 1922 and 1923, in amount $11,926.81, and supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Department of State for the fiscal year 1924, in amount $151,265.29; in total amount $163,192.10, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 71).

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of judgments rendered against the Government by the district courts of the United States, under the provisions of law, as submitted by the Attorney General through the Secretary of the Treasury and requiring an appropriation for payment, as follows: Under the Department of Commerce, $7,500; under the Department of Labor, $3,074.30; under the War Department, $2,050; in total amount, $12,624.30, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 60).

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with law, a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, which have been submitted by the Attorney General through the Secretary of the Treasury and require an appropriation for their payment, as follows: Under the Navy Department, $93,542.88; under the Treasury Department, $2,078; under the War Department, $80,921.52; in total amount, $176,542.40, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 70).

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with law, schedules of claims amounting to $1,190,204.64, allowed by the General Accounting Office, as covered by certificates of settlement (the numbers of which are shown in the first column of said schedules), under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of law, and for the service of the several departments and independent offices, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 68).

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Chicago, Ill., favoring the passage of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Chicago, Ill., favoring the taking of drastic measures for the suppression of the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of James P. Edwards, praying that section 37 of the Penal Code, relative to conspiracy to commit offenses, be amended so as to provide that no punishment shall be inflicted under this section which is greater than that provided by Congress for the substantive offense which the defendants are charged with having conspired to commit, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Sheridan Commercial Club, of Sheridan, Wyo., favoring the enactment of legislation to amend the Federal highway act, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Laramie County Teachers' Association of Cheyenne and the Lions Club of Greybull, both in the State of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of legislation authorizing participation of the United States in the international conferences for the control of traffic in habit-forming narcotic drugs, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ford County, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation reducing the tax on industrial alcohol, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Mullinville, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Johnson immigration bill, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Ohio Engineering Society, favoring the prompt passage of legislation providing for the financing of a three-year Federal-aid road program, beginning July 1, 1925, in the amount of $100,000,000 for each of the three fiscal years succeeding that date, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Walkomirer Progressive Benevolent Association and the Drusivo Primez Trubar, St. 126, S. N. P. J., both of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 2506) authorizing an appropriation for the payment of claims arising out of the occupation of Vera Cruz, Mexico, by American forces in 1914, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 281) thereon.

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 555) for the relief of Blattmann & Co., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 282) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2853) granting a pension to Mary L. Murray (with an accompanying paper); and

ADDRESS BY SENATOR SHIELDS.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Record an address recently delivered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on the subject of "Tax reduction and adjusted compensation."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JOHN K. SHIELDS ON TAX REDUCTION AND ADJUSTED COMPENSATION AT NASHVILLE, TENN., FEBRUARY 21, 1924.

The Congress of the United States, more especially the Senate, has been compelled to devote much of the present session to the work of uncovering, exposing, and providing for the punishment of the greatest and most iniquitous frauds in public offices and speculations in the property of the people that have ever occurred in the history of our country. The bribery and frauds committed by men of great wealth, corrupting high officers, obtaining possession of property valued at millions of dollars, reserved for the national defense, are without precedent and were of such magnitude as to startle the American people with their infamy and shake their confidence in the stability and integrity of their Government. They were sapping and destroying the very foundations of our institutions. These crimes had to be exposed and punished, and ample means and processes have been provided for these purposes. Prosecution is about to be begun against a former Cabinet officer upon charges of participation in them, another Cabinet officer has been driven from office for his negligent and supine conduct in connection with them, and grave charges are now being investigated against another member of the Cabinet; special counsel have been employed to bring suit to recover the property of the Government which these unfaithful officers and unscrupulous persons have attempted to convert to private uses.

REDUCTION OF TAXATION.

When this Congress met it was recognized by all that the commanding and imperative business to which it should devote itself was the reduction and repeal of the burdensome and oppressive war taxes which the people of the United States of all classes and conditions, the rich and the poor and the high and the low alike, were suffering as never before in the history of our country. There is a general demand from all parts of the country that the cost of Government and expenditures of all kinds and appropriations for all purposes save those necessary for the economical administration of the Government and carrying on projects already under way should cease. The people want and are entitled to the restoration of peace conditions and prosperity.

The enormous increase of the public debt and the cost of administration of the Government in the last 10 years is appalling. The Federal, State, and municipal indebtedness at the close of the fiscal year 1922 was $32,786,715,000, an increase of about $25,000,000,000 since 1912. The taxes collected that year from the people to pay interest and current expenses of Government were $7,433,086,000, about three times that collected in 1912. The Federal Government collected of this great sum $3,200,000,000 and the several States and their municipalities collected $4,133,000,000. The annual interest charge of the Federal Government is now about $1,000,000,000. The cost of administration of the Federal Government in 1912, $1,100,000,000, has increased to about $3,500,000,000, and that of the States has increased in the same proportion.

The rate of taxation in the United States has increased in the last 10 years more than that of any other nation in the world, save Great Britain, the increase of the latter being about 217 per cent and ours 204 per cent, and the people of these countries are now paying higher taxes than any of the other countries engaged in the World War. I was astonished to learn that the taxes collected in Tennessee in 1922 were $43,995,908, an increase from $17,068,000 since 1912.

This great expansion of the public indebtedness is wholly out of proportion to the increase in the population and wealth of the country, and threatens financial disaster and distress to our people. The economic and financial history of all nations discloses that excessive and oppressive taxation depresses and stifles individual initiative and industrial activity and prosperity. It destroys business and progress and discourages frugality, increases the cost of living and breeds poverty.

FARMERS IN DISTRESS.

The deplorable condition of the 40,000,000 people engaged in agriculture, greater in some sections of the country than in others, is proof conclusive of these things. Agriculture is the basis of all wealth and when it is depressed and unprofitable, sooner or later the same condition will reach all other interests, industries, and business.

The great sources of Federal revenue are the tariff duties or taxes imposed upon all property imported from other countries and taxes upon the incomes of the people. These are both direct taxes, as they are in the first place paid by the importer and those who have the incomes to the collecting officer, and indirect taxes in that they are passed down and eventually but surely paid by the consumer. There are other taxes which while smaller than these are very annoying and harassing to the people and unjustifiable in peace.

The present high and iniquitous tariff duties were imposed under the McCumber-Fordney bill passed by the Republican Party, and there is little or no hope of relief from them so long as that party is in power.

There is a common agreement to reduce income taxes and the present administration has proposed what is known as the Mellon plan for that purpose in a bill now pending in the House. The Democratic Party has offered an amendment to this bill, known as the Garner plan, which it insists will give relief to a larger number of the people who most need it than the Mellon plan. I am not going into details of the differences in these plans. The adoption of either will save the people about $250,000,000 annually. Greater exemptions are allowed and the normal and the surtaxes are reduced under both plans and greater reduction is given on earned incomes of professional men and others for personal services than on unearned incomes, which provision should be extended to farmers and merchants engaged in these avocations who combine capital and personal services.

The reduction of the surtaxes on large incomes under both plans is out of proportion, and a middle ground should be reached. With some modifications, I favor the Garner plan.

There are 6,650,693 income-tax payers in the United States, and of these, 6,641,262 will be more benefited by the Garner plan than by the Mellon plan, and only 9,433 will be more benefited by the Mellon plan than the Garner plan. There are 60,918 income-tax payers in Tennessee who will get a greater reduction under the Garner plan than the Mellon plan, and only 81 income-tax payers who would get a greater reduction under the Mellon plan.

CONSUMER PAYS TAXES.

The Democratic plan benefits the greatest number and those who are least able to bear the burden. The underlying principle of this plan is that those who receive the greatest protection from the Government in their property rights and who are best able should pay the greater proportion of the expenses of the Government. Taxes are contributions which the citizens make to the Government for protecting them in their property rights. They all get the same protection of their personal rights, but those who have property receive protection in proportion to their wealth. This is the most equitable, sound, and just principle in the distribution of the cost of government.

There are few now who deny that taxes fall upon all people alike, in that they are eventually paid by the consumers, and that those who consume most pay most. This is illustrated in tariff duties, which are always added to the price of the article imported when sold to the consumer. The importer, the manufacturer, and the business man in fixing the price of his product and merchandise always take into consideration, along with the cost of labor, material, rents, and interest, the taxes of all kinds which he will be compelled to pay and includes them in the price for which he proposes to sell to the consumer, and the consumer thus indirectly pays all taxes. The indirect taxes we pay are often greater than our direct taxes.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

The greatest obstacle to tax reduction is the constant increasing demand for appropriations continually pressed upon Congress, many of which are for the benefit of special classes and the advancement of private interests and wholly beyond the constitutional power of Congress to grant. There are many bills now pending for such appropriations. The greatest of them, greater than any other ever proposed to Congress, are those proposing what is known as the adjusted compensation for ex-service men. The bill for this purpose, which was defeated some two years ago, involved an appropriation of from $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000, and similar bills are now pending in Congress. If a bill carrying such appropriation is passed, the national indebtedness can not be reduced for many years and it will be impossible to repeal the oppressive tariff laws and the unreasonable and confiscatory income taxes.

There are those who assert that they favor tax reduction and at the same time favor the adjusted compensation legislation. The two propositions, in my opinion, are directly antagonistic and irreconcilable. We can not reduce taxation and increase disbursements from the Public Treasury. Appropriations and taxes go hand in hand. The Government must first collect money from the people by taxation before it can pay it out in appropriations. We can not contract and expand at one and the same time.

Recognizing these inexorable, physical, economic, and financial truths, those who favor both the reduction of taxation and the payment of bonuses propose that the interest and principal of the war debts due us from other countries be used to pay the bonus. Great Britain is the only country of consequence paying its indebtedness and the contract with it distributes its indebtedness over a period of 60 years and allows payment in our Liberty loan bonds, which were sold to the people for the purpose of raising money to make the foreign loans and in justice should be paid out of such loans. The payments that have been made were in these bonds, purchased at a discount in the market, and the transaction was merely a cancellation of mutual indebtedness. There can be no money collected from this source for any purpose. There is no probability of collections from other debtor nations in the near future. This proposition was suggested several years ago and abandoned, and I am surprised that anyone should revive it.

There are others who propose to pay the bonus by 50-year bonds of the United States. The money could probably be raised in this way, subject to danger of inflation and depreciation of Liberty loan bonds and other public securities, but, of course, taxes must be collected to meet the interest on those bonds and to raise a sinking fund for their payment.

It has also been stated that as adjusted compensation would be paid by Federal taxation it would be no burden upon the farmers, evidently proposing that it all be paid by the business interests. The farmers of the country do not wish to avoid sharing their proper proportion of the expense of government, and they know that the taxes, if paid in the first place by the manufacturers and business men, will be passed down to them as consumers in the prices of their supplies and equipment.

Human ingenuity can not devise a scheme whereby the United States can pay billions of dollars out of its Treasury for any purpose without levying and collecting money from the people in the form of taxation of some kind. We can reduce the taxes of the whole people or we can pay the bonus to the ex-service men, but we can not do both at the same time. The question is squarely presented to Congress and to the taxpayers of the country—shall we reduce taxes upon 110,000,000 people or give bonuses to 4,500,000 of the same people? And there is no escape from it.

WHO PAYS THE BONUS.

There is little in the contention that the profiteers will bear the burden of the adjusted compensation, for they are comparatively few in number. The taxes for that purpose will be paid by all the people, including those who worked and stunted themselves to support and maintain the Army and Navy in the field. This will include the fathers, mothers, and brothers of the ex-service men, and all of the ex-service men themselves, both disabled and able-bodied. There are thousands of both married and single women who are property holders and pay income taxes who, if this legislation passes, will be unable to obtain the relief which they so sorely need.

Congress and the people have not been wanting in their gratitude to the ex-service men of the World War. Compensation and allowances have been paid to more than 180,000 disabled veterans. Two billion dollars have been expended in compensation and for their cure and rehabilitation. In the first four years after the Civil War less than $96,000,000 were expended for the disabled soldiers, although there were about 2,600,000 men engaged in that war.

The Federal veterans of that war were not given service pensions until nearly 52 years after the war, and the veterans of the Spanish War until after the lapse of 20 years. The Confederate veterans of the Civil War, although they made the greatest sacrifices and were the best soldiers that ever fought for their country, were never given by their States a service pension, and the aged and incapacitated only get a meager and pitiful sum many years after the war.

HAS BEEN CRITICIZED.

I have been criticized by some of the ex-service men for my opposition to the proposed cash adjusted compensation, and a few of them have written me offensive letters, some threatening political opposition if I do not yield to their wishes and support the legislation. I am glad to say that the great body of ex-service men are good citizens, and, like all brave men, are tolerant of the views of others, and concede that their differences of opinion are honest and conscientious and without prejudice. I would like to have the friendship of all ex-service men, but I can not do what I believe would be a failure to discharge my duty to the great body of the people of Tennessee to obtain the vote of anyone. I have condemned others for using their money for political preferment, and I can not use the people's money for that purpose.

I have the greatest admiration for the ex-service men and am grateful to them for their sacrifices. I do not criticize them nor challenge their sincerity or integrity. I have supported all legislation for the support, comfort, and rehabilitation of disabled veterans, and as much as is humanly possible compensate them for their sacrifices and hardships, and will continue to vote for such legislation so long as I remain in the United States Senate. I favor granting the disabled veterans reasonable and just pensions, that they may remain at home with their families, and, as best they may, attend to their personal affairs, and I will favor like pensions to all veterans when they become incapacitated through disease or other causes.

America has always been grateful to her soldiers and has treated them with the greatest consideration. When we had a vast public domain they were granted bonuses in lands with great liberality. These lands were the property of the Government, and Congress had the right to so dispose of them. The present proposition is not to dispose of the property of the Government, but of the people and the taxpayers.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN THE SENATE

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in this Chamber, on the 6th day of March, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in rebuking the Senate in general and the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in particular, said in part, as shown on page 3804 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

I think the President of the United States ought not to be attacked in this body. . . . I think it is lowering the entire character of this body in the opinion of the people of the United States. . . . Therefore I have no sympathy, in fact I have great dislike, for any such attack as has been made here to-day or any such imputations as have been cast upon the President of the United States at the present time. I wish, for my own part, to make this protest against it.

Mr. President, to my mind the attitude of the Senator from Massachusetts as disclosed by the foregoing quotation is so antagonistic to the American ideal of free speech as to deserve the unqualified disapprobation of the Senate.

An examination of the Senator's entire speech and a portion of that of Senator HARRISON, which appears on page 3809 of the RECORD, will reveal the fact that what Senator LODGE characterizes as an attack on the President consists in substance of an expression of regret that the President had telegraphically communicated with Ned McLean after the latter's implication in the Nation's oil scandal had been published to the world. In fact, the utterances of the Senator from Mississippi which provoked the eminent historian, able Republican leader, and polished Senator from Massachusetts to administer his rebuke will be found upon careful reading to be nothing more nor less than a mild criticism of the President.

And have we reached the point where the President or any other public servant is above the criticism of a Senator or citizen of the United States?

Is an American President to be transformed into a German Kaiser, a Turkish Sultan, or a Russian dictator? Must a Senator, with bowed head, bated breath, and in a bondman's key, say, "his majesty" or "his royal highness" when referring to the President?

This is not the land of the Kaiser but the fatherland of Wendell Phillips, who said:

Free speech, at once the instrument and the guaranty and the bright, consummate flower of all liberty. Who can fitly describe the enormity of the crime of its violation?

This is not Russia, in which Czars and dictators have muzzled the press, silenced the advocates of freedom, and sent the critics of the Government to the dissolution of the grave. This is the native soil of William Lloyd Garrison, who said:

Liberty for each, for all, and forever.

This is not Turkey, the paradise of tyranny; it is the land of the great American and illustrious Virginian, Patrick Henry, who said:

Give me liberty or give me death!

Are we, the descendants of those who uttered these sublime sentiments, to be told at this late day that the enjoyment of our liberty ends at the White House gate?

When anyone from Massachusetts asserts that the President is above criticism in this Chamber or on the hustings he voices not the liberal sentiment of the present but echoes the illiberal thought of the buried and forgotten past.

When anyone from the old Bay State declares that the President, like the kings of old, can do no wrong, and that the President's acts are above discussion here, he speaks not for the Massachusetts that sent Daniel Webster, the lover of liberty and the greatest of American orators, to this Chamber; on the contrary, he speaks for that intolerant Massachusetts colony that expelled Roger Williams because of his religious belief, burned witches at the stake, and enacted a disgraceful law in 1656 to banish all Quakers from the Colony and punish violators of that law with death.

Shall we dishonor those who fought on the historic fields of Lexington and Concord and Bunker Hill for American liberty by stifling free speech in the United States Senate, sealing Senators' lips, and paralyzing Senators' tongues?

Shall a senatorial admonition abridge our freedom of speech when the Congress itself is prohibited by the first amendment to the Constitution from passing any law to accomplish that nefarious purpose?

The people have reserved to themselves the right to criticize their public officials and to hold them responsible for their actions, and when that right is lost liberty is lost, and without liberty man is an animal in a cage and life is worse than death.

We all respect the office of the Chief Magistrate, but the most of us believe that the President is still a human being, subject to human frailties and human faults, and that his actions, like our own, are open to the criticism of all who wish to comment upon anything that he may do or say.

But the Senator from Massachusetts evidently sees the President as a superman, towering like a Colossus above the rest of the race. He points to the President with pride, and, in effect, says to the Senate:

See what a grace is seated on his brow;
Hyperion's curls; the front of Jove himself;
An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
A station like the herald Mercury
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;
A combination, and a form, indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man.

And the illustrious Senator, seeing the President in this form, would have us, so far as Mr. Coolidge's actions are concerned, adopt for our emblem the familiar image of the three didactic monkeys—one having his hands over his ears so that he can hear no evil, the second having his hands over his eyes so that he can see no evil, and the third having his hands over his mouth so that he can speak no evil. In other words, as to everything that concerns the President the Members of this body should be blind and deaf and dumb.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I presume they would not want to have one's hands over his eyes when he went to Mr. McLean's house to see the prize-fight film.

Mr. NEELY. No; nor when Doheny is in the act of giving a Republican Cabinet officer a $100,000 bribe for all of the Nation's oil.

Mr. CARAWAY. He would need a big pocket.

Mr. NEELY. Or a satchel to carry the graft to Fall's ranch in New Mexico.

We do not wish to interfere with anyone's enjoyment of his delusions concerning the perfections of Republican officials, but we do protest against having these delusions made the keepers of our thought, our conscience, or our tongue.

Opinions may differ as to the justification of the criticism of the President made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Many believe that the Senator's remarks were timely, pertinent, and proper. They point out the fact that the day before the President sent his ambiguous telegram to McLean it was published far and near that the latter had told a deliberate falsehood about his having lent $100,000 to ex-Secretary of the Interior Fall in connection with the oil scandal that was at that time engrossing the attention of the Nation. Some contend that in the circumstances ordinary prudence should have restrained the President from seeking counsel or information from McLean.

And the President's indiscretion in communicating with McLean does not arouse our sympathy, as do the afflictions he is suffering as a result of the countless sins of the officers of his Cabinet. The President inherited the members of his Cabinet, and some of them, very unfortunately, indeed. But he did not inherit Ned McLean. If he did, then that has come to pass which was written by the Psalmist, "I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance." No; the President voluntarily chose McLean for his adviser and friend, and he must abide the consequences of his unhappy choice. He is now learning by bitter experience that there is no exception, even in favor of the President, to the ancient aphorism that "those who touch pitch will be defiled."

But, says the learned Senator from Massachusetts, the President's telegram to McLean is a trivial and perfectly explicable one, and I think I can assure the Senate—and I say it with as great confidence as I could say it of any man I have ever known—that "whatever record leaps to life, he never will be shamed." We all hope that this ringing declaration made by the President's political champion and personal friend is not only true in the present but that it may continue to be true in the future. But in spite of our respect for the Senator's prophetic vision, we can not be unmindful of the fact that in appraising Republican officials, the statesman from Massachusetts has heretofore on at least one occasion been conspicuously wrong.

According to the Philadelphia Record of the 6th day of March, after Herbert Welsh, president of the Indian Rights Association, had protested against the appointment of Mr. Fall as Secretary of the Interior, in February, 1921, it is alleged Senator LODGE wrote a letter to Mr. Welsh in which he used the following language:

Senator Fall is a thoroughly upright and high-minded man and utterly incapable of using his office for his own financial interest, which I regret to say is implied by some of the expressions of your letter.

Certainly no Member of the Senate would now venture to contend that the foregoing is not an extremely erroneous estimate of Mr. Fall, who has, by his corrupt negotiations, shocked the Nation, ruined this administration, and disgraced the office of Secretary of the Interior, which he formerly held.

Many of us neither question nor doubt the integrity of the President, nor the sincerity of the Senator from Massachusetts in proclaiming the President's virtues. But in view of the error made by the Senator from Massachusetts in passing judgment on Mr. Fall we must decline to surrender our right to criticize the actions of the President when we believe they deserve it, notwithstanding the certificate of political perfection of character given him by Senator LODGE.

But the sufficiency or insufficiency of the provocation for Senator HARRISON's criticism is really irrelevant to my discussion. My interest is not in this isolated case or the justification of the words spoken by Senator HARRISON in debate. My present interest is in the preservation of the freedom of speech. Free speech is the sun of liberty. In its dazzling light truth vanquishes error, virtue triumphs over vice, the wicked are scourged from the seats of the mighty, and the righteous are enthroned.

If criticism is unfounded and malicious, it disgraces and discredits its author but rarely, if ever, injures him against whom it is launched. To attack the innocent is to hurl a boomerang that invariably returns to injure him who throws it more than it hurts its intended victim. In brief, free speech contains its own "life and death." Rightly used, it is the buckler and shield of those in trouble, the never-failing weapon of the weak, and the impregnable fortress of both the weak and the strong battling for right and defending a just cause. If abused, free speech becomes an instrument of destruction to him who wickedly wields it to accomplish a selfish purpose or gain a dishonest end.

No President, or other public official, if innocent, has anything to fear from criticism, no matter how unjust or vicious it may be, for—

Against the head that innocence secures,
Insidious malice flings her fiery darts in vain,
Turned back by the powerful breath of heaven.

But if a public official is guilty of wrongdoing, criticism of his conduct will crystallize public opinion against him and drive him from his office to make way for a servant more faithful in the discharge of his duty and more loyal to his trust.

But the Senator from Massachusetts has apparently overlooked the fact that Mr. Coolidge has, like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, a dual personality, and I do not mean to impute any of the imperfections of the latter to the President. Mr. Coolidge is not only the President, but he is an active candidate, and so far a most successful one, for the Republican nomination for President. Indeed, it is generally believed that big business and southern delegates under Mr. Sleep's absolute control will be able to override all the opposition of the Johnson and other progressive forces and nominate Mr. Coolidge on the first ballot.

Because of the fact that he is a candidate, if for no other reason, Mr. Coolidge's every act and deed will be open to the freest discussion and criticism until after the election. Everyone, from the urchin in the street to the Senator in his place, has the right to comment upon the conduct of candidates for public office. So far as I know, there are only two countries in the world to-day where this right is challenged, and those countries are Italy and Russia. The first has Mussolini's iron-handed, despotic government, and the latter, in many respects, has what is worse than no government at all.

If we are to be deprived of the right of criticizing officials who are candidates for reelection we shall soon have a dynasty in this country which in power and "far-flung battle lines" will eclipse anything that the Chinaman ever dreamed of or the ancient Egyptian ever saw. Let us hope that such a calamity may never befall the people of the United States.

The right both of the people and the press to comment upon candidates for office and to criticize their conduct in the interest of public policy must be preserved at any cost. Some indication of the extent of the prevailing recognition of this right may be found in the following excerpts, the first of which is from the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of West Virginia in the case of Baker v. Sweeney:

The conduct and actions of such candidate (for public office) may be freely commented upon. His acts may be canvassed and his conduct boldly censured. Nor is it material that such criticism of conduct should in the estimate of a jury be just. The right to criticize the action or conduct of a candidate is a right, on the part of the party making the publication, to judge himself of the justness of the criticism. (13 W. Va., p. 758.)

And, says Chief Justice Parsons, of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the case of the Commonwealth against Clapp:

When any man shall consent to be a candidate for public office, conferred by the election of the people, he must be considered as putting his character in issue in so far as it may respect his fitness and qualifications for the office. (4 Mass., p. 163.)

Not only does every candidate, including the President, when he seeks the suffrage of the people, put his character in issue, but he impliedly invites the people to discuss that issue and expressly asks them to decide it at the polls. This right, which is universally conceded to all other citizens of the Republic, the Members of the Senate must steadfastly refuse to yield.

It is further charged, in effect, by the Senator from Massachusetts that we lower the dignity of the Senate by criticizing the President. In my opinion the mass of the people of this country do not now consider either dignity or dignitaries the most indispensable quantities in the senatorial equation, although it will be cheerfully conceded by all that nothing unseemly ought to be tolerated in this Chamber. But what the people really want, unless I mistake their temper, is not more Senators with superfluous dignity but more Senators who are not afraid to dig; Senators who have the courage to declare, in the words of James Russell Lowell, who was once in good repute even in the great State of Massachusetts:

My soul is not a palace of the past,
Where outworn creeds, like Rome's gray senate, quake,
Hearing afar the Vandal's trumpet hoarse
That shakes old systems with a thunder fit.
The time is ripe, and rotten ripe for change;
Then let it come; I have no dread of what
Is called for by the instinct of mankind,
Nor think I that God's world will fall apart
Because we tear a parchment more or less.

But a single citation of authority that is typical of many others that could be readily made will show whether the honorable Member from Massachusetts is justified in believing that criticism of the President lowers the dignity of the Senate, or the character of this body. The following is found in Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates in Congress, volume 10, part 2, under the date of April 30, 1834:

Never . . . have I known or read of an administration which expires with so much agony and so little composure and resignation . . . It exhibits a state of mind, feverish, fretful, and fidgety, bounding recklessly from one desperate expedient to another, without any sober or settled purpose. Ever since the dog-days of last summer, it has been making a succession of the most extravagant plunges.

A new philosophy has sprung up within a few years past, called phrenology . . . Gall and Spurzheim, its founders . . . being dead, I regret that neither of them can examine the head of our illustrious Chief Magistrate, but if it could be surveyed by Doctor Caldwell . . . I am persuaded that he would find the organ of destructiveness prominently developed. Except an enormous fabric of executive power for himself, the President has built up nothing, constructed nothing, and will leave no enduring monument of his administration. He goes for destruction, universal destruction; it seems to be his greatest ambition to efface and obliterate every trace of the wisdom of his predecessors. He has displayed this remarkable trait throughout his whole life, whether in private walks or in the public service.

What would be his surprise if Mr. Jefferson, rising from the dead, were to behold the enormous and startling pretensions of the present Chief Magistrate? It is in vain to disguise it—the rapid strides of the Executive, if not checked, will soon inevitably conduct us to a practical monarchy, in which, mocked with the forms of free government, we shall, in fact, have but one. . . . Will the President never cease to regard himself as a great political hunter, who, before he secures the tail or skin of one prize, which he has won in the chase, must dash with horse and hound into the depth of the forest to start fresh game?

The criticism just read was made by Senator Henry Clay, of Kentucky, the great compromiser and one of the greatest of American statesmen. The victim of the attack was Andrew Jackson. And who were some of the other Members of the Senate at the time Mr. Clay made that speech? Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, and Daniel Webster, from the State of Massachusetts. Will some Senator specify the day on which there was more dignity or brains or statesmanship in the United States Senate than characterized its proceedings when it claimed for its Members such illustrious names as those just mentioned?

If the conduct of the Senate during the Sixty-eighth Congress is and shall continue to be of the same high character as that which made it famous in the days of Webster, Benton, and Clay, we need have no fear for the reputation of this body.

But the Senator from Massachusetts contends that it is unusual to attack or criticize the President in the Senate. How marvelous is the convenience of the Senator's memory, and how miraculous is the inconsistency of his argument.

Is it possible that the Senator is—

To dumb forgetfulness a prey?

Those who were Members of this body or read the papers at the time will recall that in this Chamber during the period between the signing of the armistice and the 4th day of March, 1921, all the fountains of political billingsgate were poured upon President Wilson, every poisoned arrow of political hatred was aimed at his suffering body, every vial of partisan wrath was poured upon his aching but unbowed head. In my opinion, nothing can be found in all the history of vituperation so overwhelming and bitter as the abuse that was heaped upon Woodrow Wilson during the last 27 months of his second term as President of the United States, while he was wasting his strength day by day, shedding his life blood drop by drop, for the cause of world-wide peace, to the end that the earth might never again be drenched with human gore, to the end that men made in the image of their great Creator might never again be called upon to maim and mangle and butcher each other on fields of battle, to the end that humanity might nevermore be dragged through the frightful hell of hideous war.

Although the Senator from Massachusetts was, throughout the time in question, a member of this body, we challenge those present to point to the page of the Record on which may be found a single word of rebuke uttered by the honorable gentleman to anyone for attacking President Wilson. Does anyone doubt that the difference between the Senator's attitude toward the Chief Executive then and the Chief Executive now is occasioned by the fact that Woodrow Wilson was a Democrat and Calvin Coolidge is a Republican?

If inconsistency, like its antonym, were a jewel, the great Senator from Massachusetts could safely boast the ownership of—

A gem of purest ray serene,

In comparison with which the "Cullinan," the "Kohinoor," and the "Star of the South" would look like ordinary pebbles or common stones.

On a memorable occasion, recorded in sacred history, "Last of all came Satan"; so, last of all come a number of newspapers that are hostile to the Senate and its investigations which are showing the intimate connection between big business and corrupt politics, and join in the attack upon the Members of this body who have dared to suggest that President Coolidge should not have communicated with Ned McLean in the circumstances previously mentioned.

The Washington Post on the 9th day of this month contains a symposium of a number of editorials that are uncomplimentary to the Senate. Let us choose from the collection and examine the editorials of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the New York Times, the management of both of which have unqualifiedly accepted the admonition:

Let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
Where thrift may follow fawning.

The first of the editorials in question is, in part, as follows:

There will come a day when Washington will recover its now lost sanity. When that day comes the Senate of the United States will wish it might blot from its records all traces of Thursday, March 6, 1924. On that day it sank to a new low level in its history.

For weeks its mud guns have belched and splashed. What once was a great deliberative body has been resounding to the partisan yelpings of little men and the snaps and snarls of character assassins.

The public has been shocked and finally disgusted by this brazen exhibition of poison-tongued partisanship, pure malice, and twitting hysteria.

Thursday capped the climax. That day two private telegrams from the President of the United States were read into the record of one of many senatorial inquiries.

. . . The White House explanations of both were adequate and clear.

But they did not convince the narrow and hate-filled minds of some Senators. Hardly were they in the Record before the fifth batteries of the Senate, manned by the three mad gunners—HARRISON, of Mississippi; CARAWAY, of Arkansas; and HEFLIN, of Alabama—went into action. Senate rifle pits spat venom. The drum fire of Senate innuendo was laid down upon the White House.

Not a man of them all had a scrap of evidence. No matter, they made hearsay, rumor, and suspicion serve, and for hours they mouthed venomous insinuations and bespattered the name of the President of the United States with sinister implications.

In all the Senate only one man had the courage to stand against them. Senator LODGE has known the Senate in its greater days. When he rose and made dignified protest against these savage innuendoes and searing villifications, the rabid pack turned on him as wolves wheel and snap. They would not be cheated of their daily hour of hate.

As they turned to a new victim, whatever is left of the decency, political fairness, and honor of the Senate sat mute as so many dumb, cowed, and driven cattle.

All of the foregoing euphemistic language is from the chaste Philadelphia Public Ledger. This editorial further says:

When the Senate was the Senate, there were men who would have risen and read these whirling dervishes from Dixie a lesson in elementary decency. Where are they now? Where were the saner, fairer Democrats of to-day—GLASS, BRUCE, SIMMONS, and RALSTON? Where was the courage of those Republicans who sat silent and shivering, leaving the white-haired LODGE to stand alone and fight alone? Where, for instance, were CURTIS, WATSON, DAVID REED, MOSES, PEPPER, and WILLIS? Where was PEPPER, paladin of fair play, and BORAH, the pure of heart?

Gentlemen of the Senate, be good enough, for your own sake, to put your political mountebanks, your partisan clowns and your Godsakers back to their places!

It is very difficult to conceive of an editorial writer on the Public Ledger, even in a paroxysm of delirium tremens, using such vulgar, such disgusting, and such degrading language in decrying against the freedom of speech, or the abuse of its privilege by Members of the United States Senate. If the author of the foregoing editorial had devoted as much time to studying American history and familiarizing himself with current events as he has evidently spent in barrooms and brothels to acquire a mastery of the billingsgate that we have quoted, and by the use of which no sane man would have disgraced himself, or imposed upon the respectability of the newspaper-reading public, he would not ask why "BORAH, the pure of heart," did not protest against the mild criticism of the President uttered by the Senator from Mississippi.

If the blackguard on the Ledger who wrote this editorial had known the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] as his colleagues know him here he would not have insulted the Senator's intelligence by intimating that he would ever descend to suggest a suppression of free speech or free criticism even of the President by any citizen of the land, whether of low or high degree.

If this degenerate editor's ignorance were not equal to his journalistic vulgarity he might know that there is now pending in this body a bill (S. 1196), introduced by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, section 3 of which is as follows:

That every officer, agent, or employee of the United States in the civil, military, or naval service thereof who, by force, threat, intimidation, order, advice, or otherwise, prevents or attempts to prevent any person from freely exercising his right, privilege, or immunity by lawful means to advance, promote, agitate for, or discuss any amendment to the Constitution of the United States or any new statute of the United States or amendment of a statute of the United States, or any proposition, policy, or measure, or any legislative, executive, or administrative action, the carrying out of which under the Constitution of the United States would fall within the scope of Federal jurisdiction or would involve an amendment of the United States Constitution, shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned for not more than five years or fined not more than $10,000, or both.

If that section of Senator BORAH's bill had previously been enacted into law, and the Senator from Massachusetts had been deprived of his constitutional immunity by reason of his being a Member of this body, without his having ceased to be a public official, think what could have been done to him for his recent attempt to prevent us from freely exercising our privilege of free speech in discussing the President's action in sending his telegram to Ned McLean.

And where was PEPPER, paladin of fair play? Would the editor of the Ledger expect Senator PEPPER, who is one of the most distinguished lawyers in this body, and as such naturally inclined to be a champion of liberty, to scold the Senate for mildly criticizing the President, when the constitution of Pennsylvania, the State which Senator PEPPER in part so ably represents, says:

Every citizen may freely speak, write, or print on any subject.

And would the Ledger have Senator REED of Pennsylvania, the son of a most eminent lawyer and a great lawyer himself, insult the constitution of his native State and the Constitution of the United States by attempting to abridge the freedom of speech in time of peace.

Would the pigmy editor of the Ledger insult CARTER GLASS, the distinguished Senator from the Old Dominion, who is always a faithful defender of the Constitution, by admonishing him to smite a fellow Senator for exercising his right of free speech, when the great State of Virginia embodied in her ratification of the Federal Constitution a declaration of such right?

Fortunately, nearly everyone here and elsewhere knows why the able and patriotic Senators taken to task by the Ledger did not join in the recently attempted suppression of criticism of the Chief Executive in this Chamber. They understand that it is because the most of the Members of the Senate, regardless of politics, believe that it is more important to preserve liberty than it is to perpetuate any administration or any man of any party in any office. It is because the Senators are alive to the fact that they are under greater obligations to serve the American people as a whole than they are to serve big business, which, through its recent manipulation of corrupt officials, has filled Washington with scandal and brought disgrace upon the land.

In passing, let it be said of Senators CARAWAY, HARRISON, and HEFLIN, that they are "gunners," as the Ledger charges. But "mad" gunners they are not. And they can console themselves with the thought that their guns have always been used for, and never against, the American people. Their guns have been aimed and fired only at the privilege hunters, the favor seekers, the plunderers, and the profiteers.

Next, we have the following, from the New York Times:

After Senator HEFLIN had summoned on Friday all his vast resources of logic, rhetoric, and moral discrimination to prove that the word "principal" in one of the McLean dispatches must have meant the President, it was slightly amusing to find from yesterday's testimony that a brother Senator was really indicated. . . . The whole mystery made of the telegram is a striking illustration of the false scents on which the senatorial hounds are all the time running off merely at a word. Senator HEFLIN's ridiculous mistake may deter others—nothing can deter him—from rushing out with a sinister interpretation of a telegram that is on the point of being shown to mean nothing culpable.

One of the dispatches put in evidence spoke of the "reaction" which sets in when false or exaggerated charges fall to the earth. This is certain to be the case when the President of the United States is concerned. Loose and vague attacks upon his character will rebound upon their authors with terrific force when it becomes plain that they had nothing to go upon except rumor and their own malicious inferences. "When you strike a king," said Emerson, "you must make sure that you kill him, or it will go hard with you." The ineffective blows aimed at President Coolidge by hasty Senators will hurt them more than they possibly can him.

Thus the Times, by deduction, informs the "Senate hounds"—doubtless meaning all of us except the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts—that the President is already a king. While many have probably suspected that the Times would advocate the substitution of a king for a President if the plutocracy which it so faithfully serves should desire it to pursue that course, we had nevertheless indulged the hope that this country might long be spared the disastrous transformation.

It is refreshing, however, to know that only a very few of the prominent newspapers of the country are fawning sycophants and servile tools of selfish interests. It is consoling to know that only a few of them, on an instant's notice, habitually rush to the attack of every public official who faithfully discharges his duty, defies the bosses, and refuses to bow the knee to Mammon.

How grateful must be the countless multitudes of common people whose rule of life is the golden rule, who seek no peculiar advantages for themselves at the expense of others, and who believe that no one, however righteous by nature or exalted by accident or favor, is entitled to greater immunity for an indiscretion than the humblest citizen of the land—how grateful this great class must be to find in the courageous New York World, one of the greatest newspapers on the globe, the following appropriate and refreshing language which appeared in the World's leading editorial on the 7th day of March:

MR. COOLIDGE'S INDISCRETION.

President Coolidge has wisely deemed it necessary to explain to the public how he happened to be exchanging telegrams with Edward B. McLean at Palm Beach during the course of the Senate oil investigation. Two messages, which he had recently sent to McLean in Florida, were given out yesterday by the Senate committee. As interpreted at the White House, they have no special significance. One related to the District commissionership of the District of Columbia, about which Mr. Coolidge wanted to consult with the Republican city chairman; the other was in reply to a message of congratulation on Mr. Coolidge's reply to the Senate on the adoption of the resolution calling for Secretary Denby's resignation.

Mr. Coolidge is a stern moralist. He has laid down rules of official conduct that are inflexible. He has taught the country to have confidence in him as a man who will not be swayed from his duty by any personal considerations. He does nothing on hasty impulse or through recklessness. In the circumstances it is strange that he should have permitted himself to hold private communication for any political purpose with a person in McLean's position.

For Edward B. McLean has figured very conspicuously in the oil scandal. He is the Washington newspaper publisher who was represented as making a loan of $100,000 to former Secretary Fall for the purchase of a ranch in New Mexico. On December 26, 1923, Fall wrote to the Senate committee, after previously refusing to reveal where the money came from, that "the gentleman from whom I obtained it and who furnished me the cash was the Hon. Edward B. McLean, of Washington, D. C." McLean, through counsel, confirmed Fall's written explanation. It was a deliberately false statement, made by both of them with the purpose of deceiving the Senate committee.

Barely two weeks later—on January 11, 1914—McLean, when placed under oath by Senator WALSH at Palm Beach, testified that the checks he had given Fall were returned unused, and Fall admitted the facts were as McLean, when placed under oath, had stated them. Fall was then McLean's guest at Palm Beach. C. Bascom Slemp, Secretary to the President, was at Palm Beach, where he met Fall in McLean's house and "urged him to make a clean showing of everything to the committee." He has testified that during his stay at the Florida resort he was in confidential communication with the White House.

It was the very day after McLean and Fall were caught in a lie by Senator WALSH, the very day after they admitted lying about the McLean payment to Fall, that Mr. Coolidge over his own name telegraphed to McLean in regard to a political matter. The whole country then knew how McLean had been mixed up in the business of shielding Fall from exposure; it knew that he had been forced to confess to supporting Fall in false statements, yet it was to McLean Mr. Coolidge then turned for confidential advice on a political question affecting the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Coolidge is ordinarily too level-headed and cautious a man to be betrayed into so embarrassing an indiscretion. In the circumstances he should have known better than to continue on terms of intimacy, even private, with a man of McLean's record in the Fall transaction. "Easy and quick access" to the White House becomes less of a mystery.

It is my fervent hope that the writer of the foregoing World editorial may have a long and happy life and a green old age, and that he may long continue to wield his powerful pen for the promotion of even-handed justice and an absolutely square deal for every man and woman and child.

Every progressive Member of Congress, regardless of party, everyone who likes fair play, and all those in and about Washington who prefer intelligent and ethical editorial discussion to poisonous propaganda should join in extending a vote of thanks to the Washington Daily News, not only for its usual able and truthful editorial policy but for two recent fearless and meritorious editorials in particular, the first of which appeared in the issue of the 8th and the other in the issue of the 12th day of March. The first is, in part, as follows:

HIS MAJESTY OR THE PRESIDENT.

Senator LODGE's contention that there ought to be a Senate rule protecting the President from attack by Senators won't get very far with the American people.

Whether the attacks which stirred up the sedate and solemn Senator from Massachusetts were wise or foolish, just or unjust, or even outrageous has nothing to do with the case. Nor does it make any difference what President is attacked or by what Senator.

Every President is entitled to proper respect "by virtue of the office he holds," as Senator LODGE puts it. That is, the office is entitled to respect. If the President is not treated with respect by a Senator, the burden of proof is upon the Senator that his criticism is justified by the facts, for the people will assume that any President is entitled to respect until convinced that he isn't.

No President needs any rule protecting him from vicious or even scandalous attacks by Senators. His own conduct is all the protection any President needs, and there is enough general respect for the office to make an unjust attack much more dangerous to the Senator who makes the attack than to the President who is attacked.

But while there is no danger to the President without such a rule, there would be real danger to popular government with such a rule, even though at times it be abused. When democracy begins to sanctify Presidents, Congressmen, and judges, we will be headed in the wrong direction—back toward autocracy. For all of these are public servants, not masters.

Senator LODGE himself was within his rights when he bitterly hated and viciously attacked the late President Wilson, but Wilson's conduct and character were all the protection he needed in public esteem from all the virulence of LODGE's assaults.

If President Coolidge is as high-minded and noble-purposed as Wilson was, he has nothing to fear, even though the Senate were full of Democratic Lodges.

The following is the second of the editorials in question which the News carried:

CROCODILE TEARS FOR COOLIDGE.

McLean's Washington newspaper says that the leading newspapers of the country condemn the Senate for publishing President Coolidge's private telegrams and for attacking the President in senatorial speeches. To prove its case, McLean quotes the New York Times, New York Herald, New York Tribune, Philadelphia Public Ledger, and Philadelphia Inquirer.

All of which would seem to indicate that the country consists of New York and Philadelphia, and that a leading newspaper is one that plays the organ for big business and is strong for Mellon's tax food for multimillionaires.

One might think from the tender solicitude of these leading newspapers that the distinguished President was as innocent as a babe concerning politics.

Coolidge is no political greenhorn. A regular organization Republican, who has served as member of the Massachusetts Legislature, mayor of Northampton, member and president of the State senate, lieutenant governor and governor, and then Vice President of the United States and Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, he has been long enough on the job to have his eyeteeth cut.

So far as oil is concerned, Coolidge presided over the Senate when LA FOLLETTE introduced his resolution to investigate the oil swindle and heard LA FOLLETTE's speech. He sat in Cabinet meetings throughout the Harding administration. It is reasonable to assume he reads at least one daily newspaper, and hence knew something of McLean's connection with Fall.

Nobody accuses President Coolidge of any guilty knowledge of crookedness in the oil scandal. About all he is charged with is playing the game clear through as a regular organization Republican and with doing nothing to clean up the nasty mess until forced by the Senate, and then he did his darndest to turn the legal end of the prosecution over to a bunch of corporation lawyers without consulting the Senate committee until after the appointments were made.

What Coolidge doesn't seem to sense is that what happens to the country is much more important than what happens to the Republican or to any political party.

The paragraph last quoted contains a world of meaning, which the serious-minded Members of the Congress fully appreciate. Its meaning is simply this: It is the duty of every public official to put the welfare of his country above the welfare of his political party, and to do his duty without fear or favor every day, and all day long.

In order that the motives of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the New York Times, in assailing the Senate for the manner in which it has conducted the investigations of the oil scandal, may be understood, and in order to protect the public, so far as possible, against the paid propaganda of privilege, of which these two papers are the favorite purveyors, it will probably serve a good purpose to set forth a portion of the appraisals of these journalistic instruments of plutocracy, made by one of the best-informed, most truthful, most progressive and enlightening newspaper men of this generation, Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, formerly the editor of the New York Evening Post, and at the present the editor of The Nation. With Mr. Villard I confess that I frequently disagree.

However, I heartily concur in all that he says about the Public Ledger and the New York Times. I now read from Mr. Villard's most interesting book, entitled "Some Newspapers and Newspaper Men":

THE PHILADELPHIA PUBLIC LEDGER, A MUFFED OPPORTUNITY.

Cyrus H. K. Curtis, the Henry Ford of the magazine industry, has without doubt done more to mechanize and standardize the public mind of America than any other man.

Then there came a day when, success having crowned his efforts with the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies' Home Journal, Mr. Curtis felt he could leave to his Boks and Lorimers the conduct of those papers and could look for new fields to conquer. So he purchased the Public Ledger, for generations one of the staidest of Philadelphia's institutions, a perfect embodiment of the conservatism and propriety of Rittenhouse Square, as well as of its dullness and its sanctimoniousness.

Surely, it was thought, the world will now see a notable journalistic development.

But the newspaper which dwells alongside the Saturday Evening Post, for all its excellent qualities and features, is without originality or distinction and without a soul.

It has what most people believe to be an admirable section devoted not merely to the news of Wall Street but to the news of trade and commerce.

But the change in Mr. Curtis's financial status has had the same effect upon him as it has had upon so many others—it has placed him in the society of the rich and privileged and contented. He goes daily to the Union League Club, there to meet his friends as a super-giant among giants, and from this Olympian height he deigns to give his fellow Americans the benefit of his own views, to instruct them as to what they ought to have and what they should become. * * *

It [the Public Ledger] is indubitably independent politically, though it would hardly be found supporting a Democrat for President or attacking a Republican tariff. * * *

In the fight for free speech and the liberty of the American individual as made in Philadelphia the Ledger has helped not at all. * * *

So much for Mr. Curtis and the Public Ledger.

Under the title, "Mr. Ochs and his Times," Mr. Villard speaks to the point, in the following language:

The twenty-fifth anniversary, on August 18, 1921, of his control of the New York Times gave Adolph S. Ochs an opportunity to review the period of his ownership, and to set forth the journalistic success he had achieved. The Times * * * does an annual gross business of $20,000,000. In 1922 its net profits were reported to be $2,500,000.

The Times is no more independent than it is swayed by a desire to be just. It is a class paper, pure and simple, as much so as the Call. * * * No journal has exceeded it in disseminating falsehoods, misrepresentations, and half-truths during the unparalleled era of wholesale lying in which the whole world has lived since 1914. * * *

Not even the dead are safe at its hands. * * * Endless are the letters of correction and reproof which go to the Times, never to appear in print. Certainly the protestant has no standing whatever in the Times court, unless he is of the elect and the powerful, and on the popular side.

Before the god of wealth the Times ever bows down. It has even said, with almost incredible callousness and heartlessness, "that a certain degree of unemployment is curative of many social disorders. It is the argument to the stomach which becomes necessary when the appeal to reason and industrial morality fails"—let the dogs of workers eat cake if they have no bread! But how it bleats if Congress or the tag-father squeezes the rich to whom it toadies day by day, year in, year out, every reader of it knows. At the feet of the rich—chiefly the vulgar rich—and the powerful, it fawns day in and day out. That is Mr. Ochs's chief philosophy, a great secret of his business success—that and his unending devotion to the god of things as they are. * * *

It is the London Morning Post with which the Times must be contrasted; but there also the Times fails: Toryism is better served, more ably defended in London. Both deserve well of every Gary, every Calvin Coolidge, of every Curzon, and every Bonar Law. In them the existing, broken-down order has its staunchest defenders.

So now we know why the Times has so promptly uttered its war cry for Mr. Coolidge, and has with spear and battle-ax rushed to the attack of those who have commented upon his actions.

Mr. President and Members of the Senate, in spite of the clamor of a number of kept newspapers, in spite of an occasional official reprimand, in spite of the curses of those in power and the opposition of the plunderers of the people, we shall continue to discharge our duty as we see it. We shall continue to preserve the liberty of the Nation.

The most sacred of all the sacred institutions of this Republic is that of freedom—freedom of person, freedom of religion, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press. Our forefathers fought for these things, our ancestors died for them, and, if necessary, the American people will swim their horses in blood to the bridge reins to preserve them forever and forever.

In the words of a great libertarian as well as a great poet:

We will speak out, we will be heard,
Though all earth's systems crack;
We will not bate a single word,
Nor take a letter back.
Let Harp fear, let cowards shrink,
Let traitors turn away;
Whatever we have dared to think
That dare we also say.
We speak the truth, and what care we
For hissing and for scorn,
While some faint gleamings we can see
Of Freedom's coming morn.

M'LEAN TELEGRAMS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, some days ago, I understand, some caustic comment was submitted in the Record touching certain telegrams introduced before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys emanating from the White House and referred to in the eloquent address to which we have just listened. I desire to have incorporated in the Record some comment expressing a different view. First, I present an editorial appearing in the Philadelphia North American of Friday, March 14, 1924, and ask that it be inserted in the Record without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

ILLUMINATING TELEGRAMS.

A classic anecdote of Pennsylvania politics tells of a governor who suddenly became involved in difficulties with the public and was saved from making matters worse by receipt of the following message, wired from Washington:

"DEAR GOVERNOR: Don't talk.

"M. S. QUAY."

We would be the last to argue that the leadership of this master politician would be a national benefit at this time. But if there had been in Washington during the last few months a Republican statesman capable of giving and enforcing advice of this kind what a prodigious amount of embarrassment and discredit the party would have escaped! If his injunction had been merely "Don't telegraph," and had been obeyed, incalculable damage would have been averted.

Many superficial readers have assumed that the scores of columns of news dispatches published recently have concerned the oil leases and the corruption associated with them. But the truth is that during the last three weeks the hearings in the committee room and the debates in the Senate have dealt almost exclusively with telegraphic correspondence having only collateral relation to the main issues.

We are perfectly aware that this mass of material has no direct bearing upon the legal or moral guilt of any official accused of betraying the Nation. We subject to proper discount the venomous attacks which partisan enemies of the administration have based upon it. Close study of the documents discloses to us no such evidence of wholesale perjury, no such orgy of criminality, as Democratic orators have professed to discover. Nevertheless we have found an examination of the messages exceedingly enlightening. Read analytically, together with the testimony of those who sent or received them, they illuminate some of the obscure recesses of the Washington situation. Though they provide no basis for indictments, they convey a strikingly clear impression of the unwholesome atmosphere which has pervaded the National Capital, encouraging sinister influences and blunting the sensibilities even of men whose personal rectitude is beyond question. The President himself might well wish that he had adopted the motto "Don't telegraph."

In studying the record certain chronological data should be borne in mind. It was in December last that inquiries made into ex-Secretary Fall's sudden rise from financial embarrassment to affluence furnished the first circumstantial evidence of possible corruption in the leasing of the Navy's oil reserves. And it was precisely then that there was inaugurated the feverish telegraphic campaign which has provided so clear an insight into conditions at Washington. The first public disclosure of something unusual was on December 27, when the Senate committee, in response to questions, received from Fall a written statement denying that he had ever received money from Doheny or Sinclair, the oil lessees, and asserting that he had borrowed $100,000 from Edward B. McLean, a Washington publisher, known as a close friend of high Government officials. Four days later, instructed by a telegram from McLean, then at Palm Beach, A. Mitchell Palmer wrote to the committee quoting McLean's statement:

"In 1921 I loaned Fall $100,000 on his personal note."

Having reason to doubt this explanation, the committee sent Senator WALSH to Palm Beach on January 9 to examine McLean. Put under oath, McLean admitted that his story was false; he had given Fall $100,000 in checks, but the Secretary returned them unused, stating that he had obtained the needed sum "elsewhere." With the Fall-McLean fabrication shattered, the committee prepared for vigorous measures, and on January 24 the truth came out. E. L. Doheny testified that it was he who had "loaned" Fall the $100,000, sending it to him in currency in a satchel, a few months before obtaining the lease of Navy oil lands. And next day Sinclair's counsel admitted that that philanthropic oil capitalist had "loaned" the Secretary $25,000.

Turning to the telegrams, we find that McLean, in Palm Beach, and Fall, in Washington, were greatly agitated in December by the necessity for filing with the committee formal statement embodying the story they had concocted at a conference in Atlantic City, and the publisher was in constant touch with his office by wire. On December 22, John Major, his secretary, telegraphed that a private leased wire should be installed, giving him "easy and quick access to the White House"; and he also reported that C. Bascom Slomp, President Coolidge's secretary, was leaving that night for Palm Beach. The chief doorkeeper at the White House likewise telegraphed McLean that Slomp was on the way. Fall went to Florida as McLean's guest on December 20.

Major reported in detail consultations with McLean's attorneys concerning the presentation of the statement to the committee, and persistently urged the leasing of a private wire. It was installed on January 2, and next day Major sent word that the Washington end would be in charge of E. W. Smithers, who during the day is chief telegraph operator at the White House. With this private means of communication established, McLean's confidential employees sent him scores of messages every day. Ira Bennett, his editor, advised him that he had better testify in person, and Major warned him "prosecutor want source of money." On January 24 Doheny told the truth about the $100,000 loan, and McLean wired in a panic to Major: "Have had tip that I am to be called. My health prohibits my returning north. See Mitchell Palmer and see if he will represent me in proceedings."

Meanwhile the use of code communication was adopted. A McLean employee telegraphed him January 9: "Jaguar baptistical stowage beadle 1235 huff pulsator commensal fitful Lambert conation fecund hybridize"; this the committee found to mean: "Senator WALSH leaves on the Coast Line at 12.35 to-night; Lambert (McLean's lawyer) on same train." Another message sent the same day informed McLean that J. W. Zevely, who is Sinclair's counsel, said the publisher need not fear the questions that were to be put to him by WALSH. Messages signed "The Champion" contained such passages as these:

"Just talked with Apricots and believe he has the thing well in hand. He advises not to talk about peaches or Apples with anyone. He says Apples and Cherries assured him you need not worry. The peaches will be just what you want."

If the telegraphic correspondence uncovered had disclosed nothing more than McLean's apprehension over the impending exposure of the mendacity, it would have been relatively unimportant, except as revealing the character of a man who had ostentatiously exhibited his intimate relations with President Harding and other high officials in the administration. But there were messages susceptible of much more serious interpretations. Major telegraphed about seeing "H. D.," identified later as Attorney General Daugherty, who sent word that McLean should not worry. A message to Palm Beach read:

"Informed that investigation is being made by Senate committee to determine if you had $100,000 in cash in any bank at time you testified you gave Fall checks for amount."

This was signed "Rochester," later identified as a confidential secretary of Daugherty. Bennett, McLean's editor, telegraphed on January 29, just after the Doheny testimony:

"Saw principal; delivered message. He says he greatly appreciates and sends regards to you and Mrs. McLean. There will be no rocking of boat and no resignations. He expects reaction from unwarranted political attacks."

On February 14 Bennett wired that he had seen "X" (Daugherty), who sent this word: "I am at Y's (Walsh's) elbow and standing at the guns. All that is possible to do will be done by us." A code message of February 2 was sent to McLean's secretary, then in Palm Beach, by his wife, an employee of William J. Burns, chief of Daugherty's bureau of investigation. It read: "Burns told me communicate McLean; inquiries being made special agent Department Justice."

Hardly less remarkable than the text of these telegrams were the explanations given by the writers when called before the committee. Daugherty's man Rochester said glibly that his warning to McLean was "a purely personal communication," having nothing to do with his official position. Bennett denounced the charge of Senators that "the principal" was President Coolidge; he insisted that "the principal" he had seen was Senator Curtis, who promptly denied the statement; whereupon Bennett said that the first, second, and fourth sentences referred to Curtis, while in stating that there would be "no rocking of the boat and no resignations" he was giving his own version of remarks by President Coolidge. Burns explained that the tip he sent McLean was not that he was being investigated by the department, but that some one was asking why he, McLean, was listed as a special agent thereof.

There remain to be examined two more items in the extraordinary record, the following telegrams to McLean:

JANUARY 12.

Prescott is away. Advise Stemp with whom I shall confer. Acknowledge.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

FEBRUARY 12.

Thank you for your message. You have always been most considerate. Mrs. Coolidge joins me in kindest regards to you and Mrs. McLean.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

Respecting the first message, it was explained at the White House that the President merely wished information concerning the District commissionership, and addressed McLean in the absence of Prescott, the Republican city chairman. But it was not explained why he had sought the advice of McLean just 24 hours after that person had admitted making a false statement intended to cover up Fall's corruption. The White House first described the message of February 12 as an acknowledgment of McLean's congratulations on the President's Lincoln day speech; but later it stated that the reference was to the President's rebuke to the Senate for demanding the dismissal of Secretary Denby.

This newspaper is wholly disinclined to give a strained interpretation to the series of telegrams from which it has quoted. It discovers in them no appalling evidences of official depravity; but it does perceive in them depressing signs of official tolerance for, and association with, influences that have dishonored and wronged the Nation. No one can read McLean's testimony and attribute to a man of his limited intelligence any part in a dangerous conspiracy. But the episode is important because despite all its crass absurdities, it reveals the low standards of conduct that have come to prevail in Washington.

We find McLean, intimate friend of Fall, helping to concoct false testimony to deceive the Senate and the public. We find him, with exposure imminent, leasing a private wire upon the recommendation that it would give him "quick and easy access" to influential persons. We find the Washington end of the wire in charge of the chief White House telegrapher. We find the President's secretary at this time going to Florida as McLean's guest, his departure being announced by a telegram from the White House doorkeeper. We find McLean and his employees using a secret code of the Department of Justice for their private messages. A month after his duplicity had been revealed, we find him receiving, in code, assurance from Attorney General Daugherty that everything will be done to protect him. We find him receiving warning information from Rochester, Daugherty's confidential clerk, and from Burns, Daugherty's chief investigator. After he had confessed to the committee his service to the corruptionist, Fall, we find President Coolidge consulting him on public affairs. And a month later we find the President gratefully acknowledging McLean's approval of the policy of defying public sentiment and keeping in office the Secretary of the Navy who had been Fall's accomplice in leasing the Navy's oil reserves.

The committee has found the telegraphic code used in this subsidiary episode of the Washington scandal. What it has yet to discover is observance of reassuring codes of official honor and official propriety.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I also submit an editorial from the New Republic, under date of March 19, 1924, headed "The week," and another editorial appearing in the same journal entitled "President Coolidge and Edward McLean," and ask that they, too, be inserted in the Record without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

THE WEEK.

Rarely have we read in a daily newspaper a more disingenuous and misleading article than the dispatch from Washington which the New York Times of March 10 carried on the last column of its first page. This article is supposed to give an account of the attitude of "public sentiment" toward "the prevailing tendency to tear down honorable reputations." According to this account "visitors to the Capitol testify that the people back home are disgusted with the conditions of affairs here as disclosed by the evidence before the Teapot Dome committee and the mass of unofficial accusations and rumor that has accompanied these revelations. They feel, it is said, that official Washington is not merely impregnated with corruption but saturated with it. They have little respect for public men generally, classing them all as selfish and corrupt politicians. They have lost confidence in the integrity of Congress and have a low opinion of the intelligence of the people's representatives in Senate and House," but particularly in the Senate. "At the same time, this lack of confidence does not apply to President Coolidge." Although "the titular chief of a party of some of whose leaders the people are suspicious," the President is generally considered to be "the bulwark of the interests of the people." The politicians who attack him for his relationship with McLean inspire only "resentment," and this resentment increases "the lack of confidence in the Senate."

The article from which the foregoing extracts are borrowed is a perfect example of the tendentious and misleading treatment of the news which is becoming the great fault of contemporary American journalism. While pretending to give an account of how public opinion feels toward the Washington exposures, and while pretending to deplore the disposition to tear down honorable reputations, it is really pro-Coolidge propaganda disguised as news, and it really seeks to increase and to turn against the senatorial investigators the suspicious and credulous state of mind which it deplores in the case of other "honorable reputations." The purpose of this propaganda is only too clear. It is intended to discredit those Senators who are conducting the investigation. Its authors apparently expect that by making people suspicious of Senator WALSH and his associates the President will be relieved from the criticism and the suspicions caused by his own acts.

The friends of the President are, in our opinion, doing him a doubtful service when they disparage the actions of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate as part of an effort to promote the Coolidge candidacy. Such propaganda is almost a confession that the Walsh investigation is disquieting, repellant, and probably injurious to the administration. But that is not the point. If the Times really believes that official life in Washington under a Republican administration is "saturated" with corruption and that from this state of facts it can derive a valid argument in favor of a continuation of a Republican President in power and against the investigators of official Republican corruption, there is no reason, except a respect for its own reputation for common sense, why it should not say as much in its editorial columns. But there is every reason why as an honest newspaper, it should not impute this pernicious nonsense to "public sentiment."

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE AND EDWARD McLEAN.

Recently Senator HARRISON of Mississippi criticized President Coolidge for continuing to consult and correspond intimately with a man like Edward McLean after the latter was more than suspected of having deliberately deceived a committee of the Senate about facts of great public importance. Later, during the same session, Senator LODGE accused Mr. HARRISON of gross impropriety for his criticism of Mr. Coolidge's relation to Mr. McLean. "I think," he said, "it is little short of an outrage to bring the President's name into this matter as some have attempted to do to-day." "He is entitled to consideration in debate. It is important not to impair the faith of the people in high officials. Such a procedure lowers the character of the Senate in the opinion of the people." "The President should be lifted above rumor and the whisper of the corridor."

Many of the Democratic Senators replied to Mr. LODGE, but for the most part they confined themselves to insisting that President Coolidge was receiving a much fairer treatment at the hands of his political opponents than had the late Mr. Wilson. The retort was obvious and apt, but it ignored the merits of Mr. LODGE's contention. Is it an "outrage" to criticize a President for behaving as the record indicates Mr. Coolidge has behaved with respect to Mr. McLean?

Surely the sound answer to this question is a sharp and emphatic negative. On the contrary, if the Democrats in and out of the Senate had not criticized the President for the dubious aspects of the relation between McLean and the White House, and for the President's apparent lack of candor in explaining what the relationship was, they would have conspired with the Republicans to conceal from the American public information which it was entitled to possess. Criticism of even the highest public officers is justified in so far as it sheds some additional light upon the acts of Government which the public is not likely to understand without interpretation.

Considered from this point of view, the "attacks" of the Democratic Senators, with the exception of Senator HEPBURN, have served a clear and a desirable public service. They have directed public attention to the dubious aspects of Mr. Coolidge's behavior. The chairman of the Republican National Committee and its official organ of publicity have exhibited far more partisanship, intemperance, and recklessness in denouncing Senator WALSH and Senator WHEELER than the Democrats have in criticizing President Coolidge.

The President's behavior, since the evidence of fraud in the oil leases was first produced, has not been above suspicion or above criticism. No fair-minded person suspects him, of course, of being directly implicated in the fraudulent transactions. No fair-minded person suspects him of a share in any conspiracy to conceal from the Senate Public Lands Committee information about the frauds which would contribute to the exposure and the conviction of directly guilty individuals. But he can be reasonably suspected of a relationship with at least one of the guilty individuals which was, under the circumstances, improper. Nor is this all. Since the evidence of that relationship came to the surface he has done nothing or said nothing to clear up its more suspicious aspects. He is not behaving like a man who is anxious to reveal all the facts of the connection between Edward McLean and the White House. He is rather behaving as if there was something about that connection which it was advantageous for him to conceal.

Consider what the evidence of this connection is. Just about the time when the Senate investigation into the oil leases was getting warm and dangerous, the President's private secretary went to Florida for a vacation, and during that vacation passed two weeks in daily conversation and consultation with Messrs. Fall and McLean. The account which Mr. Slomp gave of these meetings was not, to say the least, entirely convincing. According to his testimony, Messrs. Fall, McLean, and himself were merely a small group of intimate friends who were forgetting for a few days their share of responsibility for the Government of the Nation in the sunshine of a winter resort in Florida. Mr. Slomp did, indeed, incidentally advise his friend McLean to make a clean breast to the Senate committee of the real facts about his relations with Fall, for Mr. Slomp apparently had some reason to suspect McLean's attempt at deceit.

But it is difficult to believe that Slomp in his own testimony behaved as candidly as he advised McLean to behave. During these weeks of golf and innocent conversation there was at least one occasion on which the President used McLean as a means of communication with his private secretary and when he called in McLean as a political adviser after McLean's exposure as a deliberate conspirator against the successful prosecution of an enterprise of great importance undertaken by another branch of the Government.

In the meantime, and thereafter, McLean was pulling all his wires to prevent the investigation from being pushed any further in his direction and he was assisted in this effort by at least three members of the White House staff—a telegrapher, a door keeper, and a secret-service officer. One of Mr. McLean's representatives expected to accomplish something most advantageous for his chief by opening a wire direct to the White House. Another, Mr. Bennett, had an interview with the "principal," who assures him that there will be no resignations and no rocking of the boat. This man in his testimony before the Senate committee supplied an utterly incredible account of the meaning of this telegram. A few days later, after the President had declared, on the anniversary of Lincoln's birthday, that he considered an accused man innocent until he is proved criminally guilty, Mr. McLean felicitated him on his public-spirited attitude and elicited from the President a cordial and a friendly reply.

There are many facts in this record which demand explanation and which the President does not and apparently will not explain. They indicate the existence in Mr. Coolidge's personal staff of a number of employees who were solicitous to protect a man who had fallen back to lies in order to conceal from the Government of the United States facts of immense public importance. They disclose an intimacy between the offender and the President's private secretary which indicate that the wire into the White House might have reached as far as the President's anteroom. Finally they indicate, on Mr. Coolidge's part, a callousness to McLean's published moral unreliability, which is profoundly disquieting. If the President had shared the general indignation and repulsion which the exposures aroused, he could not have remained on such terms of friendly intimacy with one of the chief culprits.

In view of the undisputed facts of the relation between Mr. McLean and the White House and Mr. Coolidge's refusal to clear up the ambiguous facts, one inference seems forced upon both his friends and opponents. The connection which existed between Mr. McLean and the White House from March 4, 1921, until January, 1924, includes circumstances which, if divulged now, would have political consequences which would be damaging to the President and to the Republican Party. The President is struggling to avoid the disclosure of these facts, and this struggle explains the equivocations, the hesitations, and the furtiveness of his behavior with respect to some aspects of the oil scandals. It explains why he did not act promptly and decisively with respect to Denby and Daugherty. It explains why he has never publicly recognized the existence of any guilt with respect to the oil scandal, except the kind of guilt which, if proved, would bring with it criminal prosecution. It explains why he has never aroused American public opinion by a vivid appeal for a vigorous and exhaustive investigation and the complete exposure of all the facts which explain how and why the fraudulent leases were signed. It explains why Senator WALSH has never received help in his inquiries from any of the intelligence bureaus in the executive departments. The President behaves as if he wished to conceal from the public information which, while it might not help the Government prosecutors in convicting Fall or Doheny, would help the American people to fix responsibility for a gross betrayal of their confidence.

He is receiving powerful backing in his attempt to prevent the American public from learning facts which would be damaging to his own candidacy and his party. The newspapers are singularly reticent. Of course, they print reports of what the witnesses say and they describe the disclosures as "sensational," but they are far from making any sensational use of it. In their editorial comments they rarely analyze the doubtful testimony for the benefit of their readers and point out its discrepancies, its suspicious aspects, and its obvious mystifications. They allow the public to make its own analysis, knowing full well how few readers of a daily paper possess the necessary time, patience, and acumen to distinguish what is probably true from what is probably false in the evidence. The more conservative papers are occupied chiefly in accusing people who take the political aspects of the investigation seriously of "hysteria." They themselves, when they are not afflicted by this "hysteria," set an example to their fellow countrymen not merely of elevated calm but noble indifference. They are too superior to be suspicious. They are too public spirited to be critical. They are too loyal to be inquisitive. In assuming this attitude they do not stand alone. They reflect perfectly the state of mind of those citizens, both Democratic and Republican, who consider Secretary Mellon to be the consummate American statesman and the election of President Coolidge, the man who stands behind Mr. Mellon, as indispensable to the welfare of the Republic.

The plain people of the United States should not have any illusions about the meaning of this attempt to limit the investigation and to confuse the demand for the disclosure of all pertinent information about the origin of the frauds with reckless and obscene scandal mongering. The gentlemen who themselves are so nobly discreet and so patriotically unsuspicious, and who accuse their more inquisitive fellow countrymen of being hysterical, are prompted chiefly by one object. They hope to prevent the revelation to the American voter of the information which he needs in order to reach a sound estimate of the amount of indirect responsibility for the oil scandals which attaches to the Harding administration and its accommodating attitude toward business. They hope to use the office of President as a sanctuary in which to conceal ugly facts which, if divulged, would throw too much light upon the ways and means of a Republican administration. If these people do what they wish, they will injure something far more necessary to the vitality of American Government than the prestige of the presidential office. They will deprive public opinion of confidence in the sources from which its information is supposed to come. They will prevent public opinion from obtaining access to those facts which are necessary to passing a discriminating judgment on the conduct of its public officials. They will, in fact, provoke the hysteria which they pretend to deprecate. A public opinion that is uninformed, misinformed, uneasy, and suspicious is almost certain to act intemperately, hastily, and destructively. It is only a public which has reason to believe that it is not being deceived which can afford to be patient, tolerant, discriminating, and composed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I also send to the desk an article appearing in The Nation under date of March 19, 1924, entitled "President Calvin Coolidge," which I ask may be printed in the Record without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

PRESIDENT CALVIN COOLIDGE.

The President of the United States, holding the highest office in the world, can not escape his share of critical attention. So far as the public has learned, his energies have been directed chiefly to the protection of men in whom the Nation has lost confidence. There is no suspicion that he has made money out of oil; but he has put his trust in a corrupt gang, and instead of protecting the people from them he has sought to protect them from the people. When at last public opinion forced him to name special prosecutors to do the work which his discredited Attorney General could not do he named a succession of corporation lawyers, some of whom held retainers from the oil companies and all of whom were of that type. The Senate rejected some of his appointees; in those whom it has confirmed the public has little faith. They may be honest men; that is not enough. They are not men whose names give confidence that they will hew tirelessly to the line, let the chips fall where they may. Yet America is not without men—like Frank P. Walsh, Gilbert E. Roe, Samuel Untermyer, Morris Hillquit, Francis Heney, Clarence Darrow—whose names would give such confidence.

Unless the Republican Party is desirous of committing suicide it will not renominate Calvin Coolidge. It did not nominate President Arthur at the conclusion of his accidental service as President; it never occurred to it that no one but Mr. Arthur could uphold the standard of the party in the campaign of 1884. To maintain, as so many do, that Mr. Coolidge must be nominated merely because he is the incumbent is preposterous. The favorable votes of party conventions in Minnesota and Iowa mean little. When the national convention is at hand the Republicans will hardly court deliberate defeat by selecting this man whose whole record shows that he is grossly inadequate to the tasks to which he has fallen heir, who has failed utterly to rise to the need of the hour, and at this writing stands convicted by his own telegrams of being a cordial friend of the group which is responsible for the existing shame of the Republic. We do not mean to insinuate that he has conspired deliberately at wrongdoing. But there is no escaping the fact that he has shown the grossest misunderstanding of the gravity of the situation. A man able and willing to continue to associate on friendly terms with Mr. McLean after his confession that he had deceived the Senators investigating the oil transaction is obviously unfitted for the office of President. Mr. Lodge would have served Mr. Coolidge, their party, and the country better if instead of defending the President he had frankly stated it as his opinion that Mr. Coolidge would do well to retire from the Presidency.

A campaign is under way to whitewash Mr. Coolidge. He has been hysterically and unjustly attacked, we are told; the abuse of him in the Senate and in the press is unfair and unwarranted. Let us, therefore, set down without color the facts concerning him which have appeared in the record. They have been scattered and need assembling.

The President had appointed as his secretary an ex-Representative, a merchant of postmasterships, who had sold appointments for contributions to the party treasury. Just as the oil inquiry began to reach the front pages, on December 22, this secretary left Washington for Palm Beach, Fla., where he lunched, dined, and golfed with Mr. McLean, publisher of the Washington Post, with whom Mr. Fall was taking his meals. McLean had deceived the Senate committee investigating the oil scandals, leading them to believe that he had lent Mr. Fall $100,000 with which to buy a ranch—the $100,000 which, as was later learned, had really been "lent," in a satchel, by Mr. Doheny. The White House doorman notified Mr. McLean by telegram that Mr. Slomp was leaving. So did John Major, Mr. McLean's confidential assistant, who simultaneously suggested the installation of a private leased wire, which, he said, would give McLean "easy and quick access to the White House." Mr. Slomp later took the stand and told the Senate committee that he had gone South for rest and recreation and had hardly mentioned oil to Mr. McLean or to Mr. Fall.

The private wire was installed on January 3, and the White House telegrapher was put in charge of it. Messages sent on this private wire of Mr. McLean's by Mr. Coolidge's telegrapher were sent in a Department of Justice code—not an "obsolete code," but one still in use, as Mr. Burns testified, though replaced in extremely confidential matters by a newer code. Over this wire went the message on January 29 informing Mr. McLean that the "principal" had said there would be "no rocking of the boat and no resignations." This was just two days after Mr. Coolidge's midnight statement announcing that he would appoint special counsel to prosecute. Over this private wire had gone advance notice of Senator WALSH's departure to examine Mr. McLean in Palm Beach. The day after Senator WALSH led Mr. McLean, under oath, to admit that he had deceived the committee in Washington President Coolidge telegraphed McLean from the White House: "Prescott is away. Advise Slomp with whom I shall confer. Acknowledge." This, he now explains, referred to local politics in the District of Columbia; the significant point in any case is that, as Senator LODGE stated in his official explanation, the President did not know how to reach his own secretary except through McLean. He knew at least that Slomp would be in constant touch with him. A month later President Coolidge still retained his regard for McLean. It was on February 12 that he wired: "Thank you for your message. You have always been most considerate. Mrs. Coolidge joins me in kindest regards to you and Mrs. McLean." When this telegram was published on March 6 the White House hastily explained that it was a reply to congratulations upon the President's Lincoln's birthday speech. Study revealed that it had been sent at 10.17 a. m.—11 or 12 hours before the speech. The White House then explained that further examination of the files revealed that it was a reply—a very prompt reply—to congratulations on the President's statement, made on the previous evening, in reply to the Senate's demand that Mr. Denby be ousted.

That is the record. It convicts the President of no crime. It does show him maintaining, secretly and persistently, intimate relations with a corrupt group. Messrs. Fall and McLean were constantly conferring on ways of hiding their corrupt tracks, and this was known to the country and to Mr. Coolidge when his secretary went to Palm Beach, as when the President consulted McLean upon politics in the District of Columbia, lent him his confidential telegrapher, and sent him cordial telegrams.

The President could have given us at least one ringing declaration of his sense of outrage, both that he should find himself in so humiliating a position and that the country should be subjected to this unutterable disgrace. He could have put every department at the service of the committee instead of letting them stand aloof. He could have said to the American people, "I see that in my faith in my associates of Mr. Harding's Cabinet I have been deceived. I shall leave no stone unturned to set my own house in order without a moment's delay. I shall not only punish the guilty; I shall make a clean sweep. Above all, I shall disassociate myself absolutely from all who have been tarnished by the disclosures."

What did the President do? Nothing of the kind. His promises of punishing wrongdoers have been as perfunctory as it was possible to make them. He accepted the kind congratulations of Mr. McLean upon his refusal to demand the resignation of Mr. Denby in response to the request of Congress. It is no wonder that Senator HEFLIN asks:

"Who is McLean? Is he the head of the Republican Party now, its chief spokesman?"

Well, the best that Mr. LODGE could do was to say:

"I am not discussing Mr. McLean's character, but he was known to the President and it was a very natural way of reaching Mr. Slomp if he were still in Florida."

To us it seems the most unnatural way possible. He should have used the Secret Service, the telegraph companies, and all the Federal officeholders in Florida, if necessary, to locate Mr. Slomp before applying to McLean. From the beginning of this scandal the President has shown himself pitifully small, pitifully inadequate, pitifully lacking in that fine sense of honor which the American people have the right to expect of any man they put in the White House.

Explanations are needed. The fact that a man holds high office is no justification for silence. We know that Senators Smoot and Lusk, members of the investigating committee, have actually used their position to confer with the guilty instead of to expose them. The facts on the record justify suspicion that Mr. Coolidge has slipped into the same policy of protection. In any case he owes the country a full explanation.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when we took a recess yesterday it was with the understanding that we would reconsider again the committee amendment to section 3, and also the amendment to that committee amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], both of which had been agreed to. Before I ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendments were agreed to I had perhaps better explain the reason for it.

It developed yesterday that if we left the language as it was reported from the committee, the House of Representatives, in case the people did not elect, would have the duty of electing a President placed upon them. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment, which was practically approved by the Committee on the Judiciary, provided that in that case, if the House failed to elect, the Vice President elected by the Senate should act as President for the balance of the term. It now develops, and that is where the objection comes in, that that would give the House of Representatives only until the third Monday in January to elect. Personally, I think that is a sufficient time. I am satisfied with the language as we now have it; but other Senators, including the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], think the time too short and have said that we ought to give the House of Representatives a little more time.

It is the intention, if the reconsideration takes place, that the Senator from Colorado will withdraw his amendment to the committee amendment and offer another one, upon which we have agreed, and which in effect would extend the time given to the House of Representatives until noon on the 4th of March to elect a President, leaving it the same in that respect as it is now—that in the meantime the Vice President shall be only the acting President; and if the Senate does not elect by the 4th of March, then the Vice President shall become President for the remainder of the term.

I now ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment of the committee was agreed to and the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to and the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment was agreed to shall be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. I have submitted the proposed amendment to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], and also to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and it is satisfactory to them.

Mr. ADAMS. I assume that I should ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. It will not be necessary to ask unanimous consent to do that. The Senator has a right to withdraw his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to withdraw the amendment which I yesterday offered and the vote upon which has just been reconsidered, and to offer in lieu thereof the following amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado withdraws the amendment to the amendment previously offered and now offers the amendment which he is about to state.

Mr. ADAMS. My amendment to the committee amendment is, on page 2, line 23, after the word "President," to insert the following:

But if the House of Representatives has not chosen a President before noon on the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall become President during the remainder of the term.

An explanation should be made at this time. It appears that there have been two prints of the Norris amendment, and they do not conform in the lines of the print, although they are apparently identical in words. My amendment refers to the print as it appears in our calendar volume, and not to the one which has been distributed on the desks of Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire which print the Secretary is using at the desk, so that we may not have the amendment go in at the wrong place.

Mr. ADAMS. The print at the desk may be identified by the fact that the one to which I am referring has a page 3. The other one has no page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks at the desk are using the print with the third page.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes it right, then, as the Senator from Colorado has offered it.

Mr. WILLIS. I suggest that the Secretary read the amendment as it would read if the amendment of the Senator from Colorado were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 23, after the word "President," insert the following—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Colorado sure there is nothing to be stricken out at that point?

Mr. ADAMS. There is nothing to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. The Secretary will read.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 23, after the word "President," insert:

But if the House of Representatives has not chosen a President before noon on the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall become President during the remainder of the term.

Mr. ADAMS. Perhaps a word of explanation may clear up the situation. There were two points involved. The one which the amendment originally offered by me sought to reach was the fact that under the contingency therein provided for the Vice President, having taken the office of President, would be during the whole remainder of the four years absolutely subject to control of the House of Representatives and could be removed by the exercise of the power then still remaining in the House to elect a President. That was sought to be eliminated.

Then the second objection was that too short a time remained within which the House of Representatives could exercise its right. The amendment as it is now offered provides that on the third Monday in January, the new time fixed by the amendment if it goes into effect, the Vice President shall go in as President pro tempore, as it were, until the 4th of March; that if prior to the 4th of March the House shall fail to elect a President, then the Vice President, who prior to that time has been serving as President pro tempore, becomes President in fact, and that the time within which the House may exercise its power to select a President expires on the 4th of March rather than on the third Monday in January, as it stood under the amendment as originally presented.

Mr. DILL. Is it the new Vice President or the old Vice President who shall become President?

Mr. ADAMS. The new Vice President. It refers to the Vice President chosen for the same term.

Mr. DILL. But if the Senate fails to elect a Vice President, what then?

Mr. NORRIS. That is provided for further on.

Mr. ADAMS. If I may add to the explanation, the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska covers two things. It removes the ambiguity which has heretofore existed in the amendment as to whether it was the Vice President of the old term or the new term. That is removed by his amendment. Then it covers the other feature by giving power to the House to provide who shall succeed in the event the House of Representatives and the Senate have failed to elect.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me read the section as it will be if the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado shall be agreed to. I may say, first, that the only thing that is changed is to give the House of Representatives until the 4th of March in which to elect a President. It gives that much more time. It provides the same time that the House has now. The amendment will then read:

SEC. 3. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President chosen for the same term shall act as President until the House of Representatives chooses a President; but if the House of Representatives has not chosen a President before noon on the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall become President during the remainder of the term, and the Congress shall by law provide that in the event the Vice President has not been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is not the complete joint resolution as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is only the complete section 3. I read the section as it will read if the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is agreed to. We have been considering this subject so long that I would like to have the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee agreed to, unless some one is opposed to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the adoption of the amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. Suppose nothing is done by the 4th of March. The Vice President is to serve as President until the 4th of March, but what happens then?

Mr. NORRIS. The Vice President acts as President immediately upon the beginning of the term, but the House of Representatives is given not only to the beginning of the term but to the 4th of March following to elect a President. If they do not elect a President in that time then their part in the transaction will expire and the Vice President becomes the President just as he would now. It involves no change from the present condition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether or not this joint resolution proposes to legislate the Vice President into a term coextensive with the original term, to wit, four years, although his seat may be challenged or the count of the vote for Vice President, as well as for the President, may be in doubt, the result of which might be that the Vice President who is inducted into office would be found not to be the one who under the revised count was entitled to the seat?

Mr. NORRIS. The Vice President who comes in under these conditions, I will say to the Senator, is elected by the Senate. I hope Senators will get the idea. A presidential election is held; the people fail to elect a President and Vice President; the election of President is thereby thrown into the House of Representatives and the election of Vice President is thrown into the Senate. The terms of the new President and Vice President commence on the third Monday in January. The House of Representatives starts in to elect a President by the third Monday in January. Suppose they do not do it. While they are electing the President the Senate is to elect a Vice President, and it will elect a Vice President, of course, unless there should be a tie, because under the existing Constitution it chooses from the two highest on the list. Suppose the House of Representatives does not elect by the third Monday in January, then the Vice President elected by the Senate would be the President. I do not see how there could be any conflict of opinion as to that. He would have been elected by the Senate, there having been no election by the people. If the people elect, all this machinery is not operative. If the House fails to elect by the third Monday in January, then the Vice President elected by the Senate acts as President, and the House can keep on trying to elect a President.

This amendment is proposed in answer to the cry that went up here yesterday that we did not give the House of Representatives time enough in which to elect. They will now have until the 4th of March; the House may keep on working on the election until that date, and the man elected by them becomes President; but if they fail to elect by the 4th of March, their power of election is ended, as it is now under the Constitution, and the Vice President who has been elected by the Senate and who from the third Monday in January until the 4th of March has been acting as President becomes the real President and holds his office for four years, just as he does now. There is absolutely no difference.

But referring to the proposition put by the Senator from Utah, suppose the House should fail to elect and the Senate should fail to elect anybody, under existing conditions there would be no one to be President; there would be no one who would have authority to elect a President.

The other provision in the clause gives to Congress that power; it remedies a condition that if it ever did happen—it is very remote, of course—would be a serious thing, for it provides that Congress shall by law provide who shall act as President. So, if both Houses should fail to elect, the man selected to take the office under the law of Congress will continue to act until the one or the other, a President or Vice President, shall have been elected by Congress.

Mr. KING. Then the machinery which the joint resolution proposes to set up, and which the Senator from Nebraska has just been describing, would have no application to cases where there was a contest between two rival candidates for the Presidency and two rival candidates for the Vice Presidency, and the count was on before the two bodies of Congress, and a controversy arose as to whether or not certain electoral votes in Louisiana or Oregon, as was the case, as the Senator knows, in the past, should be counted for the one or the other?

Mr. NORRIS. This proposition does not change that. The law provides—it is done by statute—that the two Houses shall meet jointly and canvass the votes. This does not change that at all; it will remain just the same as it now is.

Mr. KING. Then it has no application to the procedure which is already provided for the counting of the votes for President and Vice President?

Mr. NORRIS. It has no application whatever, except that when this proposed amendment to the Constitution shall have been adopted it will change the date of the canvassing of the votes, because it will come earlier, the term beginning in January instead of March.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I am not opposing the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], but I desire the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska upon one phase of the matter—

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Ohio is not opposing the amendment, can we not first have it adopted?

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to that, but I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the adoption of the amendment to the committee amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment to the committee amendment is adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to ask the Senator his opinion concerning the practical effect of the language of the last part of section 3 of the amendment, where it reads:

and the Congress may by law provide that in the event the Vice President has not been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, what officer shall then act as President—and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President, or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

Now—

Now I submit this question to the Senator: It is quite unlikely, but suppose there should be a tie-up, by reason of which the House of Representatives could not elect a President and the Senate could not elect a Vice President, ought not the Senator to provide in the amendment some language to this effect: "or until there shall have been a regular election"? Otherwise we would come to an absolute stop.

Mr. NORRIS. The regular election, when it comes, is not interfered with by this amendment. There is a provision in the Constitution that covers that contingency completely. The Senator ought to remember that the particular provision in the Constitution that we attempt to remedy here is one that students of the Constitution have known for years would put the country into a very serious difficulty if the contingency should ever happen. It will be noted that the Constitution provides that upon the death or resignation or removal from office of both the President and the Vice President Congress may by law provide—just as it is provided in the proposal now before the Senate—who shall act as President. Congress has acted under that provision and passed a law which provides that in case of the death, resignation, or removal from office of both the President and the Vice President the Secretary of State shall act as President, and, in case of his death, the succession shall go on down through the Cabinet. That has no application to a case where there has been a failure to elect, in which Congress would not have the power to say who should be the President unless they arbitrarily assumed the power. The language at the close of section 3 follows the language of the Constitution. Some Senators have criticized that language, but it follows the language of the Constitution as applicable to the other case, and provides in a similar way that if there should be a failure of election, if nobody were elected, the Congress would have the right to pass a law saying who should be President. I presume that when this amendment shall be adopted Congress will pass such a law.

Mr. WILLIS. I quite understand the purpose of the language, but it seems to me the Senator leaves a loophole there, for it is not quite clear.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I can not see any difficulty in it. Suppose that the House of Representatives should not elect a President, but that the Senate should elect a Vice President.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, suppose the Senate should not elect a Vice President; that is the case I am supposing.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose it should not; then the man whom the law provides shall be the acting President will keep on acting until the House elects or until the term expires and the people elect a new man.

Mr. WILLIS. That is exactly what I wanted to get the Senator to state clearly in his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is not any question but what this man would not hold over perpetually, but when the term is out and a new man is elected that new man goes into office.

Mr. WILLIS. That is what I wanted to make clear and definite.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber at luncheon for a few moments—

Mr. NORRIS. The Senate has agreed to the amendment which I submitted to the Senator this morning.

Mr. McKELLAR. That amendment has been agreed to?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; as I submitted it to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alabama allow the Chair to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to remind the Senator from Nebraska that the committee amendment as amended has not as yet been adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Chair to say that it had been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the amendment to the committee amendment has been adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Chair to say that the committee amendment had also been adopted. If not, I will ask that the committee amendment as amended may be agreed to, if the Senator from Alabama will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for that purpose?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the committee amendment agreed to by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought that the Senator from Nebraska was about to leave the Chamber under a misunderstanding. Is there objection to agreeing to the committee amendment as amended? The Chair hears none, and the committee amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, at this time I wish to comment briefly upon some of the testimony before the special committee which is now investigating the Attorney General and the Department of Justice. Mr. Holdridge, a former special agent in the Department of Justice, in his testimony yesterday disclosed a very ugly situation in connection with the effort to obtain permission from Federal court officials to do things which directly violate the law of the land.

Referring to Mr. Muma, one of the interested parties, he said:

Mr. Muma also permitted a brief look at a statement showing, as he explained, amounts paid in various cities to "fix things" in connection with the working out of the conspiracy.

This is in connection with the prize-fight films.

In another place Mr. Holdridge said:

In addition to finding out just where they would start as to the prosecuting officers in the Federal district—one to each State where the enterprise was to be operated—it was necessary to get a line on the attitude of the Federal judge in each of such jurisdictions; to anticipate and provide for what he might do if the case came before him. (Mr. Muma said that in one jurisdiction the Federal judge stated his hostile position in such emphatic terms that the plan was given up as to that State.)

Mr. President, I want the committee to ask Mr. Holdridge to name that judge. He is entitled to be named and the country is entitled to know who he is. He has a lofty conception of the duties of his office; he guards the honor and integrity of the position which he holds; he shows himself so unmistakably to be the right kind of a Federal judge that I want to know and I want the people of the country to know who he is.

These crooked agents were not seeking to promote justice, to prosecute criminals, but were seeking to "fix" Federal judges and district attorneys, the testimony shows, and to corrupt them, if you please. One of the judges, it appears, who was approached, was so angry and hostile to the disgraceful suggestion that they abandoned the idea of carrying on their criminal work in that State. All praise to that Federal judge; may his tribe increase.

Is it not an awful indictment, Mr. President, that they found just one amongst those approached—that is all the testimony discloses—who spurned their corrupt proposal when they were going around "fixing things" so that they could do with the knowledge and consent of the court that which violated the statutes of the country? They were seeking out those whose business it was to enforce the law, those selected to carry out the provisions of the law enacted by Congress; and with shame and humiliation we find that just one was found who placed himself in a hostile attitude to their criminal suggestions, and prevented the consummation of the plan. Mr. President, that judge is entitled to have his name known; and in my place as a Senator I ask the committee to call back that witness and tell him to make known the name of that judge. I want to hold him up as an example to the loose and lax Federal judges whose reprehensible conduct is involved in the testimony here mentioned. I want him to know that there are Senators on this floor who appreciate his conduct. I want him to know that we highly prize his noble and exemplary act when he scorned the miserable wretches who came and wanted to buy from him immunity from prosecution.

Mr. President, whenever crooks can lay their hands on the instrumentalities of justice in this country, and with the fruits of their crime buy immunity from prosecution, something is radically wrong and it is high time to cry out against such a dangerous and deadly condition.

Was the Attorney General prosecuting these people? No. He is a party to it, so the testimony shows. One of the men connected with it, Jess Smith, is dead, some say by his own hand, and some do not know how he died; but he died, and he died in Mr. Daugherty's apartment, I understand.

The people will a long time inquire why Jess Smith was brought here by Mr. Daugherty and put into the service of the Department of Justice—a plain dry-goods clerk, I am told, with no knowledge of the law, and no experience in the work to which he was assigned. I repeat, why was this man brought here by Mr. Daugherty? And oh, how conspicuously he has figured in all the terrible things now being uncovered. He is dead. Some say that he killed himself. Some think that he was murdered. He remembered some of his friends in his will, I understand, and, of course, those who were remembered in his will profited by his death.

Mr. President, I think that it is appropriate for Members of both branches of Congress and the President, too—if it is permissible any more to mention the President's name in this great deliberative body—to pointedly commend the Federal judge who showed himself to be in deed and in truth a clean, honest, and courageous judge, one whose position was not to be corrupted; one whose decrees were not for sale. He is entitled to the commendation of the Congress of the country and the President of the United States.

I sometimes wonder why the President does not speak out in these terrible and trying times. He is at the head of the Government. He ought to be in the lead, directing the forces at work, encouraging them to expose every unfaithful official and punish everyone guilty of wrongdoing. But I have not heard a word from him on this line. I have not heard one word of real interest or encouragement from the President. Now, why is that? That ought not to be, Senators. The President ought to lead in this mighty fight against graft, crookedness, and corruption in the Government. He ought to lead. We ought to follow. But what is the situation here? We have the President of the United States sitting silent, and the Attorney General in the Department of Justice right under his wing defying the President, we are told, and here we are seeking to investigate him, while the President is saying nothing; but he is still retaining him in the Cabinet.

I said before, and I am going to repeat, because it is a vital point in this whole discussion and I want the people to keep it in their minds, those of them who read this Record, how we are handicapped here in the investigation of the case against Mr. Daugherty. He is still at the head of the department. He can order any clerk in that department, any agent, any officer under him, to bring him the file in a certain case, in any case, and lay it on his desk, and he can do what he pleases with the contents of that file. I submit to the Senate and to the country that that ought not to be—a man being tried, and the testimony upon which you rely to convict him in his hands or under his control.

Why does Mr. Daugherty hold on? Is it because he has all of this correspondence and all these files in his control? What else? I said this before, but it is worth repeating, because in this discussion it is a vital fact: As long as he is at the head of that department, with all of these agents under him, appointed by him, as long as he says he is coming out all right, and he defies everybody, and as long as the President acquiesces, as he does by his silence, these agents all say: "Well, if he does come out all right he will fire us if we testify against him"; so they are hampered and hindered, coerced and intimidated.

Senators, that ought not to be in this great Government. We do not do that way with the ordinary man when he violates the law. In most instances we drag him into court and maybe put him into jail, and he has no papers or anything else at his command. He gets a lawyer, and the lawyer goes down and talks to him in his cell or when he is brought up in the courthouse; but here we are with the gravest charges ever brought against a public official pending against the Department of Justice and an investigation is being led ably, bravely, and brilliantly by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I want to commend him for the great service that he is rendering to his country. This is not any political game. It ought not to be. Every Republican here ought to be as earnest and enthusiastic as the Democrats to run down this thing, get at the truth, and expose and condemn those who are guilty of wrongdoing and drive them from the positions that they have dishonored and disgraced.

It is an open secret that the President has wanted Mr. Daugherty to resign. It is whispered around the Capitol that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] were requested to go to see him, and that they mildly broke the news to him that it would please the President and be a very gracious thing in him if he would get out, and we are told that he immediately threw up his bristles and told them that he would not do it. Well, now, I wonder what it is that Daugherty knows, what sort of connections he has that makes him so powerful that the leader of the Senate who called on him, and the President at whose instance he called, dare not go any further in their request, or do not—if "dare" is too strong a term to use—do not go any further in the matter of letting him know that he must resign.

What would I do if I were President, and these disclosures had been made, and I had asked the leader of my party in the Senate to go and whisper to this man that I would like to have him relieve me of the embarrassment that his presence produced, and he should defy me and say he would not do it? Why, I would ask for his resignation immediately. Suppose he should say to me, "I will not do it. I know things and I will tell them." I would say, "All right. I accept your challenge. I demand your resignation. I am going to do my duty as I see it and now you are at liberty to go to the country and tell what you please," and out he would go. But here he is running as a Republican delegate out in Ohio for Mr. Coolidge. Yes, he is supporting him, and Mr. Coolidge wants him to resign, we are told in whispers, but Daugherty does not seem to be offended at the President. He is running as a Coolidge delegate.

The President is a very clever gentleman. Sometimes, when a man gets up on a mountain top, his head gets dizzy, and he loses his equilibrium. The perilous and dizzy heights of greatness are trying on some men; and on a tour that I recently made in the State of Georgia I heard this criticism made of the President by intelligent, strong men. They said: "The President seems to be lacking in decision of character. He does not seem to have the positive punch or the knack necessary to decide a thing, and decide it now, and let everybody know that he is a real President, earnestly and outspokenly trying to serve the whole people." They say that he is too wishy-washy; that he hums and haws and hesitates too long; that he likes to move along the lines of least resistance. Well, I must confess that I have been impressed that way myself concerning him, because, Mr. President, there is but one thing to do when you are right up against a terrible situation of this kind, and that is to act. He ought to act. This is not a Republican situation, to be played out for the good of Republican politics. We are fighting here for the good of the American people to-day, and for the good of those who shall come after us. We are fighting for the preservation of American ideals and institutions; and I submit again that the President ought to say to Mr.

Daugherty: "You must get out and if you are acquitted I will reappoint you, but you must get out of that Department of Justice and let all the facts in the files that may be there be open to the committee to get and go through; and then, if you are acquitted, I will reappoint you." Could anything be fairer than that?

Now I am going to repeat what I have said once before about Mr. Daugherty. He ought to go to the President and say: "I will resign if you will reappoint me if I am acquitted. I know that my presence is embarrassing, with all these terrible charges and statements coming out each day; and if you will tell me that you will reappoint me if I am acquitted I will relieve you of the embarrassment that confronts you now."

Why do they not do that? Nobody has yet given a satisfactory answer to that question. The President ought to say: "Mr. Daugherty, this is not a Republican fight. Of course, you are running for election as a delegate to the Republican National Convention, and you are supporting me, but I can not afford to retain you as Attorney General of the United States even with that situation existing. You have in control all the testimony in that department. That is wrong, they say. Your critics are saying you ought to be removed, and that they ought to have the testimony, and that you ought not to be in a position where you can send for it, go through it, and put it in your private drawer if you want to, or do whatever else you want to do with it. You ought not to have that power. That ought not to be your privilege in view of the serious charges that are lodged against you, and which are now being investigated."

Mr. President, I submit that that is the fair way to do this thing; it is the right way to do it; it is the just way to do it.

Suppose a Democratic President were up there, and we had a Democratic Attorney General under fire, and we should let him remain in the office with all the testimony in his control, with all the agents of the Government, many of them who themselves complain about acts of the Attorney General, to be intimidated by him, coerced, made afraid because he is still over them and they do not know what will happen; that he might be retained in the department, and if so, if they should testify against him, he would dismiss them from the service. In that situation, Mr. President, we find the power of the Government itself being used not to get at the truth and punish those guilty of wrongdoing but being used to suppress the truth, intimidate witnesses, and protect the unfaithful officer guilty of wrongdoing.

There is no gainsaying that proposition. If anybody here would like to dispute it, I want him to rise now and say so. I will yield to him for that purpose.

That is about all I wanted to say this morning. I rose primarily to commend that judge who took such a firm stand for the right when these agents of the crooked interests were going around for the sole purpose of putting over something which violated the law, making money out of things which were contrary to the statutes of the land, and in order to do it we are told had to bribe judges and district attorneys. The testimony shows that agents were sent to fix things by seeing judges in advance and saying, "If we do show these things, which are in violation of the statutes, will you impose a fine on us? Now, come across." The judge listens, and some of them, I judge from the testimony, smiled blandly and did not impose any fine, and the thing went through. But, thank God, there was at least one who scorned the suggestion and condemned the criminals who approached him. I want his name printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I want the Senate and the country to know who he is, and I want this judge and those who come after him on the bench to know that here, where the atmosphere is charged and surcharged with the miasma of graft and corruption, that we do appreciate men of his sterling worth and character, men who dare to stand up and rightly possess their souls and remain true to the highest and best traditions of the Federal judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The READING CLERK. At the end of line 11, page 2, the Senator from Ohio proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no session of the Congress shall continue longer than six months from the date on which it convenes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, this amendment speaks for itself. I am led to offer it because of the experience of the legislatures of the States of the Union. I find that there are 30 States of the Union which provide in their constitutions for a limitation of the time of the legislative session. In the State of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] there is provided a limitation of 60 days. In the State of Alabama the limit of the session is 50 days. In the State of West Virginia the limitation provided is 45 days, and so on. In all of those 30 States there are limitations running from 40 to 60 days.

In five of the States, namely, Virginia, Texas, Minnesota, Maryland, and Colorado, the time fixed for the length of the session is 90 days. There are only 18 States in the Union which do not have such limitations.

It has been my observation, in the study of legislative bodies, that if a time is fixed at which the legislative body must adjourn, there is more expedition in the conduct of the public business. Take this body, for example, or the body at the other end of the Capitol. As we approach the end of a session it will be noted always that there is very much greater expedition in the conduct of the public business.

It is my belief that if we provided in the Constitution a fixed time for the adjournment of the sessions of Congress, business would be more rapidly carried on, and the work which the Congress is expected to do would be better done. I think the best indication of that, though not proof, of course, is the fact that 30 States of the Union have such a provision in their constitution, and that those provisions are working well in the affairs of the States. It seems to me it would be wise to insert such a provision in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FESS. I had not thought of the subject of the amendment until I heard it read. The legislation in the short term of Congress is always completed by the 4th of March, unless through some inadvertence or because of some organized effort to prevent it. I recall that last year, with the largest appropriations ever entailed, except in the midst of the war, all the appropriation bills came over from the other branch of the Congress early, and before the 4th of March every one had gone through both Houses, through conference, and had become a law.

Mr. WILLIS. And will not my colleague state there just what the situation is now with reference to the appropriation bills?

Mr. FESS. We have now arrived at the 18th of March, 14 days after the 4th of March. Two appropriation bills have passed both Houses, but are not through conference. All the balance are yet to be acted upon, and only one other appropriation bill—the deficiency bill—has come to the Senate from the House. So it appears to me that that is a concrete commentary upon the value of a limitation on the length of the sessions of Congress. It gives the assurance that if we had the term fixed there would be accomplished all that was necessary to be accomplished, and a good deal that is usually done which ought to be left undone would not be done.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank my colleague for his very pertinent and proper suggestion. There is no doubt but that if we had a constitutional limitation the thing my colleague has described would take place. Somehow we would find ways to push forward the public business very much more rapidly than it is now transacted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. While it is true that in the short term of three months we frequently push the appropriation bills through, somehow, some way, as the Senator has said, there is rarely any other legislation put through except appropriation bills at the short sessions, and even the appropriation bills are usually put through just as the Senator has described, somehow, some way—pushed through. I do not believe that is a very excellent way of legislating. I think Congress should have all proper time in which to legislate.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, as the Senator knows from his long experience here and in another body, it does not make very much difference, so far as that is concerned, what the length of the session is, there will always be a congestion of public business at the close of the session. But I think the conclusion which should be drawn from the suggestion made by my colleague is absolutely incapable. In a short session we do get the essential work of the Congress done. Everybody realizes that the Congress must expire by constitutional limitation at a certain time.

If we had a constitutional provision which provided that at the end of six months from the time the Congress convenes

Congress must adjourn, of course always reserving the right in the Executive to call a special session if there were any emergency which demanded it, I think there can be no doubt but that we would get the essential business transacted more quickly and that a tremendous amount of nonessential material would be shut out, which would be a blessing to the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIS. I further yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Senator says reminds me of what I was reading in the Madison papers just a few nights ago. It was seriously argued in the Constitutional Convention that Congress should meet only every other year, the reason given being that there would not be business enough for a session oftener than that; that the limitations on the powers of Congress excluded a very large volume of legislation, and left the greater power of legislating to the States, and that it was not necessary to have a session oftener than once every two years. That was not only seriously proposed, but seriously debated. Now, it turns out that, legislating all the year, we are hardly able to get through with the Nation's legislative business. So it seems to me that the fixing of a limitation of time now for what might occur in the future would probably be an error, and we should leave it to the good sense of Congress to determine how long its sessions should last.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will permit, let me make brief reply to the Senator from Tennessee. First, the logic which he has so well stated evidently is not persuasive in his own State, at least, because in the great State of Tennessee there is a limitation on the length of the legislative session of 75 days.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator let me correct that statement? There is a limitation only to this extent, that the members of the legislature are paid their per diem only for 75 days.

Mr. WILLIS. I venture to say that that operates to shorten the session.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have a right to legislate as long as they see fit.

Mr. WILLIS. I venture the assertion that the session does not continue very long after the pay stops.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have an idea, although I can not state it as a fact except in one or two instances with which I happen to be acquainted, that the Senator from Ohio will find that the limitations in the other States are practically the same as in Tennessee; that the salary is fixed at so much per diem, but that there is no limitation upon the length of time the session shall continue.

I believe he will find, if he looks into it, that the sessions of the legislatures always run over a few days, at least, sometimes a few weeks, because it is a physical impossibility to fix a definite time in advance for the length of the session of any legislative body, and provide that when that minute comes they must adjourn, without seriously handicapping the legislature, without giving a few men the power to filibuster, and without getting all kinds of jokers into legislation, because, with the permanent adjournment just ahead, some individuals can hold up the session and get anything they want, or defeat anything they want to defeat.

So it always happens, when we adjourn what is called the long session, which is not limited, that we never agree on the date of adjournment until the very day we adjourn, because we know that the very minute we do fix a specific time for adjournment, we make it possible for one man, almost, to hold up the whole Congress; and that is what would happen if the Senator's amendment were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the obvious answer to that is, of course, that whenever you do fix the time for final adjournment, Senators know rather definitely within a few days of when final adjournment is to occur, and whenever you do adjourn, if you do, you run up against exactly the same difficulty. This amendment will not change that in any particular at all.

Referring to the limitations in the States, it is quite possible, as the Senator suggests, that the limitations are brought about indirectly by a cessation of salary at the end of 40 or 60 days, or whatever the time may be. Yet I venture the assertion that that limitation itself does operate very materially to expedite the public business, and to shut out a lot of inconsequential and unimportant legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I promised to yield to the Senator from Utah, and I will do so now, if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is scarcely pertinent now, but my able friend from Tennessee challenged attention to the Madison papers, and the fact that it was seriously debated as to whether or not there would be sufficient business to justify Congress in meeting as often as once a year, the theory being that under our form of government the States would have the major responsibility in legislating, which is true.

Now, if the Democrats in Congress would remain true to the views of Madison, and the Republicans on the other side of the Chamber, who believe in a proper construction of the Constitution, would likewise carry out the views of Jefferson and Madison, then what my friend from Tennessee said would be realized to-day. But, unfortunately, we project into Congress activities of the States, duties and responsibilities which should be performed by individuals and by local organizations, and thereby we consume the time of the Federal Congress in debating and discussing domestic matters, questions that come within the police powers of the States, and we enact legislation which under a proper construction of the Constitution is unconstitutional.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the Senator therefore think that it would be exceedingly desirable to have a constitutional limitation upon the length of the sessions, so as to shut out very much of the undesirable legislation to which he refers? As he knows, I agree with him about some of those matters at least.

Mr. KING. I confess my inclination would be to vote against the position taken by my amiable and distinguished friend from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I should regret that very much.

Mr. KING. I think there is very much in what my friend from Nebraska has stated. It is certain that if Congress should address itself earnestly to legislation upon national questions, matters that come within the purview of Congress exclusively, we could conclude our labors in very much less time than we bestow now upon the activities of Congress.

Mr. WILLIS. I invite the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that in some way in his own State there is a constitutional limitation upon the legislature. The State of Utah limits the legislative session to 60 days. It seems to work very well there.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for the purpose of submitting a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that no Senator be allowed to talk more than once nor longer than five minutes upon the pending amendment.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will not press that request.

Mr. NORRIS. It will not limit general debate.

Mr. KING. It applies only to the pending amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is confined to that.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment to make a brief statement?

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will make it very brief, I yield; because I only have about four minutes of my time remaining under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator all my time under the agreement. I will say that so far as the limitation on the legislative session in the State of Tennessee is concerned, it would be a limitation on the salaries. The salaries are not paid for longer than 75 days; but the result of the situation is that the governor frequently has to call special sessions of the legislature to transact the legislative business of the State, and every time he calls an extra session my recollection is that the salaries paid and the allowances made for a 30-day extra session amount to a very large sum, which could be wholly obviated if it were not for that limitation.

Mr. WILLIS. I merely desire to make one suggestion or observation in reply to that. My little experience with governors and with Presidents leads me to believe that they are not likely to call extra sessions unless there is some great emergency.

Now, back of the suggestion that I am making here is the belief, which is very sincere upon my part, that the country is suffering, not from too little legislation but from too much legislation. I saw not long since in a law journal, which unfortunately I am unable to find and the figures of which I can not now quote, a statement of the number of different statutes that were enacted by the several State legislatures and the Congress in the course of a year. It was perfectly appalling. It is a wonder to me that the people of the country are able to live and transact their business. I believe that if we would place a constitutional limitation on the length of the sessions of Congress we would get the essential work done and a great deal of the unimportant legislation would be cut out. I have no desire to continue unduly the discussion. I am willing to let the amendment stand or fall upon its merits.

There has just been placed before me a copy of our calendar. Something was said about the present situation of business in the Congress. This brings to my notice that up to date, this being the 18th of March, no appropriation bill has been finally passed. Two of them have been sent to conference. I saw in his place a moment ago the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], and I judge that he was ready to make a conference report on some appropriation bill or a motion relative to it. If it had been the short session of Congress instead of the long session, not two but every one of the appropriation bills would have been passed by this time, and I dare say as much legislation along other lines as will be passed at the present session, which bids fair to run a good while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in 1914 Senator John F. Shafroth, of Colorado, offered a resolution, practically the same as the one now proposed, and after it was considered for some time by the Committee on the Judiciary an adverse report was made, but there were a number of Senators who were then of the opinion that there should be an amendment to the Constitution along these lines in order that after a general election there should be a speedier response to the will of the people as expressed in that election. This was a view that I had at that time and I am still of that opinion.

Mr. President, although the resolution of Senator Shafroth was disapproved by the Committee on the Judiciary, the views of the minority were presented at that time in a report which was signed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], former Senator Chilton, of West Virginia, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the former Senator Nelson, of Minnesota, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and myself. Those Senators were of the opinion that there was merit in the resolution and favored its adoption. The joint resolution then proposed and approved by the Senators mentioned was in these words:

The terms of the President and Vice President of the United States shall commence on the fourth Monday in January following the election of presidential and vice presidential electors.

SEC. 2. The presidential and vice presidential electors, composing the Electoral College, shall assemble in the States by which they are appointed and cast their votes for President and Vice President on the second Monday in December following their appointment, and the vote so cast, duly certified, shall be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January next thereafter, and the Congress shall meet in joint session on the second Monday in January following and open and count the same: Provided, That Congress may alter all the dates fixed in this section, in its discretion.

SEC. 3. The terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 4. There shall be held two regular sessions of Congress, convening on the first Monday of January each year.

SEC. 5. The terms of said officers who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment are hereby changed to conform herewith.

Mr. President, the Constitution, Article II, section 1, ordains that the President and Vice President shall hold office for the term of four years, but does not provide when the terms shall commence. The only recognition of the 4th of March succeeding the day of a presidential election as the day of the commencement of the terms of the President and Vice President is the provision in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, effective September 25, 1804, that—

If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

This would probably be construed to be a provision that the term of the President expired on the 4th of March after a presidential election—that a vacancy then exists—in which event the then Vice President succeeded to the office.

The time when the presidential electors should be elected, and the date on which they shall meet and give their vote is, by Article II, section 1, of the Constitution, left to the discretion of Congress, with the restriction that the day of voting shall be the same throughout the United States. An act was passed February 3, 1887, requiring them to meet and give their vote on the second Monday in January next after their appointment, in such place in each State as the legislature thereof shall direct; which vote, duly certified, to be delivered to the President of the Senate before the first Wednesday in February and be canvassed by Congress, in joint session, on the second Wednesday in February thereafter.

The Constitution, while providing that Representatives shall hold their offices for two years (Art. I, sec. 2) and Senators for six years (Art. I, sec. 3), does not provide when the terms shall commence.

The commencement of the terms of the first President and Vice President and of the Senators and Representatives composing the First Congress was fixed by a resolution of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, providing "that the first Wednesday in March next (which happened to be the 4th day of March) be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution."

Congress provided (act of March 1, 1792, Rev. Stat., sec. 152) that the terms of the President and Vice President shall commence on the 4th day of March next succeeding the day on which the votes of the electors have been given, but there seems to be no statute enacted since the adoption of the Constitution fixing the commencement of the terms of Senators and Representatives.

The Constitution as proposed to be amended by this resolution would be as follows:

1. The terms of the President and Vice President, by the first section, are made to commence on the third Monday in January instead of the 4th day of March succeeding the election of electors.

2. The electors are required, by the second section, to meet and cast their vote on the second Monday in December succeeding their appointment; the vote to be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January thereafter, and the Congress to meet in joint session to open and count the same on the second Monday in January succeeding. The Congress, however, in its discretion, is authorized to change these dates.

The provisions of this section are entirely new, the present Constitution having left these matters entirely to the discretion of Congress, and are for the purpose of preventing confusion in putting the first section into effect.

3. The terms of Senators and Representatives are, by the third section, made to commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

This provision is new. Although there is no provision in the present Constitution fixing when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence, yet those providing that their terms shall be six and two years entitle those in office and hereafter to be elected to hold for two years after the 4th of March succeeding their election, the day when the first Senators and Representatives were qualified under the Constitution, and their terms can not be changed without a constitutional provision.

4. The fourth section merely changes the second paragraph of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution in effect, so as to provide that Congress shall meet each year, commencing on the first Monday of January instead of the first Monday in December.

5. The provisions of section 5 are temporary and for the purpose merely of putting into effect the material provisions by shortening the terms of the President and Vice President, and Senators and Representatives, to the extent of the periods between the dates fixed by the resolution for the commencement of the terms of these officers hereafter and the 4th of March succeeding said dates.

Under the present law Congress does not convene in regular session until 13 months after the election of its Members. There was some reason for such a provision at the time of the formation of our Government, as it then took a long time to ascertain the results of elections and to reach the Capitol from remote parts of the country. But there is no excuse whatever now, since the most distant States of the Union are within a few days' travel of Washington City.

Senators heretofore have been elected by the legislatures of the States in January, and sometimes not until February or March. But since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, by which Senators are to be elected by the people, probably at the November election, it becomes very opportune for Congress to convene in January following. The convening of Congress on the first Monday of December, as at present, is very inopportune, as adjournment for the Christmas holidays is always taken and many Members go to their homes, returning late, which precludes any real work until January.

The reasons for the adoption of the proposed amendment are these:

Congress should at the earliest practicable time enact the principles of the majority of the people, as expressed in the election of each Congress. That is why the Constitution requires the election of a new Congress every two years. If it is not to reflect the sentiment of the people, these frequent elections have no meaning or purpose. Any evasion of this is subversive of the fundamental principle of our Government that the majority shall rule. No other nation in the world has its legislative body convene so long after the expression of the people upon governmental questions.

During the campaign preceding a congressional election the great questions that divide the political parties are thoroughly discussed for the purpose of determining the policy of the Government and of having the sentiments of the majority crystallized into legislation. It seems trifling with the rights of the people when their mandates can not be obeyed within a reasonable time. It is unfair to an administration that the legislation which it thinks so essential to the prosperity of the country should be so long deferred. It is true an extraordinary session may be called early, but such sessions are limited generally to one or two subjects, which of necessity make enormous waste of the time of each House waiting for the other to consider and pass the measures.

As the law is at the present time, the second regular session does not convene until after the election of the succeeding Congress. As an election often changes the political complexion of a Congress, under the present law many times we have the injustice of a Congress that has been disapproved by the people enacting laws for the people opposed to their last expression. Such a condition does violence to the rights of the majority. A Member of the House of Representatives can barely get started in his work until the time arrives for the nominating convention of his district. He has accomplished nothing, and hence has made no record upon which to go before his party or his people. This is an injustice both to the Members and to the people. The record of a Representative should be completed before he asks an indorsement of his course.

Under the present system a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives is seldom ever decided until more than half the term, and in many instances until a period of 22 months of the term has expired. For all that time the occupant of the seat draws the salary, and when his opponent is seated he also draws the salary for the full term; thus the Government pays for the representation from that district twice. But that is not the worst feature of the situation; during all of that time the district is being misrepresented, at least politically, in Congress.

By Congress meeting the first Monday in January succeeding the elections, contested-election cases can be disposed of at least during the first six months of the Congress.

The President and Vice President should enter upon the performance of their duties as soon as the new Congress can count the electoral votes. The newly elected governors of our States are inducted into office as soon as the new legislatures of the States canvass the votes and declare their election. It is the old Congress which now counts the electoral votes. It is dangerous to permit the defeated party to retain control of the machinery by which such important officers are declared elected.

In the event that no candidate for President receives a majority of the electoral votes, the Constitution provides that the House of Representatives shall elect the President, the representation from each State having one vote. At the present time it is the old Congress that elects the President under such contingency, and thereby it becomes possible for a political party repudiated by the people to elect a President who was defeated at the election. Under the present provision of the Constitution, in the event the House fails to choose a President before the 4th of March, then the Vice President then in office becomes President for four years. This affords a great temptation, by mere delay, to defeat the will of the people, and if it is ever exercised it will likely produce a revolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if the principal evil which the Senator has been discussing could not be obviated by enacting a law which would shorten the period between the time of election and the meeting of Congress? The Senator has just stated that the Congress elected in November does not begin to function and the Representatives and Senators elected to that Congress do not assume office for more than a year after the election. Would not that objection be obviated by shortening the time by providing by law that Congress shall meet either on the 15th of March or the 1st of April next following the election? That would shorten to four or five months the time between the election and the assumption of the duties of the newly elected officials. If that were done, it would not need a constitutional amendment, for the reason that under the Constitution Congress has power now "to appoint"—that is the language of the Constitution—a time for the meeting of Congress. All that we need do now is to pass a law to "appoint" the term of Congress to begin, say, the 1st of April next following their election, and on that day they would assume the duties of the office and the old officials would go out. It seems to me that we can accomplish the major part of what so many of the Senators have insisted they desire to have accomplished by changing the time of the meeting of Congress from the present date, the first Monday in December, to the preceding March or April or any other date, of course, after their election?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Utah would very much improve conditions, but the trouble is that if we should do that there would still be too much delay in the newly elected officials coming into power; there would still be too much delay in yielding to the will of the people as expressed in the election in November previously. The object of this proposed amendment to the Constitution is to permit the assumption of the powers of government by the newly elected officials earlier than that now suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me further, may I suggest to him that it does seem to me that if a President goes out of office; that is to say, if he is defeated, or his party is defeated in November, there ought to be a reasonable time—two or three or four months—in the language of the street, to "clean up" all of the activities of the administration for the preceding four years. The intervening time between the election next November, when Mr. Coolidge, for instance, shall be defeated, to the 1st of April, when some able Democrat shall succeed him, would not be too much time for Mr. Coolidge and our Republican friends to "clean up" the multitudinous matters which they might have before them, no matter how faithfully they have sought to perform the duties of their office.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. How about the third party?

Mr. KING. Well, Mr. President, we hear a great deal about third parties, but, unfortunately, third parties are too evanescent; they do not materialize on election day. But if my friend shall organize a third party and have it perform a useful function in the country I shall welcome its advent. May I say to my friend, however, that it seems to me he must admit that three or four months intervening between the going out of one administration and the coming in of another, in which to clean the slate and to turn over to the incoming administration the affairs of the Government, would not defeat the will of the people and would not be improper, in view of the very many things that are necessary to be done in four years, especially four years crowded as the years now are crowded with tremendous activities.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this is a proposition upon which strong arguments can be made in support of both sides. There is, I think, ample time for the outgoing administration to conclude any special matters within its control or which it has in process of consummation before it shall go out of office as provided in this amendment. A stronger argument, I think, has been advanced for delay in the position that in the heat of election the people and the candidates often to some extent lose their heads and have very extreme views and ought to have time to cool and to deliberate upon those views before writing them into law. I think there ought to be some time for that purpose. I think it would be very unfortunate if the new Government should take office immediately after the day of the election. That really seems to me the chief argument against this joint resolution; but, in my opinion, the time allowed by it is ample for sober second thought. It is a middle ground between the present law and the view of some that there should be an immediate change.

The present Constitution and the present method of electing Presidents, Vice Presidents, Senators, and Representatives, and the time when they should go into office and take charge of the Government, has now been in force nearly 140 years. The history of our country does not show that any trouble has resulted from it. There is now no apparent danger to the country from the present law. I have hesitated very much about whether we ought to change the Constitution, whether or not this amendment ought to be adopted. The Senate was very decidedly against it, as I remember, when it was presented in 1914, and when I favored it.

I strongly believe that a government ought to be responsive to the wishes and the will of the people as expressed in a popular election, and that the writing into law of the policies and principles advocated in that election should not be too long delayed. It is for that reason that I have favored a change in our Constitution as well as in our statutes in order to shorten the time in which a new government shall take into its hands the reins and the power.

I am generally opposed to amendments to the Constitution. This country has grown great and powerful under the Government that was erected by the fathers, and while we are doing so well it is safest to let it alone in the main. I have opposed all amendments that changed the fundamental principles of our Government. I am opposed to those measures under which it is now practically proposed to destroy the judiciary of the country. The division of the Government into three coordinate and independent departments is fundamental. That principle is the foundation stone of our Government. The checks and balances created by it are those which prevent tyranny and the usurpation of all power by either the executive or the legislative branch of the Government.

When the power to make laws and to execute laws has been combined into one man or into one body, tyranny has ever followed, as shown by the history of all nations. It is worse where to the power to make laws and to execute laws is added also the power to construe laws and to judge the rights of the people. The Constitution, under Article III, vests the judicial power in the courts. If the power is given to the Congress to override the judgments of the Supreme Court in constitutional questions by reenacting the law, we change that article and vest in the Congress judicial power. I would oppose such an amendment. This is merely one of organization, of administration. It involves no fundamental principle. Our Government will be the same. All the rights of the people will be protected in every respect and I think advanced, and the Government will remain as powerful as it now is to preserve order and peace and govern the country properly.

For those reasons I am willing to support a measure of this kind. I think the joint resolution presented by Senator Shafroth is clearer and requires less interpretation or construction than that now presented, but I have no particular choice between them. The main thing is to hasten the day when the will of the people, as expressed in the general election, shall be carried out. I will support the pending resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President like the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], I am very loath to amend the Federal Constitution. I think it is one of the greatest documents ever devised by the wit of man. It has been amazing to what extent these wise and able statesmen were able to predict the future and prepare for it; but some conditions have arisen which the foresight of man, however wise and however great, could not under all circumstances provide for.

After careful consideration I have reached the conclusion that I shall vote for this constitutional amendment because I believe that in five particulars it improves the existing law. Some of these improvements might be obtained by statute; others could not be; but to my mind this amendment will obtain all of the five advantages the need of which I think is demonstrated by existing conditions.

First, under this amendment, in case of a failure of the electoral college to elect a President, a Congress elected at the same time that the President is a candidate for that high office, will provide for the election of a President. I think that is a matter of vast importance. There is no other office in the world as high as the office of President of the United States. The vast powers incident to that office should be held in response to the wishes of the people expressed in an election. Under existing law, if the Electoral College could not elect a President, the present Congress, elected two years before, would determine who should be President of the United States. An occasion might arise when the will of the people would be nullified; and the method of election should be such that the Congress that was elected at the time the presidential candidates were put in the field should be the Congress that should make the election. This is a great advantage accruing under this amendment.

Another trouble that we have had in legislation in Congress grows out of the short sessions. Usually we have, in common parlance, what is known as a "lame duck," or a great many "lame ducks," voting for legislation after they have been repudiated by their people. This at times has become so glaring and so striking that frequently resolutions have been introduced suggesting a change at that specific time. After a man has been repudiated by his constituents, after his political career has ceased, I think it is not wise that he should be continued in a political position and vote on legislation and important and far-reaching matters.

We have repeatedly seen, in sessions of the House and sessions of the Senate, that that has produced anything but beneficial legislation.

The third advantage which accrues is that we get rid of the short session. I know that would mean great discomfort to many of us who only obtain vacations when we have short sessions, on account of the great work which falls to Congress, but when the sessions of the Congress must expire on the 4th of March, an opportunity is given for filibustering, an opportunity is given for holding up legislation, an opportunity is given to force an extra session, which has been done repeatedly. That results in hasty legislation, in filibustering, and in conditions which are not advantageous to intelligent, fair, and deliberate discussion of matters. I think it would be a great advantage if the short session were abolished. We have generally noted in our experience in Congress that most of the jokers contained in bills, which are afterwards disclosed, get in on account of the haste incident to the short session. I would like to see the short session abolished, though it would result in great discomfort to Senators, who will not have their usual vacations after a short session.

Another advantage which would accrue from the adoption of this amendment would be this, that provision would be made for filling a vacancy in the office of President when the House of Representatives failed to elect, if the election were thrown into the House. Under the existing provision of the Constitution, if the House should fail to elect a President when the Electoral College had failed to elect, there is no provision for filling the vacancy. We would have an interregnum, with no provision for filling the office, and no one can tell what trouble might accrue in the future on account of that condition. This amendment provides a way for taking care of that situation if such a difficulty should arise. I think that is a very important matter. Such a contingency has never arisen, and may never arise, but there should be no possibility of such a thing arising in this country.

The fifth advantage which it seems to me would accrue under this amendment is that there would be a quicker response to the will of the people in legislation than there is under present conditions. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] that we should not have a too speedy assembling of the Congress after the election. I have an idea that those elected should have an opportunity to become more sober, as far as legislating is concerned, than they would be in the heat of a campaign. This amendment would provide for the assembling of Congress a reasonable time after the election, when those elected have not forgotten their promises, and are not in the heat of a campaign, which might make them recklessly discharge their duties as legislators. It seems to me that the time which would intervene under this provision between the election and the assembling of Congress would prevent recklessness in legislation.

After careful consideration, and after hearing the arguments pro and con, I have reached the conclusion that the constitutional amendment proposed would be wise, and should be submitted to the States, because it will remedy existing evils which most of us, both in the Senate and the House, know about, and about which the public has complained for years. While I am very loath to have the Constitution amended, except where there would be a manifest advantage accruing from the amendment, it seems to me in these five particulars there would be a marked advantage accruing from the adoption of this amendment, and I shall support it with a great deal of pleasure.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS (when the name of Mr. JOHNSON of California was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent, and that if he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He is absent, but I am informed that on this question he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. NORBECK's name was called). The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. SHIPSTEAD's name was called). The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ADAMS (when Mr. SPENCER's name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] for the day, but I am advised that if he were present, he would vote "yea" as I have voted. Therefore I allow my vote to stand. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] would have voted "yea" if he had been present.

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. TRAMMELL's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably detained. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. He will be necessarily absent for some days. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] is paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. If the senior Senator from Illinois were present, he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I understand that if present he would vote the same way as I intend to vote, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and that if he were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 7—as follows:

YEAS—63.

Adams	Dill	Jones, N. Mex.	Ralston
Ashurst	Edge	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell
Borah	Edwards	Ladd	Reed, Pa.
Brandagee	Ferris	Lodge	Sheppard
Brookhart	Fess	McKellar	Shields
Bruce	Fletcher	McKinley	Shortridge
Bursum	Frazier	McLean	Simmons
Cameron	George	McNary	Stanfield
Capper	Gerry	Mayfield	Swanson
Caraway	Gooding	Moses	Wadsworth
Colt	Harrell	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Harris	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Harrison	Oddie	Warren
Curtis	Hedin	Pepper	Watson
Dale	Howell	Phipps	Wills
Dial	Johnson, Minn.	Pittman

NAYS—7.

Bayard	Hale	Overman	Stephens
Broussard	King	Reed, Mo.

NOT VOTING—26.

Ball	Johnson, Calif.	Owen	Sterling
Cummins	Kendrick	Robinson	Trammell
Elkins	Keyes	Shipstead	Underwood
Ernst	La Follette	Smith	Weller
Fernald	Lenroot	Smoot	Wheeler
Glass	McCormick	Spencer
Greene	Norbeck	Stanley

So the joint resolution was passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

EXTRACT FROM THE SEARCHLIGHT ON CONGRESS.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in the light of the other articles inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article from The Searchlight on Congress concerning the President's part in the oil investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?
There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Searchlight on Congress, February 29, 1924.]

THE PART THE PRESIDENT IS PLAYING.

(By Lynn Haines.)

The great calamity has come. Monstrous political perversions and gigantic grafts, the deadliest enemies of a Republic, have shaken the very foundations of faith in the public life of the Nation. Its Government stands discredited. Its institutions are in danger.

Such a crisis demands straight thinking and plain speaking.

The major responsibility should be placed where it belongs—upon the President. It was his opportunity, and within his power, to avert the catastrophe of undermined confidence. He could have accomplished this by ousting each and every official who has been guilty of negligence or graft and placing in their positions Cabinet heads of unquestioned, unconquerable, disinterested honesty. It would have stayed the storm of popular suspicion and distrust had there been quick, determined, decisive Executive action to bring about restitutions and punishments.

Instead of a courageous course of independent action, the President has made no single important move on his own initiative. He has not led, but followed reluctantly, less than half-heartedly, in dealing with the wholesale corruption and incompetency in high places.

He knew what was going on. To assume less is to impute an ignorance and indifference to public welfare rendering him wholly unfit for the Presidency.

He presided over the Senate when the Teapot Dome scandal was first discussed. He sat with President Harding's Cabinet throughout the period of that "criminal" consummation. He must have followed the sickening revelations of the WALSH committee. Yet he did nothing until prompted and prodded by Senate resolutions.

The President presided over the Senate during the debate on the scandalous situation in the Shipping Board. He could not have been unmindful of the conditions there that cried aloud to Heaven for renovation.

The President must have known of the tremendous graft and political spoils in the affairs of the Alien Property Custodian, particularly in preceding administrations.

The President could not possibly have been ignorant of graft in the Veterans' Bureau. The astounding congressional disclosures made all that clear.

The President could not conceivably have been ignorant of the fact that Teapot Dome would look like 30 cents as compared with the whole war graft situation. He knew that there had never been an audit of war funds aggregating nearly forty billions. He knew that the attempt to get a complete investigation of the billions that were wantonly wasted or shamelessly stolen was thwarted by the grossest parliamentary malpractice in the last Congress.

Yet he was silent, inactive, unmoved by any apparent impulse to speed up justice in the most momentous and monumental thieveries of all history.

Both branches of Congress, by unanimous votes, passed a resolution declaring that the Teapot Dome transaction, in which Fall and Denby took leading parts, was "executed under circumstances indicating fraud and corruption."

That resolution further declared:

"The said leases and contract were entered into without authority on the part of the officers purporting to act in the execution of the same for the United States and in violation of the acts of Congress; and

"Such leases and contract were made in defiance of the settled policy of the Government . . . to maintain in the ground a great reserve supply of oil adequate to the needs of the Navy in any emergency threatening the national security."

Fall could not have done his part without the cooperation of Denby. So far as public interest and public welfare are concerned each is as guilty as the other.

Yet the President made no move to oust Denby as Secretary of the Navy.

Later, in the only way it could act in the matter, the Senate resolved:

"That it is the sense of the United States Senate that the President of the United States immediately request the resignation of Edwin Denby as Secretary of the Navy."

Still the President kept Denby. More than that, he issued a defiant statement that:

"No official recognition can be given to the passage of the Senate resolution relative to their opinion concerning members of the Cabinet or other officers under Executive control."

When, finally, Denby did resign the President wrote:

"It is with regret that I am to part with you. You will go with the knowledge that your honesty and integrity have not been impugned."

Consider the case of Daugherty.

The same Senate resolution that characterized the Teapot Dome transaction as "indicating fraud and corruption," contained these orders to the President:

"Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed immediately to cause suit to be instituted and prosecuted for the annulment and cancellation of the said leases and contract and all contracts incidental or supplemental thereto, to enjoin further extraction of oil from the said reserves under said leases or from the territory covered by the same, to secure any further appropriate incidental relief, and to prosecute such other actions or proceedings, civil and criminal, as may be warranted by the facts in relation to the making of the said leases and contract.

"And the President is further authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, special counsel who shall have charge and control of the prosecution of such litigation, anything in the statutes touching the powers of the Attorney General of the Department of Justice to the contrary notwithstanding."

In other words, the Senate said: "We do not and can not trust your Attorney General. Therefore we instruct you to employ special counsel."

Already Daugherty had been discredited. Long before this a real President would have replaced him with a more acceptable official. Yet even when both branches voted their utter lack of confidence in him, Coolidge kept Daugherty. He should have said to the Senate: "Don't pass that resolution. It will not be necessary. The task of making public prosecutions and securing justice to the people rightfully, logically, is the function of the Attorney General. I will at once provide a new Attorney General, a man worthy of your confidence and that of the country. Further, I will see that he has competent, trustworthy assistants." Instead of doing that, even then the President made no move to oust Daugherty.

Ignoring the plain imputation of this congressional action that his Attorney General could not be trusted to deal with big graft, he kept Daugherty and uncomplainingly complied with the order to employ special counsel to do what the Department of Justice was paid for and expected to perform.

What a sorry position for a President and his Attorney General!

Daugherty stayed on. He is still Attorney General as this is written, although his resignation is momentarily expected as a result of congressional and public clamor.

Why does the President keep Daugherty? His office is crucially vital to the "safety" of the exploiters and grafters. Is he retained in that position because of their need for protection?

Is it because the appointment of a "safe" Attorney General to succeed him would hardly be possible with the Senate and country stirred so deeply? The certain fight on the confirmation of a new Attorney General who would be "satisfactory" to the looters and profiteers—is that the real reason why Daugherty was not ditched?

A real President would have said to Daugherty:

"Congress and the country look upon you with suspicion. Whether justly or not, they have lost confidence in you. The time has come for great, far-reaching prosecutions, which involve vastly more than reparations and punishments. These cases must be so conducted as to restore popular faith in the integrity, ability, and power of the Government. You can not meet the requirements. Get out."

Then the President should have placed a clean, competent, fearless prosecuting attorney in charge of the Department of Justice. He should have instructed such an official not only to act in the Teapot Dome matter but also in scores and scores of other "grafts." In the end, with a real President and a fighting Department of Justice, it would have meant a "criminal drive" extending into all the gigantic thieveries of the war period.

But the President did nothing of that character. He is keeping Daugherty to the last minute that is possible.

A real President would have recognized that Fall, Denby, and Daugherty were no worse, politically, than all the rest of the Cabinet. He would have said to the country: "There has been quite enough of special-interest favors. It is high time to give the people a square deal. This political thing called reactionism means only that the profiteers and exploiters of one kind and another get every advantage that those in control of the Government, directly and indirectly, can bestow. I will wipe the slate clean and give the country a completely new Cabinet, superseding the present corps of politicians with statesmen whose hearts and hands are free of selfishness and subservency."

The President did not do that. He kept them all. With a consistency worthy a better cause he stuck to the worst of them.

Most conspicuous of all the things that the President has done is his announcement of candidacy for election in 1924.

Despite such a clear record of loyalty to executive associates whom Congress and the country believe to be, if not unfaithful, at least incompetent stewards of public welfare, despite his own incapacity or lack of courage to deal adequately with any important phase of the crisis that confronts the Nation, Coolidge asks, and perhaps expects, the approval of the electors of America.

What fools—what plain damn fools—the people must be in the opinion of the Old Guard.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, not for the purpose of asking the Senate to consider it this afternoon, but for the purpose of securing an opportunity at the proper time tomorrow and in the usual way, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 4, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the number on the calendar?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The calendar number is 214. In making the motion I repeat that it is not my purpose to ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution this afternoon. I am willing that it shall be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may take any other action, so long as it is made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 4.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the question? Has it been made the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would become the unfinished business if the motion of the Senator from New York is agreed to.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I understand that the proposed constitutional amendment is likely to take up a great deal of time, perhaps several days. I would like to ask the Senator from New York to withhold his motion so that I may make a motion to take up the general pension bill, which has been on the calendar now for nearly two months. That bill probably would not take up very much time. We could dispose of it in two or three hours, perhaps.

Mr. KING. I do not think that could be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is for the very reason that I expect a good deal of debate on the constitutional amendment that I make the motion now, so that it shall be the unfinished business when we adjourn this evening. I anticipate that within a few days we shall be confronted, and very properly so, with a succession of appropriation bills, and it will be necessary for the Senate to give consideration to them. I anticipate there will be a little interval now in which this constitutional amendment can be under consideration.

It is not my purpose, however, unless the situation changes a great deal, to ask that the Senate recess from day to day in the event the joint resolution is made the unfinished business. So far as I am concerned and as the situation now appears to me, I am perfectly willing that if the Senate makes the joint resolution the unfinished business we shall adjourn and have a morning hour. Then at any time before 2 o'clock on any day the Senator from New Mexico may bring up the pension bill and, if it takes but a short time to discuss it and dispose of it, he will have sufficient time before 2 o'clock on each day to do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, does the Senator from New York have any idea how long the joint resolution is liable to take?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I never have any idea how long the Senate will take to do anything that is brought before it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have an idea it will take several days. I want to suggest that we have some legislation on the calendar which is intended to help the farmer. Whether it will do so or not I do not know, but I want to say that we ought to do whatever we are going to do for the relief of the farmer, and we ought to do it pretty promptly. I believe that some of the bills proposing to bring relief to the farmer should be made the unfinished business rather than a measure of this kind that can very well wait, and without which the Government and the people of the country can very well wait.

I do not know who has charge of the farmers' legislation, but I do think we ought not to make the unfinished business now some measure like the joint resolution, which will take several days, when we have on the calendar legislation for the benefit of the farmer that ought to be considered.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I want to supplement what the Senator from Washington has said. I think the agricultural legislation ought to be taken up. I think the farmers are about reaching the conclusion that we are just fooling with these matters and not getting down to business with reference to action on their situation. I do not believe that the Senate appreciates the agricultural conditions. I hope that we can make the McNary bill the unfinished business at this time rather than the constitutional amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am quite in agreement with the suggestion of the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Iowa, but it is quite apparent that we are not ready to proceed with the other legislation at this time. We can move to take up that legislation, the McNary bill or any other measure, at any time we shall see fit, if we have the votes to do so, notwithstanding the joint resolution is pending. If that legislation were ready for consideration it would be, of course, a very good reason for taking it up, but as it is not ready, I see no reason why we should not go ahead with the joint resolution until we do have an opportunity to take it up. I shall vote to take up the other legislation whenever it is ready to be taken up, but I happen to know that it is not quite ready to be taken up at this time.

Mr. BURSUM. It seems to me that consideration of amendments to the Constitution ought not to be considered the first business to take up. We have gotten along pretty well during the last 150 years without those amendments, and we might get along perhaps a few days longer. There is business on the calendar which ought to be taken up, and bills that are ready to be taken up and considered. I hope the proposal to make the proposed amendment to the Constitution the unfinished business may not be accepted by the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I made no objection and shall make no objection to the motion to make the proposed constitutional amendment the unfinished business. I certainly would offer no objection to making the bill for the relief of the farmers the unfinished business, nor for that matter shall I object at the proper time to the consideration of the pension bill, but I think that I ought to say that the time is coming when we will have to spend quite a little time, and in time, on the various appropriation bills. I do not wish to be put in the position of objecting when these matters come up, but when a statement is made like the one by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that this joint resolution can be laid aside for other considerations I wish to offer this suggestion:

If other bills are taken up with the same spirit of generosity toward the more urgent business from time to time I shall make no objection, but I wish to say that while there have been delays in the Senate there have been more delays in the House, and there are still delays there, in the preparation and forwarding to us of the appropriation bills. They will, very soon now, probably before this week is out, commence coming in numbers and quantity rather faster perhaps than we can conveniently take care of them. In order to facilitate the business of the consideration of those bills by the subcommittees and by the clerks, we shall have to have them brought up for consideration on the floor from time to time without waiting for such long delays as sometimes occur when the time of the Senate is occupied with an unfinished business which may proceed for a week or ten days, with nothing much being done during the interval, and the little that is done not being of great consequence finally.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the motion to make the proposed constitutional amendment the unfinished business could well go over until tomorrow, as there is quite a conflict of opinion as to what shall be made the unfinished business. It seems to me the entire afternoon will be consumed in determining that question. We can not give these matters very elaborate consideration and discussion until we get rid of the calendar. There is always a great pressure when bills accumulate on the calendar in which various Senators are interested. Consequently when measures are under consideration there is always a pressure and a hurrying up of legislation of the character that is desired to be brought before the Senate by the Senator from New York. It seems to me the wise thing to do is to let the motion made by the Senator from New York go over until tomorrow at the termination of the morning hour and then proceed with its consideration. It is now a quarter after 3. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. I hope the Senator will let his motion go over.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my intention to ask that we go to the calendar after the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has disposed of a matter relative to a conference report which he wishes to bring up at this time. There is a disputed item between the two Houses which we should dispose of so that the conferees can go on with their work. It ought not to take very long to dispose of the question, and then I shall ask that we proceed to the calendar.

Mr. SWANSON. There is a motion pending by the Senator from New York that the proposed constitutional amendment be made the unfinished business. I suggest that we should have about six or eight hours, anyway, to determine what is the wise thing for the Senate to do in connection with making it the unfinished business. Why should we hurry in here at this late hour to make a matter the unfinished business which will be plaguing the Senate for two or three weeks and will be laid aside from time to time if it is before the Senate? Senators will come in and ask unanimous consent for something else to be taken up, and there is no use in making it the unfinished business unless the Senator from New York purposes to push it to a conclusion.

What is the use of debating the joint resolution on Monday and again on Saturday and again the next week and for another month? It seems to me it is ill advised to make a measure of that kind and character the unfinished business. If the Senator purposed to make the joint resolution the unfinished business, and to keep it before the Senate until it was fought out to a conclusion, there would be some excuse for that; but simply to make it the unfinished business, to be delayed and put off; to hold it before the Senate for two or three weeks and only debate it for 10 minutes at a time, while other Senators are at work on other matters, thinking that the measure is before the Senate although it is not and is being temporarily laid aside, is, in my opinion, entirely improper. It seems to me the right thing to do is to determine to-morrow after 2 o'clock, at the end of the morning hour, what the Senate desires to have as the unfinished business, unfettered and untrammelled by any action taken at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It surpasses my comprehension how the Senator from Virginia got any such idea as he has stated about my plans. I had never suggested to the Senate that this joint resolution be made the unfinished business merely for the purpose of having its title read once a day and then that it be laid aside.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the Senator from New York to say that he would give way to other measures.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I simply indicated that, as is the custom, I would give way, if the joint resolution were made the unfinished business, to appropriation bills, which is nearly always done. That is the understanding which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] received from my remarks.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator from New York any objection to proceeding with the calendar from now until we adjourn to-day, yielding in the meantime to the Senator from Utah, and let his motion be pending to be decided at 2 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Virginia mentioned on two or three occasions in his remarks a moment ago the late hour of quarter past 3 o'clock. It does not seem to me it is so very late.

Mr. SWANSON. We shall find it a very short time when we take up the calendar. There are a great many bills on the calendar, and the calendar is not considered as frequently as it ought to be, but its consideration is always interfered with.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator from Virginia will permit me to repeat what I said in the beginning, it is now, I will say, by way of introduction, 3.16 o'clock. If the Senate sees fit to make the Senate joint resolution, in effect, the unfinished business, I stated in my opening remarks that I would not press its consideration at all this afternoon; that, so far as I was concerned, the Senate might proceed with other business, including the calendar under Rule VIII, if it is desired, and again to-morrow morning until 2 o'clock. We could work here until 6 o'clock this evening; that would be two hours and three-quarters; and two hours again to-morrow morning, aggregating four hours and three-quarters before the joint resolution would normally come up under the rule. When it does come up at 2 o'clock, however, if it should do so, I shall hope to hold it before the Senate, except when an appropriation bill makes its appearance, and then, of course, so far as I may individually do so, I shall ask that it be temporarily laid aside. I do not see why we could not settle the question now as well as at any other time.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, is the pending motion debatable? The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BRUCE. Then I should like to read into the Record a letter on an entirely different subject.

Many years ago when John Randolph, of Roanoke, was a Member of the House of Representatives, in speaking of domestic manufactures, he used these vivid words:

I have been almost tempted to believe from the similarity of character and avocations that Hector had a Virginian wife; that Lucretia herself—for she displayed the spirit of a Virginian matron—was a Virginia lady. Where were they found? Spinning among their handmaids. What was the occupation of a Virginian wife? Her highest ambition? To attend to her domestic and household cares; to dispense medicine and food to the sick; to minister to the comfort of her family, her servants, and her poor neighbors, where she had any. At the sight of such a woman my heart bows down and does her reverence.

Now, I desire to read into the Record a letter from a Virginian matron, which shows that the Virginian matron is still endowed with the spirit of Lucretia, and that what she was 122 years ago, when the speech of John Randolph, of Roanoke, was delivered, she is to-day. It is a letter written to the editor of the New York Times by Anna Breckinridge Robertson, of Roanoke, Va. It reads as follows:

WHERE A BONUS IS REQUESTED.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Indignation has conquered timidity, and I, as the daughter of a soldier and the mother of three, must protest through your columns against calling ex-soldiers "public creditors," as was done by a State commander recently. I concur in the letter of David L. Saunders in Saturday's Times.

I was born into the Civil War, in which my grandfather lost in battle three sons, including my father. A fourth was badly wounded and a fifth enlisted at 16, shortly before Appomattox. Those five young men obeyed the higher instincts of their nature, which impelled them to follow duty and risk their lives in defense of their State. The path of my childhood was through the trail of post-war horrors. I knew that war "was hell." But the same instincts that impelled their ancestors drove my three sons to enlist in the World War, and I, well knowing, gave them my blessing.

I do not know how other mothers may feel, but in the name of my sons and myself I refuse to entertain the suggestion that they should be paid or rewarded for service in protection of the country of which they are units. If my sons rescue me from danger there is no question of indebtedness; it is simply right and their bounden duty. Tip your Pullman porters and give a bonus to your underpaid stenographers, but do not reward a man for saving his country and himself as part of it from destruction. Materialism has almost smothered the ideals which the soldiers carried or which carried them into the war. But they have still a splendid consciousness of duty done. For God's sake let us leave them that.

ANNA BRECKINRIDGE ROBERTSON.

ROANOKE, VA., March 11, 1924.

Mr. President, I say, in the words of John Randolph: "My heart bows down to that woman and does her reverence."

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand that legislation for the relief of the farmers is not quite ready for consideration, and that means, of course, that it will go over for a time. There is, however, another bill on the calendar which I think we ought to take up in preference to the joint resolution of the Senator from New York. I may be in favor of the joint resolution; I have not given it any consideration; but the Senator from New Mexico has a bill on the calendar to take care of men and women who are standing on the brink of the grave, not only men and women who have served their country to secure its preservation, but men and women who have served it across the sea and in defense of humanity. The committee has reported that bill. There may be those who are opposed to it, but there are a great many of us, I am satisfied, who are in favor of it. I think that we ought to act upon it, and I think we ought to take it up in preference to the joint resolution of the Senator from New York. If we are going to pass it, let us pass it and take care of as many of those as we can before they pass away. If we are not going to pass it, let us say so and let them know that they can not expect its passage. So, Mr. President, I am going to vote against the motion of the Senator from New York, in the hope that if it is defeated the Senate will vote to take up Senate bill No. 5 reported by the Senator from New Mexico from the Committee on Pensions.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate long enough only to propound a question which I presume will be answered in the morning newspapers.

In the testimony yesterday before the committee investigating the Attorney General there was developed the fact that the films of the prize fight between Carpentier and Dempsey were brought from New Jersey to the home of the mentor of the present administration, Mr. Edwin B. McLean, and there exhibited in the presence of the President and the Cabinet and others who with them were above the law and had a right to have exhibited to them films that were in violation of the law brought to Washington. The present Postmaster General, Mr. New, is out with a very vehement denial that the then President was present. He admits that he was present, and the Secretary of State, who is presumed to be weighted down with the grave matters of state, admits that he also was present. Mr. Hughes says, however, in extenuation that he did not know until he had eaten and drunk that he was to see a fight film.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not recognize that a man interested in international questions and having them in his charge ought to have been permitted to witness an international prize fight?

Mr. CARAWAY. With the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri I find myself in sympathy. I concede that there is at least one question relating to foreign affairs that the Secretary of State ought to know something about. He has shown a lack of comprehension of many of these problems, and therefore I am persuaded that he should have been permitted to educate himself upon this very great question of which was the better man, Dempsey, the American slacker, or Carpentier, the Frenchman.

What I was really thinking about, Mr. President, was the grave assembly, composed of the heads of the Government, brought together in this home, where all the intellectual life of this administration is passed—that of Mr. McLean—and there having exhibited to them a film that every man who saw it knew had been brought to the District in violation of law.

I know they will be so much better fitted to lecture the American people on their duty to obey the law and to respect all constituted authority after it is known by every man and woman in America that they are willing to have the law violated when it adds to their pleasure. I want to amend that by accepting again the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri that they were trying to educate themselves upon international questions.

It is the first time, Mr. President, I have known that this administration had any interest in any international problem. It is the first time that I have known that it gave any intelligent consideration to such questions. But what I did want to say is this: I used to practice law. When a witness admitted almost everything that had been said about him, but said, "I want to enter this explanation," I found the jury usually did not give the explanation much credit. The charge was that a conspiracy had been entered into between the producers of these films and Mr. Muma—who seems to have a Japanese name but another parentage, and who, like all the other great men connected with this administration, comes from Washington Court House, Ohio—and the Attorney General and his agents, whereby they should be permitted to introduce this film into the various States upon a 50-50 division. That is, the man who made the film was to get half the profits and the men who violated the law, including the Attorney General, were to get the other half.

The Congress, whether wisely or otherwise—and I reckon it must have been otherwise, because they ought not to have passed a law that handicapped the administration in seeking information—enacted this law: I am reading section 10416 of the Criminal Code, but, perish the thought! There is no Criminal Code. The Attorney General has suspended it.

It shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for mailing or delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier for carriage, or to send or carry from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or to bring or to cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition.

The punishment being:

Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall for each offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

When we get an Attorney General, as I presume we will some time, I am wondering if he is going to prosecute these people who brought the films here in violation of that statute; and can it be possible—though I suggest it with a great deal of hesitancy and with an apology, because the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] will read me a lecture when he hears about it—that we shall be called upon to remit the fines of the Attorney General and the Secretary of State and the Postmaster General and the President, who then was the Vice President, and others who participated in this showing, by reason of the fact that everybody who participated in it was equally guilty? It makes me shudder to remember that the papers this morning say that the then Vice President, now the President—who the Senator from Massachusetts says can not think any evil, much less do it—was also present.

Mr. New, who is the newly made Postmaster General and has all the zeal incident to a man who has recently acquired high position, intimates that everybody who says that the then President was present is a liar. That is the most common way to answer everybody who talks in these days. If there ever was an exhibition of bad memory or bad morals, the testimony touching the whole transactions of this administration with the Teapot Dome and other matters of public interest, including the transportation of these films, is a fine example. Take the editor of the Washington Post. As somebody wittily said, they did not know how much he knew, but if one knew as much as he had forgotten about the things about which he was presumed to testify he would be entitled to a college degree. Take Mr. McLean, who said he got so many tips that he did not know whether he got any tip or not. Take every witness who appeared before the committee; take Mr. Major and Mr. Homer, from my distinguished friend's city of Baltimore, and now take the statements of Mr. Hughes and Mr. New and the other people connected with this more recent infraction of the law, and I have reached the point where I do not know whether anybody can be believed at all.

Why, take the chivalrous Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty. I understand that he is Irish, and they are always the soul of chivalry. In order that he himself may not be too severely criticized, he has the fine spirit this morning to try to blast the reputation of the wife of his dead friend. He intimates that she was registering in a hotel in Ohio with a gentleman as husband and wife, and that she tried to blackmail the Attorney General. Mr. President, it strikes me that he ought to have talked with some police-court attorney before he gave out that statement, because I never yet saw a man being tried for a crime where he had no defense that did not assail the character of the witnesses who appeared against him.

I wish there might be some originality in this Attorney General of ours. There ought to be something that we could admire, and I wish he would be original. Instead of denouncing even a woman who was good enough to be his associate, who according to her own testimony, not disputed, in his company and with others was the guest of the President of these United States and was taken out to dinner by the then President, Mr. Harding, she ought not now by the present Attorney General to be denounced and branded as a bawd in order that he might escape the just conclusion at which people are arriving in weighing the testimony that she gave against the Attorney General.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the Attorney General was present at the exhibition of these films. I take it that he was, although I have not seen his to-day's denunciation and denial; but I know that heretofore, every time anyone testified about any act of his, he immediately said they were not telling the truth, and that they were actuated by improper motives. He was accused yesterday of being present when these films were exhibited. He was accused by witnesses yesterday of having discussed the subject with people who were anxious to have the films introduced into the various States of this Union, and of having suggested the attorney to whom they should go to make the arrangements, and to whom I understand they did go. The Attorney General does not deny that. Of course, he may reach it to-morrow or next day or next week. He did take occasion to denounce a woman, to blacken her reputation, and to destroy her, if he himself is to be believed; but he does not deny that he, in the presence of the other members of the Cabinet and the then President of these United States, witnessed an exhibition of films that he knew.

and every one present knew, had been brought into the District of Columbia in violation of law. He knew about it. There has been no prosecution, and I take it for granted that it is not hard to imagine that if he were willing to connive at the exhibition of films brought from New Jersey to the District of Columbia in violation of law he might also have conspired for those same films to have been transported by some means into Delaware and Maryland.

It was no graver offense to send this film to Chicago, where, I understand, there was paid $35,000 in legal fees in having the films shown, or to New York, where it was shown for $2,000, and made $75,000 profit; or in the neighborhood of $125,000, figuring it all up, in violation of law. I say that the American people are not going to have very much trouble in believing all that story. When the Secretary of State gravely rises in his place to say, "I was present and I saw these films," and when the Postmaster General says, "I was present and I saw them," and when, therefore, the people have all these witnesses to show that the Attorney General and all the high officers of the Government connived at the violation of the law in bringing the films here for them to see, it is not going to be difficult to imagine that they let them be carried into Ohio or Illinois or Tennessee or wherever their owners might have seen fit to transport them.

Then, Mr. President—I am not, of course, criticizing the administration; the Lord knows I would not do that—but I should like to know by what process of reasoning it is thought entirely proper for the law to be violated in order that the President and the Secretary of State and the Attorney General and the Postmaster General and all the other generals connected with the departments should see a film, and then deny to the other people of the United States the right to see it. If it was right to transport it to the District of Columbia in order that all these high dignitaries might see this film, they ought to have been equally kind to the rest of the people, as it seems they were, and let it be transported into all the other States.

At least, therefore, I am reaching the conclusion that the Attorney General seems to have been consistent—that after he permitted the law to be violated so that he and all the other members of the Cabinet might see the fight film he permitted the law to be violated so that all the other people of the United States, for a consideration, might also see the fight film.

What I really want, Mr. President, since the Secretary of State has gone into the newspapers to explain, is this: I wish he would tell the country in the morning, if he pleases, by what process of reasoning he saw fit to sit still for a year and a half when he knew the law had been violated and enter no kind of a protest, and now, because they happen to mention the fact that he was present and incidentally talked over the scheme to transmit the films into other States, he feels so outraged that he must rush into print this morning to say, "While it is true I was there, I did not enter into any kind of a conspiracy to enable other people to see it." I do not know that he is going to be so good to me as I hope he will, but if he really respects all these one hundred millions of people who thought of him sometimes as a man who really thought the law ought to be enforced without any respect to person—because he sat for a while on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States and quit it, I understand he contends, under a false representation to him, that he could be elected President of the United States—I just wish he would take us all into his confidence and tell us about this matter, because there is another election coming, and, just between us, despite, I regret to say, the prediction of the senior Senator from Massachusetts that Mr. Coolidge is to be renominated and reelected, we all know that he is not. There may be another chance for Mr. Hughes to run for office again, you know, and he ought to set us an example of being perfectly frank with us and of telling us why it was that it was entirely proper to bring the film here so that he could see it, and therefore why, if it was—and I know if he had not thought so he would not have indulged in it—why does he complain so much when it is said by a witness that he also consulted with the Attorney General and some other people with reference to what means might be employed to transport this film into the States of the Union so that the other white folks might see it also? I am sure he will explain it. If he does not, I know the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] to-morrow will do so.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the subject before the Senate, to wit, the question of bringing the films into the District of Columbia, but so much has been said this afternoon with reference to the condition of legislation that I think it not inappropriate to say a word which I have for some time been thinking ought to be said.

We have been in session now about three months and a half. In two months and a half more we will be practically in the midst of a national campaign for the election of a President. One of the candidates will have been nominated probably and the other convention will be near at hand.

After that shall have occurred there will be little opportunity, even if we are in session, for anything in the nature of legislation. When we look back over what we have accomplished in the last three and a half months and contemplate that we have only two and a half months to complete our task, we are confronted with the proposition that this session of Congress is going to end with practically no legislation enacted. We shall do well from this time on if we give proper consideration even to the appropriation bills. I doubt if we can pass the appropriation bills, with the consideration they ought to have, in the time which is allotted between now and the 10th day of June.

The responsibility for the Congress, while we have a rather divided situation, of course is upon the party in power, and I am addressing my remarks principally to those who are responsible for the situation—that is, those who are on this side of the Chamber.

I can not imagine anything more humiliating to the Republican Party in the coming campaign, and in all probability more disastrous, than for us to spend the next two and a half months as we have the last three and a half. When the Congress convened we were advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that there was a possibility of lifting the tax burden of this country to the extent of $350,000,000. The able Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who perhaps is as well fitted to speak upon the subject as any of our colleagues, stated that, in his opinion, it could be lifted to the extent of $500,000,000. There could be no task that ought to be more agreeable to the Congress of the United States, certainly none more important and commanding, than that of lifting the stupendous tax burden which is now crushing the American people. It ought to enlist our undivided purpose and call for our most zealous effort.

Homes are being sold over this country because people are unable to pay their taxes. Business men are distressed because they are unable to meet their taxes. Farms upon which people have lived for half a century, giving their time and their industry and their effort to making homes and rearing families, are now passing from them by reason of tax sales.

The tax burden of this country is one of the discouraging and demoralizing conditions which confront us, both from an economic and from a moral standpoint. Yet we have spent three months and a half, and there is but little indication that the tax burden will be lifted in this Congress at all. Of course, the Congress can not give relief to local taxes, but we can give relief here, and that will be to the benefit of the whole situation. In my opinion, instead of relieving the taxpayers of this country and curtailing the obligations of Government, when this Congress shall have ended it will have increased them, and if it does so there is only one judgment that is due it.

Equally distressing with the tax situation is the agricultural condition in this country. It would be difficult to command language adequately to describe the condition of the agricultural interests, especially through the great 15 Northwestern States, those great agricultural States. Speaking upon this matter some months ago I referred to the fact that in one county in a great agricultural State there were 6,000 items in a single newspaper advertising property for sale which belonged to farmers. I received many letters from over the country wanting to know if that was not an error, whether it was not 600 instead of 6,000. It was not an error; it was a correct statement of the fact, and that is only indicative of a distressed condition which prevails throughout the agricultural regions, certainly in all the Northwestern States, and in my judgment, to a marked extent in all the States.

We came here solemnly pledged to find relief for the agricultural conditions if it was within our power. We have been here three months and a half. The farmer is now approaching the time when he must put his seed in the ground, when he must prepare to raise his crops. He does not know what the situation is to be, or what conditions are to confront him; whether he is to have legislation which may relieve him, or whether he must go again against the almost inconceivable conditions which have confronted him for the last three years.

I do not object to the investigations which are now going on. I am perfectly willing that they shall proceed to their conclusions. Certainly I have no desire, and I do not presume that anyone here has any desire to curtail any legitimate investigation which may be in process. Let them be carried on and concluded. But certainly the hour is at hand when we should dissolve ourselves as a grand jury and enter upon the task for which this body is designed, namely, meeting the legislative situation which confronts us. These investigations can be concluded, they can be completed, and still we can go about our business of legislating. We ought not to devote our whole time to them. Let the committees finish their work, but those not actually engaged on the committee should not consume time to the exclusion of important legislation. We have permitted these things to draw us away from our main duty and to the great detriment of the public interests. We ought to give attention to those who call for relief, both in the matter of taxes and agricultural relief.

Let me say to the party in power that the next campaign will not be won upon the platform which is written at Cleveland. The next campaign, if won, will not be won upon the candidate, who is nominated at Cleveland. If we are successful, it will be by reason of what we do here in the Congress of the United States between now and the 10th day of next June. We are to win or lose right here.

There will be no possible way by which we can successfully confront the constituency of this country with a broken-down record in the Congress of the United States. No argument, no political appeal, no incitement to party zeal, will meet the situation in the heated days of August and September or even the better days of October and the first days of November. We must make our record here, and if we are anxious to continue in power it is incumbent upon us to set about our legislative task. The tax bill is now in process of consideration. The agricultural measure may be taken up shortly, and certainly those measures ought to be pushed to a conclusion.

I do not complain, as I said a moment ago, of these other considerations, but I do insist that the time for legislation is now at hand. We are daily neglecting the interests of those who sent us here and to whom shortly we shall have to give an accounting.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I always enjoy hearing the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. We are in accord on a good many things, but I see no occasion to criticize the Senate for failing to act on appropriation bills. This is the long session of Congress. Senators seem to forget that. I have seen the Senate pass as many as three appropriation bills in one day. After the bills had passed the House and had been thoroughly gone over by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and practically unanimously indorsed, they were speedily passed. We all know that the appropriation bills do not differ very materially from one session of Congress to another.

I do not think that there is anything the Senate can do now of more importance to the people whose Government this is than to expose and punish crime at the Capital. What do doctors, skilled in the science of medicine, do when they find a deadly disease or epidemic in a town? They go to work to cure those who are afflicted, to stamp out the disease, to rid the city of the pest or plague, whatever it is. The doctors do not quit their work because somebody says, "You are discovering too many people who are sick and the treatment you are giving is too heroic." The doctors say, "It is our business to clean up. When we find people that we can heal by physicking them with a little medicine, we give it to them, and when we find those who have to have a surgical operation, we lay them upon a table and perform an operation, if necessary." So if the medicine we are now giving to Republican officials is nauseating to some of them and the surgeon's knife is painful to others, they have got to take their medicine and submit to the operation, because it is our business, if we are faithful to ourselves and faithful to our oaths, to do the work, however unpleasant or painful it may be.

This terrible condition we find is not brought about by the conduct of Democrats; it is brought about by the corrupt doings of Republican officials, and they are reaping just what they have sown. Mr. President, there is no higher service a Senator can now render than that of going into this terrible condition which exists at the Capital of the Nation and cutting it out root and branch.

I remember a few years ago, when General Gorgas and Doctor Reed, I believe, went down to New Orleans, when that city had been afflicted with the yellow-fever plague. They said, "We must destroy the pest that produces yellow fever," and they said, "It is a mosquito, and his breeding place is in the lagoons and cesspools of the city, and in order to get rid of the yellow fever permanently, we will have to destroy the breeding place of the mosquito which carries the germ."

A good many people there said, "You are not going to ditch off that lake; not at all. There is nothing in your theory." But the doctors said, "There is something in the theory. We have tried it out. We know what is necessary to be done, and we are going to ditch off this lake and that lagoon, and we are going to flood these places with kerosene oil, and you will have yellow fever no more forever."

The constituted authorities finally said, "It is all right. Go ahead." If the people who did not want to have their pools disturbed and their little lakes ditched off had had their way, the yellow fever would have continued in New Orleans. But General Gorgas and Doctor Reed went there and pointed the way, and the people listened to them, and followed their leadership, and New Orleans is free from the yellow-fever plague forever. It is gone. How? Why, by destroying the breeding place, ditching off the places where they hatch these terrible pests that carried the yellow-fever germs.

What are we to do in the Senate of the United States? Drive out of public office every man who spreads the germ of corruption and crime in a position of trust. Is not that our duty? Why should we sit idle and permit these men to be corrupt in office and still fill these places to the hurt and injury of the country? Self-government is on trial in this western world. Self-government is attacked to-day as it never has been in our Republic. The enemy from the outside could not cross the ocean. Our boys, baptizing the soil of France with their blood, beat back the foreign invader and saved our institutions from him. Who is it, then, that threatens our liberties? Is it an enemy outside of the Government? No; the evil here is from men on the inside of the temple. Those placed in charge of the temple are betraying it and bartering justice on the one hand, squandering the public domain, and sending agents around not to enforce the law of justice but to protect crooks, not to uphold judges in doing their duty but to corrupt them. That is what we have. I submit to the Senate that when the time comes that the criminal can go into the courthouse and buy immunity from prosecution, the country is in grave danger. The evidence yesterday disclosed just that sort of thing.

My good friend, the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—and he is a very able, brave Senator—referred to people who are losing their property in being forced to pay their taxes. I want to contrast with that class of people, hard pressed as they are under a Republican administration, the instrumentalities of government so used that they impoverish one class while they enrich another, a picture of the present Secretary of the Treasury refunding to the mighty rich of the country in one year $123,000,000. While he is making them richer still, giving them back their taxes, this other class must give up the old homestead in order to pay their taxes. That is what happens under Republican rule, and—

By their fruits ye shall know them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. KING. Is the motion now pending to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 4.

APPOINTMENT OF SAMUEL KNIGHT—AS TO SECTIONS 16 AND 36 IN NAVAL RESERVE NO. 1.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I invite the attention of Senators to the following facts. It will take me but a few moments to state them.

On January 28 the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] introduced Senate Joint Resolution 71. That resolution provided—

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed forthwith to institute proceedings to assert and establish the title of the United States to sections 16 and 36, township 30 south, range 23 east, Mount Diablo meridian, within the exterior limits of naval reserve No. 1 in the State of California, and the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to employ special counsel to prosecute such proceedings and any suit or suits ancillary thereto or necessary or desirable to arrest the exhaustion of the oil within said sections 16 and 36 pending such proceedings.

On February 7 the senior Senator from Montana asked unanimous consent, which was granted, to call up for immediate consideration the joint resolution, which, according to the RECORD, was unanimously and promptly passed. The resolution went to the House and passed that body on February 16. It then went to the President, who approved it February 21. Pursuant to the authority and the directions given, the President set about to select and employ some competent special counsel to prosecute the actions and proceedings contemplated by the joint resolution. He thereupon caused to be sent to California the following telegram, which I would beg Senators to note. It was dated Washington, D. C., March 1, 1924, and reads as follows:

Hon. SAMUEL KNIGHT,
Attorney at law, San Francisco, Calif.

Do you now or have you at any time in recent years represented an oil company? Are you in position to accept without embarrassment employment to represent the Government in litigation which will involve the State of California and the Standard Oil Co. as to sections 16 and 36 in naval oil reserve No. 17? If so, about what compensation would you expect, and could you undertake at once coming here for conference on notice? Wire fully, collect, and treat this telegram as strictly confidential.

RUSH L. HOLLAND, Assistant Attorney General.

The following telegraphic reply came from Mr. Knight:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., March 3, 1924.

RUSH L. HOLLAND,

Assistant Attorney General, Washington, D. C.:

Have not at any time represented an oil company or oil interests and am in a position to accept without embarrassment employment to represent the Government in the litigation referred to in your wire of March 2. Difficult to determine in advance what compensation I might reasonably expect, and am willing to have it determined by the department or authority having matter in charge. If selected I can arrange to undertake matter at once and come to Washington for conference whenever requested.

SAMUEL KNIGHT.

Upon the receipt of that telegram the President on March 4 made the selection of Mr. Knight to serve in the capacity named and notified the Senate of such selection. That notification came to us in the usual manner and pro forma was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. I am inclined to think all of us assumed that that was the proper disposition of the nomination and perhaps we all assumed that it was necessary for the Senate to concur in or confirm the selection or appointment of Mr. Knight. Whatever the law may be upon that subject, for the moment I call attention to the fact that Joint Resolution 71 does not provide for consent and approval of the Senate. In that respect Resolution 71 differs from the joint resolution which brought about the appointment of former Senator Pomerene and Mr. Roberts, of Pennsylvania, for in the latter resolution it was specifically provided that the counsel to be employed to take charge of the litigation contemplated should meet with the approval of the Senate, and ultimately the Senate gave its approval.

I am not suggesting that we should not express our opinion as to the selection of Mr. Knight, but I am calling the attention of the Senate to the record in the case to the end and for no other purpose than that of showing that the President promptly proceeded to carry out the expressed wishes of the Senate and the House and in the manner stated.

I will leave the matter here with this additional thought: Inasmuch as the selection or nomination of counsel was referred to the committee, I should be very glad indeed to have them consider the capacity and the entire fitness of Mr. Knight to represent us in the contemplated actions and proceedings in respect of the land and property claimed or to be claimed by our Government and referred to in this resolution. I am in no sense criticizing anything that has been done or not done—certainly not the committee—because of any delay that has ensued, for certain of its members have been absent on account of sickness. I express the hope, however, that the selection or employment of Mr. Knight by the President may be agreeable to the committee and to the Senate and that if it shall be deemed necessary under the law the action of the President may be approved without unnecessary delay.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With pleasure.

Mr. DILL. The Senator understands that when the nomination came to the committee the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROTH] was away from the city and it was deferred on that account, and that since that time the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has been sick. I think that is an explanation of why no action has been taken.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I intended to say that, and, in effect, did say so. There is no criticism of anyone for the delay, but I do not wish it hereafter to be thought, far less stated, that there has been or was any delay on the part of the President in setting about to carry out the expressed wishes of the Senate. My hope is, assuming, as I do for the moment, that the committee shall deem it necessary to act in the premises, that it will approve of the selection and employment of Mr. Knight. Personally I venture the opinion that the approval of the Senate is not necessary, and yet in so far as future compensation is concerned under the law it might be prudent and necessary to have the approval of the Senate in this particular instance.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President I wish to make an inquiry of the junior Senator from California if I may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask what in the judgment of the Senator from California would be the effect upon the appointment or employment if the Senate should not confirm or approve the appointment?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The President might and in all human probability would pay heed to the expressed view of the Senate and perhaps make another selection.

If the Senator will turn to the Constitution, he will find that it provides that the President has power to make certain appointments of officers, such as ambassadors, judges, and other "officers of the United States," by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but, as I am inclined to think, as a matter of law an attorney chosen to represent our Government would not be an "officer"; an office has not been created by Senate Joint Resolution 71, and hence the approval of the Senate is not called for or required.

Mr. ADAMS. My inquiry was whether or not the Senate ought to act where it had no official function; that is, if that were the situation, we should, it seems to me, avoid any possible chance of conflict with the Executive upon a matter which is beyond our power. As I understand, the Senator's position is that the resolution which provided for this employment did not require confirmation; and that, in fact, the President is fully authorized to make the appointment without confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think so.

Mr. ADAMS. And, of course, as a natural consequence, the opinion we might express would be entirely without legal effect.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes. The resolution does not provide for the Senate's concurrence as it was provided in the other resolution.

Mr. ADAMS. And, in the judgment of the Senator, it is a character of employment or appointment which does not by virtue of constitutional provision require confirmation?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is my opinion. The resolution does not call for the approval of the Senate, nor does the Constitution require it. It is not necessary to repeat, but I would gladly have the Senate act and approve the selection of Mr. Knight.

FRANK FOREHAND.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in these stormy days, when so many are engaged in trying to put people in jail, I am going to start the rather novel proposition of trying to get a person out of jail. I want to submit some facts to the Senate for the purpose of getting a soldier out of jail who ought never to have been in jail. We have tried every other means to secure his release and possibly Senate publicity is the only way by which it may be effected. I believe the boy is innocent, and I am going to leave no stone unturned to have him released and have the injustice done him righted.

Just a year ago a young man from Williamson County, Tenn., named Frank Forehand, then in the Army at Manila, left the barracks there at 7 o'clock in the morning and was arrested at 8 o'clock that night, 13 hours after he left, he still being in uniform, still in the city, near the barracks, and engaged in the most peaceful act of taking a drink of water. He was brought back to the barracks or came back to the barracks—there was no force about it—and thereupon two charges were made against him.

First, that he had violated the fifty-eighth article of war by deserting from the Army; and, second, that he was absent without leave, and thereby had violated the sixty-first article of war.

I imagine, Mr. President, that a man who had thus left his post of duty for 13 hours should have been either reprimanded, or put in the guardhouse for a day, or should have had a small fine entered against him. To have instituted court-martial to try a soldier for such an offense as was committed by this young man on the undisputed proof shown in the record is in itself a condemnation of every officer who took part in the proceeding. This young man is named Frank Forehand. He had five brothers, and five of the brothers were in the United States Army in the late war, two of them serving in France. They were poor but honest people, in Williamson County, Tenn. They did not even know how to read and write when they went into the Army, but they were taught while in the Army how to read and write. One of them is back home. He is a well to do, prosperous farmer and stands well in his community. The other four are still in the Army, including the young man, Frank Forehand, who was too young to be in the Army during the World War. Two of those boys fought in France for their country, mind you. Their records were splendid, as is shown by statements of their captain in this record. This young man's conduct was good; his service had been good. The only trouble he ever had was on this occasion when he was absent from the barracks for 13 hours.

A court-martial was convened and after a trial that young man was ordered to be confined at hard labor in the penitentiary at Alcatraz, Calif., for two whole years for being absent without leave for 13 hours from his post of duty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Was this young man convicted for being absent without leave or for desertion?

Mr. McKELLAR. He was convicted for both.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Tennessee, of course, as a lawyer, understands that the animus back of the act is determinative of its character?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do. I will give the exact testimony in this case, so that the Senator from Utah and all others may hear it. Then there can not be any doubt about the lack of evidence upon which to convict this man.

Mr. KING. However, the Senator knows that if a man intended to desert and actually did desert, if he accomplished it within a minute, the crime would have been just as great as if he had been gone away for a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that. I hope the Senator will do me the credit to think that I know something about the law governing the case, and I have the evidence before me.

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I really believe I do, and I am going to give the evidence to the Senate on which this conviction was had.

Mr. KING. But I do not think the Senator, if he will pardon me, is quite accurate, or, rather, that his judgment is quite sound, when he states that a day or two in the guardhouse for desertion would be suitable punishment, particularly in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not say anything like that. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this young man was not guilty of desertion.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated that that would have been adequate punishment for the particular case.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do; and when the Senator hears the facts he will say the same thing.

Mr. KING. If there was desertion, I am sure I shall not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there was no desertion. If the Senator will permit me to give the facts now, not as I see them, not as I interpret them, but as they are given by the witnesses, I know he will view the case in a different light.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one moment I shall yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I merely wish to ask where is it charged that the young man deserted?

Mr. McKELLAR. At Manila, in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee—

Mr. McKELLAR. It will take just a moment to finish the statement. I shall conclude in a short time.

Mr. CURTIS. The only question I wish to ask is, What can we do about it? The matter ought to be presented to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that every possible step has been taken by which this poor boy can be gotten out of the penitentiary except the step of publicity; and what I want to do is to give publicity to what was done by these officers of the Army in this particular case. Such courts-martial for such trivial offenses should never be convened. They constitute a disgrace to the officers taking part in them, and are so cruel and inhuman to the poor soldier who is victimized that we ought to take every necessary step to see that never again shall such an injustice and wrong be perpetrated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the President been apprised of the situation?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then there is another possible step which may be taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken. The Judge Advocate's Department of the Army has turned down the application for clemency. We all know that the President does not ever change or override them, or if he does—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do not say "We all know that," because here is one who knows that that has been done in times past.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps that is so. It is marvelously infrequent when the President overrules the War Department in such cases.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is another possible step. The appeal goes eventually to the President, as Commander in Chief, and he can act upon it and grant a pardon if he thinks an injustice has been done.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us suppose that that is true. I do not believe that this young man ought to be relieved in that way. He ought never to have been convicted. The proceedings should be set aside.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What does the Senator propose?

Mr. McKELLAR. The conviction should be set aside, the young man restored, and the injustice done him righted. If the Senator will wait and permit me to read the testimony I will then say more specifically what I propose to do. I will now read from the testimony. The first witness was Sergeant Cranford, from whose testimony I quote:

Q. Do you know the accused?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Point him out and state his name.

That was done.

Q. Did the accused come to your attention in any way on or about the 10th day of March of this year?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what way was he brought to your attention at that time?—A. I was notified by the provost sergeant that he was absent from prison guard, and to detail somebody in his place.

Q. Did you make a search of the quarters to see whether he was there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you find him?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was he authorized to be away from the company at any time that day?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you make a notation on the morning report of this man's absence?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why was not this notation made?—A. He wasn't absent long enough—he wasn't absent 24 hours.

He was not absent long enough; he was not absent 24 hours.

I stop here long enough to remark, Mr. President, that here is a soldier not absent from barracks long enough for the sergeant on duty to make a notation even of his absence, and yet they arrest him and condemn him to two years' hard labor in the penitentiary and to everlasting disgrace, including deprivation of American citizenship.

If he had remained away long enough to have been noted absent under the rules at the barracks, no doubt these cruel and inhuman dispensers of injustice would have condemned him to be hanged. And these things take place in an army that costs the American people $325,000,000 a year in peace times. If this is a sample of our court-martial system in the Army, then the system is inexcusably rotten. But I continue to read from the evidence:

Q. When did you next see the accused?—A. I saw the accused on the following day, March 11.

Q. Where did you see him then?—A. Under charge of the guard.

Q. Did he stand reveille on the morning of March 10?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why didn't he?—A. He was a member of the prison guard, and he wasn't required to stand reveille.

Q. Then, he was really on duty at the guardhouse; is that the idea?—A. Yes, sir.

I stop long enough to say this was one of the three witnesses upon whose evidence this young man was condemned to two years' hard labor. Instead of being against the prisoner, it was wholly favorable to him and really disproved the charges.

The next witness was Sergeant Schmerfeld. I quote from his testimony as follows:

Q. Do you know the accused in this case, Sergeant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Point him out and state his name.—A. (The witness indicating the accused). Private Forehand, of Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, sir.

Q. What are your duties at the post, Sergeant?—A. Post provost sergeant, sir.

Q. As provost sergeant what are your duties here?—A. My duties are to turn out the prisoners and send them to work—to turn them over to the sentry and turn them out to work, to do the proper work that they are detailed to do, sir.

Q. On or about the 9th day of March of this year was the accused on duty with you in any way?—A. Yes, sir; on prison guard, sir.

Q. Did he mount guard in the regular manner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he present for duty during his entire tour of guard?—A. Not the entire tour; no, sir.

Q. When was he absent?—A. He was absent on the morning of the 10th, sir.

Q. At what time did you first find he was absent?—A. I found he was absent about 10 minutes to 7, sir.

Q. How did you come to find out that he was absent right at that time, Sergeant?—A. I checked the prison guard up and called the roll—called their names, sir.

Q. The accused had been on prison guard, though, the day before?—A. On prison guard that tour of duty; yes, sir.

Q. And his tour ends ordinarily at what time?—A. At 11.30, sir, at guard mount.

Q. Did you look around the guardhouse to see whether he was there or not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you find him?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether or not the accused was excused from this duty?—A. I went to the company to find out, sir, and they told me the man was absent.

Q. Did you see him at any time after that, Sergeant?—A. Not until he was confined.

Q. What time was this?—A. That was the morning of the 11th, sir.

Q. About what time in the morning was it that you saw him?—A. When I turned the prisoners out to go to work, sir.

Q. He came out of the guardhouse then; is that it?—A. Yes, sir.

There was surely nothing in the testimony of this witness upon which the accused could have been convicted of desertion. The next witness was Sergeant Barrett:

Q. What are your duties here in the post, Sergeant?—A. Provost guard, sir.

Q. Did you see the accused on or about the 10th day of March of this year?—A. I did, sir; I arrested the accused between 8 and 9 p. m. on the 10th, sir.

Q. Where did you see him then?—A. Near the piers in the port area.

Q. How was the accused dressed when you found him?—A. He was in uniform, sir.

Q. You say he was in uniform?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What led you to arrest the man?—A. There was an alarm out stating that the man was A. W. O. L., sir—absent without leave.

Q. What did you do with him after you arrested him?—A. I brought him up to the cuartel and confined him immediately, sir.

This witness conclusively shows that the only offense that anybody then ever suggested even was that the accused was absent without leave. None of the three testified to any fact suggesting desertion.

Now I shall read the testimony on which he was convicted of desertion, and this testimony which I have read and that which I am now going to read is all the testimony in the case:

Maj. C. T. Alden, Philippine Scouts, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn and testified as follows:

Questions by prosecution:

Q. State your name, rank, organization, and station.—A. Maj. C. T. Alden, Philippine Scouts, post of Manila, P. I.

Q. Do you know the accused in this case?—A. I remember his face, but I am not sure of his name.

Q. Do you recall seeing the accused before?—A. I do; the accused was before me when I was investigating charges of desertion against him.

Q. Did the accused make any statement at that time?—A. He did.

Q. Was the accused warned as to his rights before making any such statement?—A. He was.

Q. Can you give the substance of the warning that was given the accused?—A. He was warned that it was not necessary for him to make any statement unless he wished to, but that if he did, anything he said could be used for or against him, and that anything he said must be free and voluntary on his part, without hope of reward or immunity.

Q. After this warning was given the accused, Major, what did the accused have to say in regard to his offense?—A. I can't recall that entirely. I know that he stated that he had had quite a hard time, being in the hospital, being treated for syphilis, I believe; that when he got out of the hospital he was horribly disgusted with the islands and the service; that he was dissatisfied with his immediate company commander for the reason that he seemed to expect him to do things that were utterly impossible to do—or words to that effect—and that he had made up his mind to go away and not come back, as near as I can remember.

Q. You are sure that he did state, though, that he did not intend to return, that he was going away and didn't intend to come back?—A. Yes; as near as I can remember.

Q. Did he state any of the things which he considered it impossible to do in his company?—A. No; he didn't. I didn't ask him.

Q. Did the accused understand the warning that was given him?—A. He stated that he did.

Mr. President, this officer does not state any fact and does not repeat any statement of the accused upon which can be predicated the crime of desertion. This boy could have said every word this officer imputes to him and still every word could have been said and no doubt was said in entire innocence. If he had been in the hospital, if he had been troubled with disease, if he was dissatisfied with his captain, and had been unable to please him, what harm was there in saying he was going to get out of the Army for good? There was an entirely legal way of getting out of the Army and never going back to it. Why should his words have been given a criminal intent when they at least were just as susceptible of an innocent intent?

His associates thought he was simply absent without leave. He still had on his uniform. He was not trying to escape. He was in almost a stone's throw of the barracks. He was taking a drink of water when arrested. All these facts appear and are conclusive proof that he was not guilty of desertion. They are wholly at war with the theory that he was even intending to desert. But it may be claimed he should have testified in his own behalf. But if there was no proof against him, there was no reason he should have testified. His lawyer was advising him. Evidently his lawyer thought no case had been made out against him, as, indeed, this record conclusively shows none had been made out against him.

Senators, that is all the testimony, and it was upon that testimony that this man was convicted and sentenced to two years at hard labor. Let us see just what his sentence was.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did the soldier deny that he deserted?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but under the rules he was not required to testify, and there is no evidence there to convict him. Surely there is no evidence there that calls for any statement.

Mr. SMOOT. If he was not guilty of desertion, the Senator does not think for a moment that he would not have testified, does he?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is no reason why legal evidence should not be required to convict a man; and, besides that, suppose he said everything that this major said he said—that is not desertion.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what I asked the Senator. I just asked the question as to whether he had stated that he had not deserted, or did he plead "not guilty"?

Mr. McKELLAR. He plead "not guilty," and there was no testimony introduced upon which a conviction for desertion could be vested. Now, here is what he was sentenced to do:

The court was closed, and upon secret written ballot sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged the service—

Listen to this—

To be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor, at such place as the reviewing authority may direct, for two years; two-thirds of the members present at the time the vote was taken concurring.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What was the date of that?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was some time in March, 1923. That poor boy, because an officer said that he had expressed a desire or an intention to leave the Army, while in his uniform, not absent long enough for it even to be noted according to the rules of that post, is dishonored and disgraced and sentenced to two years at hard labor in the penitentiary.

It is unconscionable. It is cruel and inhuman punishment for a wrong that never was committed. It is an outrage upon the Army of the United States to sustain any such conviction as that; and yet an appeal was taken to the highest general in that district, and he confirmed it, and a petition has been filed here in Washington urging that this man be given executive clemency, and it has been turned down by the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army.

Mr. President, inasmuch as these proceedings are very short, I ask unanimous consent that they and the letters connected with them, the refusal of the department to act, be printed in the Record as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request made by the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and they will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FRANKLIN, TENN., March 13, 1924.

Hon. K. D. McKellar,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing herewith a copy of the court-martial proceedings of Pvt. Frank Forehand, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, together with copies of letters relating thereto. I am also sending the same matter to Hon. W. C. SALMON and Capt. GORDON BROWNING, asking them to assist you in seeing that the evident wrongs which have been done this boy are to some extent righted.

These letters and the evidence in the court-martial proceedings speak for themselves and give you a better idea of the matter than I can give.

Quite a number of ex-service men here have read this record, and all agree with me that a great injustice has been, and is being, done this boy.

Some time ago, without my knowledge, L. H. Armistead, an ex-service man, editor of the Review-Appeal, after reading this file, wrote a rather warm editorial in his paper; since this time quite a number of your friends here have been to see me about the matter, and I know that any relief that you can get for this boy will be greatly appreciated by the people of this county.

Yours very truly,

T. P. HENDERSON.

FRANKLIN, TENN., August 27, 1923.

Maj. FRANK H. DIXON,
United States Disciplinary Barracks, Alcatraz, Calif.

DEAR SIR: My friend John I. Forehand, of Primm, Tenn., route 2, has asked me to assist him in filling out blank relating to his brother Frank Forehand, now serving a sentence in the barracks there. This blank filled out and also a letter, too, from John I. Forehand are inclosed herewith.

I do not know Frank Forehand. I do know his brothers, John I. Forehand and Leroy Forehand, well. This family lives in the first district of this county, a poor farming section; they come from a family that is poor, not educated, but honest. Their grandfather served in the Union Army during the war; Leroy and John I. both walked in some 20 miles to enlist in a battery of field artillery which I recruited in June, 1917—Battery F, First Tennessee Field Artillery, afterwards One hundred and fourteenth Field Artillery—and both served with that organization, which I commanded from its muster into service, July 30, 1917, to its muster out of service, April 8, 1919, both being discharged as privates, first class. The records of these two brothers with me, as soldiers and as men, was excellent. Both were handicapped by the fact that they could not read or write; both learned to read and write while in the service. While not educated, both showed that they were honest, high-class men, who tried to and did do their duties.

Upon their discharge John I. married and has remained a small farmer in his section of the county; he is considered one of the best men in that section. Leroy reenlisted in Company H, Twenty-seventh Infantry, for one-year term, and served in Siberia; he afterwards transferred to Ninth Company, C. A. C., and is now serving in his third enlistment. I hear from him every few months; the last I heard he was a corporal. Their service with me included 10 months in France, and 3 months on the front, and as stated their records were excellent.

Another brother served during the war as a sergeant in the Sixth Regiment of Marines, and was wounded in France; he is now a first sergeant in some Infantry organization. Still another brother, Amos, who was too young to serve during the war, has enlisted since the war, and is a first-class private in the Coast Artillery. Frank, the other brother, you know about.

I mention these matters so that you may have some history of the family's record as soldiers. Something must be radically wrong for Frank, the youngest, to mar that record. I do not know Frank Forehand; I have inquired among those who do know him, and my information is that he was a good boy, quite a little morose at times, but honest, sober, and hard working; if, through bullheadedness, he slipped and got into trouble, it looks like something might be done to help him; the military record of this family should help him some.

On account of my relations with his brothers, I would appreciate it very much if you would write me fully about his cause, how and when he got into trouble, and what can be done at this end of the line to prevent a dishonorable discharge.

Yours truly,

T. P. HENDERSON,
Franklin, Tenn.

Subject: Sentence of Frank Forehand.

To: Hon. T. P. HENDERSON,
Franklin, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of August 27, 1923, re Frank Forehand, am inclosing copy of the court-martial order, and trust it will give the information you desire.

He becomes eligible for enrollment in the disciplinary battalion with a view of honorable restoration to duty October 9, 1923.

Failing to receive this his case will be considered with a view of clemency. Failing in this he will, with a maximum allowance of good-conduct time, be released June 9, 1924.

During the time he has been at these barracks his conduct has been excellent.

He is in good physical health and comfortably situated.

Assuring you of our continued interest in his welfare, I remain,

Very respectfully,

FRANK H. DIXON,
Major, Medical Corps, United States Army, Psychiatrist.

FRANKLIN, TENN., September 21, 1923.

Capt. GORDON BROWNING,
Huntingdon, Tenn.

DEAR GORDON: I do not like to worry you with matters outside of your congressional district, and would not now except for the fact that I believe you would know what to do better than the present Congressman from this district, who is not only brand new but who has never had any military experience.

Two of the best men in my battery were John I. and Leroy Forehand, brothers. Out of six Forehand brothers, five have served in the Army, four of them still being in the service. All, with the exception herein-after noted, have splendid records. Their grandfather had a splendid record in the Confederate Army.

About the last of August, 1923, I received notice that Frank Forehand (Ident. No. 6415584), private in Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, was serving a sentence at the United States disciplinary barracks at Alcatraz, Calif., for "desertion and failing to report for prison guard." This information coming to me from Maj. Frank H. Dixon, psychiatrist, of Alcatraz, Calif. The letter from Major Dixon asked information as to Frank Forehand. I replied to this letter, giving a full history of the family, referring to the splendid records made by his brothers and expressing surprise at Forehand being guilty of the offense charged, and asked more specific information.

I am inclosing you a copy of the general court-martial of this boy, which I received through the courtesy of Major Dixon. I am also inclosing a copy of the letter of Major Dixon.

I understand that the court-martial manual has been changed since our days; I understand the changes made were toward leniency, but I must confess that even in the days of Hard-boiled Smith I never heard of a soldier receiving the punishment Frank Forehand had meted out to him for the offense charged—that is, one day's absence and failing to report for prison guard, the punishment given by the court, and approved by General Read, being dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay, and confinement at hard labor for 18 months. Because of my relations with his brothers, Leroy and John I. Forehand, I am very much interested in this boy's case. I think it would be a shame and a disgrace to have such a sentence, or anything resembling it, carried out. I would have written to his company commander for more information, but I presumed the outfit was still in the Philippines. I do not want to raise any great disturbance, but I would appreciate it very much indeed if you would take this matter up with the proper authorities and see what the reason was for such a severe sentence and get it set aside. If you will do this for me, I will be under lasting obligations to you.

My recollection is that under the old court-martial manual—at least I know it was customary never to list a man as a deserter until he had been gone 10 days. Prior to that time he was A. W. O. L. and was subject to a summary court.

On the face of it this thing looks outrageous and has the earmarks of great dereliction of duty on the part of every officer who had anything to do with it, including the major general who approved it.

It is such conduct as this that is keeping the Army in bad repute with the politicians. You know that I and every other man who has commanded an organization knows that discipline must be had, but discipline does not mean the practices of the Spanish Inquisition. Every man is entitled to a fair deal, and the exercise of common sense on the part of those trying him, no matter what his offense.

I do not care to raise any great disturbance, but I do not want this boy, and the records the members of his family have made as soldiers, to be disgraced by such an unjust sentence.

I, of course, know nothing about why he was absent one day, or why he failed to report for prison guard; a fair inference would be that he was under arrest on the 10th day of March, 1923, and could not get there; no matter why, there can be no justification for the severe sentence.

If you will interest yourself in this matter at once and see that this boy gets relieved of this sentence, I will be under obligations.

Your friend,

T. P. HENDERSON,

HUNTINGDON, TENN., September 24, 1923.

Capt. T. P. HENDERSON,
Franklin, Tenn.

DEAR MR. TOM: I am in receipt of your letter of the 21st, and I shall take up the matter at once with the department and see if we can get this sentence modified. I agree with you that this has the appearance of being recklessly done. I will have my secretary go in person and find out all she can about it. I will not be there myself until the latter part of November, but hope to get something done before that time.

I wish we could get hold of the record which contains the proof in the case, and I shall try to do this and get it copied. As soon as I can get any information at all I will let you know. We must get him reinstated, and I will do it if I possibly can.

Assuring you of my highest personal regards and best wishes always, I am,

Sincerely your friend,

GORDON BROWNING.

HUNTINGDON, TENN., September 29, 1923.

Capt. TOM HENDERSON,
Franklin, Tenn.

DEAR MR. TOM: The Adjutant General's office at Washington has not absolutely promised a favorable action in the Forehand case before they take up the matter with his commanding officer. But they indicate that they will give you relief in the case, and you may be reassured that I am going to stay with them until something is done. I shall be glad to let you know of any developments in the case.

I had a letter from Colonel Lea, urging my attention to the matter; and, of course, his interest makes me additionally anxious.

Truly your friend,

GORDON BROWNING.

FRANKLIN, TENN., October 1, 1923.

Capt. GORDON BROWNING,
Huntingdon, Tenn.

DEAR GORDON: Replying to your letter of September 29 with regard to the Frank Forehand matter:

There are no new developments at this end of the line. At the time I wrote you I wrote a similar letter to Colonel Lea, sending him copies, etc., and he replied, showing a great interest in the matter. The colonel says that even in the days when it was a capital offense to wear the leggings wrapped up instead of down such punishment as was meted out to Forehand was unheard of. Why, even for wearing a sweater outside was not near so serious; and I well remember a case of Captain Amis, who was caught walking and leading his horse on the march up into Germany, and his punishment was nothing like Forehand received.

But, honestly, I am very much interested and outraged by this matter and appreciate all that you can do to get the boy out.

Our local paper, the Review-Appeal, whose editor was wounded in France, read over the file in the matter, and without my knowledge wrote the editorial which I mailed you. I do not see that that editorial can do any harm. I have mentioned the matter to a number of ex-service men and old soldiers, and none of them ever heard of anything that could class it or approximate it.

Let me know anything that we can do at this end of the line, and when you get the copy of the evidence I would like to go over it.

With best wishes, I am,

Your friend,

T. P. HENDERSON,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, September 29, 1923.

In reply refer to AG201 Forehand, Frank (9-26-24), prisoner.

Hon. GORDON BROWNING,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BROWNING: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of September 26, 1923, inclosing one from Captain Henderson, of Franklin, Tenn., and requesting clemency in behalf of Frank Forehand, a general prisoner confined at Pacific Branch, United States Disciplinary Barracks, Alcatraz, Calif.

This case will be investigated, with a view to the possible extension of clemency to Forehand, and as soon as a conclusion shall have been reached in the matter I will communicate with you further.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT C. DAVIS,
The Adjutant General.

HUNTINGDON, TENN., November 13, 1923.

Capt. T. P. HENDERSON,
Franklin, Tenn.

DEAR MR. TOM: Inclosed find a letter from The Adjutant General, which explains itself. I am starting to Washington Friday, and if you want me to push the matter further, please let me know.

Truly your friend,

GORDON BROWNING.

HUNTINGDON, TENN., October 16, 1923.

Capt. T. P. HENDERSON,
Franklin, Tenn.

DEAR MR. TOM: Inclosed find copy of the record in the Forehand case, together with letter from the Judge Advocate General. I have not yet received a ruling from the Adjutant General on the reduction of this sentence, but will let you know what he says within a short while. Let me know what you think of this proof.

Truly your friend,

GORDON BROWNING.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, October 16, 1923.

Hon. GORDON BROWNING,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BROWNING: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of October 2, with inclosure, through your secretary, relative to the case of Frank Forehand, formerly private, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry.

It is noted that you request a copy of the evidence in this case. It appears that Forehand did not request a copy of the record of trial, nor has such copy been furnished him. Therefore a copy of the record of trial is inclosed herewith.

With reference to the editorial to which you refer, it is unfortunate that such editorial comment should be made without full knowledge of all the facts. It was not the length of time Forehand was absent without leave, but the intent in so absenting himself that tends to prove his desertion. His intent was clearly expressed in his statement made to the investigating officer.

There were many convictions of desertion during the war in which a much more severe sentence was imposed. It is also true that trials had since 1919 for desertion in war time have been less severely punished than for some of the desertions in time of peace, but such leniency was more in the nature of an amnesty. Soldiers may be sentenced for as much as two years' confinement for desertion in time of peace.

In some of the foreign stations where soldiers become dissatisfied with their station and desert, and especially if there are many such, it becomes necessary to impose the maximum punishment to deter others and thus prevent depletion of men assigned to duty at such stations.

In this particular case, while the period of confinement was fixed at 18 months, the dishonorable discharge was suspended. In such case when the prisoner reached the United States disciplinary barracks a study is at once made of his case with a view of determining whether or not he should be restored to duty. If he is recommended by a board of officers, who have examined him for that purpose, that he be assigned to the disciplinary battalion, his ultimate restoration to duty depends largely upon his own efforts and conduct.

If it is desired to request clemency in Forehand's behalf, such application should be made to The Adjutant General, who has control of all soldiers in confinement in the disciplinary barracks, and gives such application first consideration.

Very truly yours,

W. A. BETHUEL,
Judge Advocate General.

CUARTEL DE ESPANA, MANILA, P. I.,

Tuesday, April 10, 1923.

The court met pursuant to the foregoing orders at 2 o'clock p. m.

Present: Maj. Henry B. Cheadle, Thirty-first Infantry; Capt. Frank H. Partridge, Thirty-first Infantry; Capt. Benjamin H. Hensley, Thirty-first Infantry; Capt. William E. M. Devers, Medical Corps; First Lieut. Edgar A. Jarman, Thirty-first Infantry; First Lieut. Howard E. Pulliam, Thirty-first Infantry; Second Lieut. John W. Childs, Service Company No. 10, Signal Corps; Capt. Clyde Kelly, Thirty-first Infantry, trial judge advocate; First Lieut. Earl T. McCullough, Thirty-first Infantry, assistant trial judge advocate.

Absent: Lieut. Col. Walter E. Gunster, Thirty-first Infantry, law member, having been transferred to the United States for duty; Maj. Wellborn Dent, Philippine Scouts, en route to the United States on leave of absence, by authority of Headquarters Philippine Department; Capt. Charles S. Ritchel, Thirty-first Infantry, on detached service at the target range, Fort William McKinley, Rizal, P. I., by order of Headquarters Philippine Department; Capt. James E. Allison, Thirty-first Infantry, having been transferred to the United States for duty; Capt. Karol B. Koslowski, Philippine Scouts, Headquarters Company, Twenty-fourth Infantry Brigade, en route to the United States on leave of absence, by authority of Headquarters Philippine Department; First Lieut. Gottfried W. Spoerry, Thirty-first Infantry, having been transferred to the Fifteenth Infantry, Tientsin, China, for duty; First Lieut. Louis B. Knight, Thirty-first Infantry, having been transferred to the United States for duty; First Lieut. John C. MacArthur, Thirty-first Infantry, having been transferred to the United States for duty; First Lieut. Warren C. Hamill, Thirty-first Infantry, having been transferred to the United States for discharge.

First Lieut. Albert G. Phillips, Thirty-first Infantry, defense counsel, on sick leave at Camp John Hay, Mountain Province, P. I., by authority of Headquarters Philippine Department.

First Lieut. Walter D. Buie, Thirty-first Infantry, assistant defense counsel, on detached service at the target range, Camp Eldridge, Laguna, P. I., by order of Headquarters Philippine Department.

The court proceeded to the trial of Pvt. Frank Forehand, Army Serial No. R-6415584, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, who, on appearing before the court, introduced Capt. Arvid P. Croonquist, Thirty-first Infantry, as his individual counsel, and stated, upon being asked by the trial judge advocate and by his individual counsel in open court, that he did not object to proceeding with the trial in the absence of First Lieut. Albert G. Phillips, Thirty-first Infantry, defense counsel, and First Lieut. Walter D. Buie, Thirty-first Infantry, assistant defense counsel.

J. N. Noon was sworn as reporter.

The accused was informed by the trial judge advocate of his right to demand a copy of the record of the trial, and was asked whether or not he desired a copy thereof, to which he replied in the negative.

The order appointing the court and the orders modifying the detail were read to the accused.

The trial judge advocate requested that any member of the court who had formed an opinion concerning the case or any of the material facts, or who for any other reason thought himself disqualified, or was aware of any facts which he believed might cause either party to desire to challenge him, so announce, in order that he might be excused or challenged; to which all the members of the court replied in the negative.

The trial judge advocate announced that the prosecution did not desire to challenge any member of the court, either for cause or peremptorily.

The accused was asked if he objected to being tried by any member present named in the order or modifying orders appointing the court, or desired to exercise his right to one peremptory challenge against any member (the law member being absent), to which, after being in open court advised of his right to do both or either, if he desired, he replied in the negative.

The members of the court, the trial judge advocate, and the assistant trial judge advocate were then sworn.

The accused was then arraigned upon the following charges and specifications:

Charge I: Violation of the fifty-eighth article of war.

Specification: In that Pvt. Frank Forehand, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, did, at Manila, P. I., on or about the 9th day of March, 1923, desert the service of the United States and did remain absent in desertion until he was apprehended at Manila, P. I., on or about the 10th day of March, 1923.

Charge II: Violation of the sixty-first article of war.

Specification: In that Pvt. Frank Forehand, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, did, at Manila, P. I., on or about the 10th day of March, 1923, fail to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place of assembly for prison guard.

C. S. RITCHIE,

Captain, Thirty-first Infantry.

AFFIDAVIT.

"Before me, the undersigned, authorized by law to administer oaths in cases of this character, personally appeared the above-named accused this 17th day of March, 1923, and made oath that he is a person subject to the military law and that he personally signed the foregoing charges and specifications and, further, that he has investigated the matters set forth in specifications 1, Charge I, 1, Charge II, and that the same are true in fact to the best of his knowledge and belief.

"G. S. MCCULLOUGH,

"Captain Thirty-first Infantry, Summary Court Officer."

FIRST INDORSEMENT.

"HEADQUARTERS PHILIPPINE DEPARTMENT,

"Referred for trial to Capt. Clyde Kelly, Thirty-first Infantry, trial judge advocate, general court martial, appointed by paragraph 7, Special Orders, No. 243, Headquarters Philippine Department, October 18, 1923.

"Employment of reporter is authorized for this case.

"By order of the department commander:

"EDWARD ROTH, JR.,

"Assistant Adjutant."

The accused then pleaded as follows:

To the specification, Charge I: Not guilty.

To Charge I: Not guilty.

To the specification, Charge II: Not guilty.

To Charge II: Not guilty.

The following paragraphs or parts of paragraphs of the Manual for Court-martial that set out the gist of each of the several offenses charged were read to the court by the trial judge advocate, to wit: The Fifty-eighth article of war, on page 342; Definitions and principles, on page 342; subheading A, on page 343; Analysis and proof, on page 344; Proof, on page 344; the Sixty-first article of war, on page 348; Definitions and principles, on page 348; Analysis and proof, on page 349; Proof, on page 349.

First Sergt. Ralph F. Cranford, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn and testified as follows:

Questions by prosecution:

Q. State your full name, rank, organization, and station.—A. Ralph F. Cranford, first sergeant, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, Cuartel de Espana, Manila.

Q. Do you know the accused in this case, Sergeant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Point him out and state his name.—A. (The witness indicating the accused.) Private Forehand, sir.

Q. Did the accused come to your attention in any way on or about the 10th day of March of this year?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what way was he brought to your attention at that time?—A. I was notified by the provost sergeant that he was absent from prison guard and to detail somebody in his place.

Q. Did you make a search of the quarters to see whether he was there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you find him?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was he authorized to be away from the company at any time that day?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you make a notation on the morning report of this man's absence?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why was not this notation made?—A. He was not absent long enough—he was not absent 24 hours.

Q. When did you next see the accused?—A. I saw the accused on the following day, March 11.

Q. Where did you see him then?—A. Under charge of the guard.

Q. Did he stand reveille on the morning of March 10?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why didn't he?—A. He was a member of the prison guard, and he wasn't required to stand reveille.

Q. Then he was really on duty at the guardhouse; is that the idea?—A. Yes, sir.

Cross-examination:

Questions by defense:

Q. At what time in the morning of the 10th did you hear that the accused was absent from his guard?—A. At or about 7 a. m.

Q. About 7 o'clock?—A. Yes, sir; a. m.

Q. As far as you know, he was present on the 9th for all his duties?—A. Yes, sir.

Examination by the court:

Q. At what time did he report for duty as a member of the prison guard?—A. At guard mount on the morning of the 9th.

Q. On the 9th?—A. Yes, sir; he mounted guard on the morning of the 9th.

Q. He was there at that time?—A. Yes, sir.

There being no further questions, the witness was excused and withdrew.

Sergt. Christopher Schmerfeld, Company G, Thirty-first Infantry, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn and testified as follows:

Questions by prosecution:

Q. State your full name, rank, organization, and station.—A. Christopher Schmerfeld, sergeant, Company G, Thirty-first Infantry, Estado Mayor, Manila.

Q. Do you know the accused in this case, Sergeant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Point him out and state his name.—A. [The witness indicating the accused] Private Forehand, of Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, sir.

Q. What are your duties at the post, sergeant?—A. Post provost sergeant, sir.

Q. As provost sergeant, what are your duties here?—A. My duties are to turn out the prisoners and send them to work—to turn them over to the sentry and turn them out to work; to do the proper work that they are detailed to do, sir.

Q. On or about the 9th day of March of this year, was the accused on duty with you in any way?—A. Yes, sir; on prison guard, sir.

Q. Did he mount guard in the regular manner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he present for duty during his entire tour of guard?—A. Not the entire tour; no, sir.

Q. When was he absent?—A. He was absent on the morning of the 10th, sir.

Q. At what time did you first find he was absent?—A. I found he was absent about 10 minutes to 7, sir.

Q. How did you come to find out that he was absent right at that time, Sergeant?—A. I checked the prison guard up and called the roll—called their names, sir.

Q. The accused had been on prison guard, though, the day before?—A. On prison guard that tour of duty; yes, sir.

Q. And his tour ends ordinarily at what time?—A. At 11.30, sir; at guard mount.

Q. Did you look around the guardhouse to see whether he was there or not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you find him?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether or not the accused was excused from this duty?—A. I went to the company to find out, sir, and they told me the man was absent.

Q. Did you see him at any time after that, Sergeant?—A. Not until he was confined.

Q. What time was this?—A. That was the morning of the 11th, sir.

Q. About what time in the morning was it that you saw him?—A. When I turned the prisoners out to go to work, sir.

Q. He came out of the guardhouse then; is that it?—A. Yes, sir.

Cross-examination.

Questions by defense:

Q. As far as you were concerned, Sergeant, the man was absent on that date?—A. He was absent on the morning of the 10th, sir, from prison guard.

There being no further questions, the witness was excused and withdrew.

Sergt. George H. Barrett, Company F, Thirty-first Infantry, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn and testified as follows:

Questions by prosecution:

Q. State your full name, rank, organization, and station.—A. Sergt. George H. Barrett, Company F, Thirty-first Infantry, Estado Mayor, Manila.

Q. Do you know the accused in this case?—A. I do, sir.
 Q. Will you point him out and state his name?—A. (The witness indicating the accused.) Private Forehand, sir.
 Q. What are your duties here in the post, Sergeant?—A. Provost guard, sir.
 Q. Did you see the accused on or about the 10th day of March of this year?—A. I did, sir; I arrested the accused between 8 and 9 p. m. on the 10th, sir.
 Q. Where did you see him then?—A. Near the piers in the port area.
 Q. How was the accused dressed when you found him?—A. He was in uniform, sir.
 Q. You say he was in uniform?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. What led you to arrest the man?—A. There was an alarm out stating that the man was A. W. O. L., sir—absent without leave.
 Q. What did you do with him after you arrested him?—A. I brought him up to the Cuartel and confined him immediately, sir.

Cross-examination:

Questions by defense:

Q. Sergeant, you said near the piers; how near the piers?—A. Less than 100 yards, sir.
 Q. Which way were they going?—A. They were standing near the water fountain across the street from the piers, sir.
 Q. Across the street from the piers, at the water fountain?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What were they doing there?—A. They had evidently been taking a drink, sir.

Q. A drink of water?—A. Yes, sir.

Examination by the court:

Q. At the time you apprehended the accused, did he make any statement to you?—A. He did not, sir.

Q. How was the accused as to sobriety?—A. He was sober, sir.

There being no further questions, the witness was excused and withdrew.

Maj. C. T. Alden, Philippine Scouts, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn and testified as follows:

Questions by prosecution:

Q. State your name, rank, organization, and station.—A. Maj. C. T. Alden, Philippine Scouts, post of Manila, P. I.

Q. Do you know the accused in this case?—A. I remember his face, but I am not sure of his name.

Q. Do you recall seeing the accused before?—A. I do; the accused was before me when I was investigating charges of desertion against him.

Q. Did the accused make any statement at that time?—A. He did.

Q. Was the accused warned as to his rights before making any such statement?—A. He was.

Q. Can you give the substance of the warning that was given the accused?—A. He was warned that it was not necessary for him to make any statement unless he wished to; but that if he did, anything he said could be used for or against him, and that anything he said must be free and voluntary on his part, without hope of reward or immunity.

Q. Did the accused understand the warning that was given him?—A. He stated that he did.

Q. After this warning was given the accused, Major, what did the accused have to say in regard to his offense?—A. I can't recall that entirely; I know that he stated that he had had quite a hard time, being in the hospital, being treated for syphilis, I believe; that when he got out of the hospital he was horribly disgusted with the islands and the service; that he was dissatisfied with his immediate company commander, for the reason that he seemed to expect him to do things that were utterly impossible to do—or words to that effect—and that he had made up his mind to go away and not come back—as near as I can remember.

Q. You are sure that he did state, though, that he did not intend to return—that he was going away and didn't intend to come back?—A. Yes; as near as I can remember.

Q. Did he state any of the things which he considered it impossible to do in his company?—A. No; he didn't; I didn't ask him.

The defense declined to cross-examine the witness.

There being no further questions, the witness was excused and withdrew.

PROSECUTION. The prosecution rests.

DEFENSE. The defense has no witness to present. The accused does not desire to make any statement or to take the stand as a witness.

PRESIDENT. Private Forehand, it is my duty to warn you, before the court reaches its findings, that you have the right, as to each specification, first, to remain silent, in which case no inference adverse to you—that is, against you—can be drawn from such silence; second, to testify under oath as a witness, in which case you will be subject to cross-examination upon the subject matter of your direct examination or upon any matter bearing thereon; or, third, to make a statement, oral or written, not under oath, in denial or in defense, or in excuse or mitigation, and the court will give your statement such weight and value as the court believe it is entitled to. Do you understand what I have said to you?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. Knowing this, which course do you wish to take?

ACCUSED. I wish to remain silent, sir.

DEFENSE. The defense rests.

PROSECUTION. Before closing I wish to call the attention of the court to the fact that the best evidence of a man's intentions are what he has to say about them, and that that is about the only way in which anybody else can arrive at a conclusion as to a man's intentions at the time he leaves or after he has gone. The accused has stated before the investigating officer that he did not intend to return when he left, which constitutes desertion.

DEFENSE. The defense submits the case without argument.

The court was closed, and upon secret written ballots, two-thirds of the members present at the time the vote was taken concurring in each finding of guilty, finds the accused:

Of the specification, charge 1, guilty.

Of charge 1, guilty.

Of the specification, charge 2, guilty.

Of charge 2, guilty.

The court was opened, and the trial judge advocate stated in the presence of the accused and his counsel that he had no evidence of previous convictions to submit.

Thereupon the trial judge advocate read to the accused the statement of accused's service, as shown on the charge sheet, and asked him whether it was correct, and whether he had any statement or correction to make concerning it, to which the accused answered that it was correct, and that he had no statement or correction to make concerning it.

The court was closed, and upon secret written ballot sentences the accused to be dishonorably discharged from the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for two years, two-thirds of the members present at the time the vote was taken concurring.

The court was opened, and in the presence of the accused and his counsel the president announced the findings and sentence in open court, and announced further that the court desired it to appear in the record that paragraph 66 of the Manual for Courts-Martial had been complied with, in that punishment had been imposed only in regard to the most important aspect of the charges as drawn.

The court then, at 2.55 o'clock p. m., proceeded to other business.

HENRY B. CHEADLE,

Major, Thirty-first Infantry, President.

CLYDE KELLY,

Captain, Thirty-first Infantry, Trial Judge Advocate.

HEADQUARTERS PHILIPPINE DEPARTMENT.

Manila, P. I., April 12, 1924.

In the foregoing case of Pvt. Frank Forehand, Company C, Thirty-first Infantry, the sentence is approved, but that portion of the same which adjudges confinement at hard labor in excess of 18 months is remitted. As thus mitigated, the sentence will be duly executed, the execution of that portion thereof adjudging dishonorable discharge is suspended until the soldier's release from confinement. The Pacific Branch, United States Disciplinary Barracks, Alcatraz, Calif., is designated as the place of confinement. The soldier will be sent under proper guard to Fort Mills, Corregidor Island, for confinement until further orders.

G. W. READ,

Major General, United States Army, Commanding.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am perfectly willing. Before the Senator suggests the absence of a quorum, however, I simply desire to remark—it may be impertinent of me, and perhaps I am not calling attention to anything that is new—that we have sat here for an hour and 20 minutes with a motion pending, and we have not discussed it one second.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bruce	Curtis	Fess
Ashurst	Bursum	Dale	Fletcher
Borah	Cameron	Dial	Frazier
Brandegee	Capper	Dill	George
Brookhart	Caraway	Edwards	Gerry
Broussard	Copeland	Ferris	Glas

Gooding	Ladd	Pepper	Smith
Hale	Lodge	Phipps	Smoot
Harris	McKellar	Pittman	Stephens
Harrison	McNary	Ralston	Swanson
Heflin	Mayfield	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Howell	Moses	Reed, Pa.	Walsh, Mass.
Johnson, Minn.	Neely	Sheppard	Warren
Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Shields	Willis
King	Overman	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the Senate take up for consideration Senate Joint Resolution No. 4.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ADAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair for the day with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. As I do not know how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. He is absent; but I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote, so I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STELLING], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. I was requested by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to announce that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], and that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], which I transfer to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY];

The junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARBOLD] with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Moses	Shortridge
Borah	George	Overman	Smith
Brandegee	Harris	Pepper	Smoot
Broussard	Harrison	Phipps	Stephens
Bruce	Heflin	Ralston	Swanson
Caraway	King	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Copeland	Lodge	Reed, Pa.	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	McKellar	Sheppard	Warren
Ferris	Mayfield	Shields

NAYS—23.

Brookhart	Dill	Hale	Neely
Bursum	Edwards	Howell	Oddie
Cameron	Fess	Johnson, Minn.	Pittman

Edge	Keyes	Robinson	Weiler
Elkins	La Follette	Shipstead	Wheeler
Ernst	Lenroot	Simmons
Fernald	McCormick	Spencer

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

BRIGHT ANGEL TOLL ROAD AND TRAIL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York to allow the unfinished business to be temporarily laid aside, so the Chair may lay before the Senate the action of the House on Senate amendment No. 47 to the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to temporarily laying aside the joint resolution for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the action of the House on the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,

March 13, 1924.

Resolved, That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 47, and concurs therein with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert: "For the construction of trails within the Grand Canyon National Park $100,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That said sum may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase from the county of Coconino, Ariz., of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within said park under such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct an approach road from the National Old Trails Highway to the south boundary of said park."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 19, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

AVOIDANCE OF CONFLICTS BETWEEN AMERICAN STATES.

In executive session this day the following treaty was ratified, and, on motion of Mr. Lodge, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith, authenticated by the Chilean Ministry for Foreign Affairs, which is the depositary of the original, a copy of a treaty to avoid or prevent conflicts between the American States, signed at Santiago, Chile, on May 5, 1923, by the delegates of the United States and of the other Governments represented at the Fifth International Conference of American States.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 31, 1924.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, an authenticated copy each of the English, Spanish, Portuguese, and French texts of a treaty to avoid or prevent conflicts between the American States, signed at Santiago, Chile, on May 5, 1923, by the delegates of the United States and of the other Governments represented at the Fifth International Conference of American States.

The treaty was signed in one original, which is deposited in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Chile, by which the authenticated copies of the four texts herewith submitted were furnished.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, January 30, 1924.

FIFTH INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN STATES.

TREATY TO AVOID OR PREVENT CONFLICTS BETWEEN THE AMERICAN STATES.

The Governments represented at the Fifth International Conference of American States, desiring to strengthen progressively the principles of justice and of mutual respect which inspire the policy observed by them in their reciprocal relations, and to quicken in their peoples sentiments of concord and of loyal friendship which may contribute toward the consolidation of such relations.

Confirm their most sincere desire to maintain an immutable peace, not only between themselves but also with all the other nations of the earth;

Condemn armed peace which increases military and naval forces beyond the necessities of domestic security and the sovereignty and independence of States; and

With the firm purpose of taking all measures which will avoid or prevent the conflicts which may eventually occur between them, agree to the present treaty, negotiated and concluded by the plenipotentiary delegates whose full powers were found to be in good and due form by the conference:

Venezuela: César Zumeta, José Austria.

Panamá: José Lefevre.

United States of America: Henry P. Fletcher, Frank B. Kellogg, Atlee Pomerene, Willard Saulsbury, George E. Vincent, Frank C. Partridge, William Eric Fowler, Leo S. Rowe.

Uruguay: Eugenio Martínez Thedy.

Ecuador: José Rafael Bustamante.

Chile: Manuel Rivas Vicuña, Carlos Aldunate Solar, Luis Barros Borgoño, Emilio Bello Codesido, Antonio Huneeus, Alcibiades Roldán, Guillermo Subercaseaux, Alejandro del Río.

Guatemala: Eduardo Poirier, Máximo Soto Hall.

Nicaragua: Carlos Cuadra Pasos, Arturo Elizondo.

United States of Brazil: Afranio de Mello Franco, Sylvino Gurgel do Amaral, Hello Lobo.

Colombia: Guillermo Valencia.

Cuba: José C. Vidal Caro, Carlos García Velez, Arístides Agüero, Manuel Márquez Sterling.

Paraguay: Manuel Gondra.

Dominican Republic: Tulio M. Cestero.

Honduras: Benjamín Villaseca Mujica.

Argentina: Manuel E. Malbrán.

Haiti: Arturo Rameau.

ARTICLE I.

All controversies which for any cause whatsoever may arise between two or more of the high contracting parties and which it has been impossible to settle through diplomatic channels, or to submit to arbitration in accordance with existing treaties, shall be submitted for investigation and report to a commission to be established in the manner provided for in Article IV. The high contracting parties undertake, in case of disputes, not to begin mobilization or concentration of troops on the frontier of the other party, nor to engage in any hostile acts or preparations for hostilities, from the time steps are taken to convene the commission until the said commission has rendered its report, or until the expiration of the time provided for in Article VII.

This provision shall not abrogate nor limit the obligations contained in treaties of arbitration in force between two or more of the high contracting parties, nor the obligations arising out of them.

It is understood that in disputes arising between nations which have no general treaties of arbitration the investigation shall not take place in questions affecting constitutional provisions, nor in questions already settled by other treaties.

ARTICLE II.

The controversies referred to in Article I shall be submitted to the commission of inquiry whenever it has been impossible to settle them through diplomatic negotiations or procedure or by submission to arbitration, or in cases in which the circumstances of fact render all negotiations impossible and there is imminent danger of an armed conflict between the parties. Any one of the Governments directly interested in the investigation of the facts giving rise to the controversy may apply for the convocation of the commission of inquiry, and to this end it shall be necessary only to communicate officially this decision to the other party and to one of the permanent commissions established by Article III.

ARTICLE III.

Two commissions to be designated as permanent shall be established with their seats at Washington (United States of America) and at Montevideo (Uruguay). They shall be composed of the three American diplomatic agents longest accredited in said capitals, and at the call of the foreign offices of those States they shall organize, appointing their respective chairmen. Their functions shall be limited to receiving from the interested parties the request for a convocation of the commission of inquiry and to notify the other party thereof immediately. The Government requesting the convocation shall appoint at the same time the persons who shall compose the commission of inquiry in representation of that Government, and the other party shall likewise, as soon as it receives notification, designate its members.

The party initiating the procedure established by this treaty may address itself, in doing so, to the permanent commission which it considers most efficacious for a rapid organization of the commission of inquiry. Once the request for convocation has been received and the permanent commission has made the respective notifications, the question or controversy existing between the parties and as to which no agreement has been reached will ipso facto be suspended.

ARTICLE IV.

The commission of inquiry shall be composed of five members, all nationals of American States, appointed in the following manner: Each Government shall appoint two at the time of convocation, only one of whom may be a national of its country. The fifth shall be chosen by common accord by those already appointed and shall perform the duties of president. However, a citizen of a nation already represented on the commission may not be elected. Any of the Governments may refuse to accept the elected member, for reasons which it may reserve to itself, and in such event a substitute shall be appointed, with the mutual consent of the parties, within 30 days following the notification of this refusal. In the failure of such agreement, the designation shall be made by the President of an American Republic not interested in the dispute, who shall be selected by lot by the commissioners already appointed from a list of not more than six American Presidents, to be formed as follows: Each Government party to the controversy, or if there are more than two Governments directly interested in the dispute, the Government or Governments on each side of the controversy shall designate three Presidents of American States which maintain the same friendly relations with all the parties to the dispute.

Whenever there are more than two Governments directly interested in a controversy, and the interest of two or more of them are identical, the Government or Governments on each side of the controversy shall have the right to increase the number of their commissioners, as far as it may be necessary, so that both sides in the dispute may always have equal representation on the commission.

Once the commission has been thus organized in the capital city, seat of the permanent commission which issued the order of convocation, it shall notify the respective Governments of the date of its inauguration, and it may then determine upon the place or places in which it will function, taking into account the greater facilities for investigation.

The commission of inquiry shall itself establish its rules of procedure. In this regard there are recommended for incorporation into said rules of procedure the provisions contained in articles 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of the convention signed in Washington, February, 1923, between the Government of the United States of America and the Governments of the Republics of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, which appear in the appendix of this treaty.

Its decisions and final report shall be agreed to by the majority of its members.

Each party shall bear its own expenses and a proportionate share of the general expenses of the commission.

ARTICLE V.

The parties to the controversy shall furnish the antecedents and data necessary for the investigation. The commission shall render its report within one year from the date of its inauguration. If it has been impossible to finish the investigation or draft the report within the period agreed upon, it may be extended six months beyond the period established, provided the parties to the controversy are in agreement upon this point.

ARTICLE VI.

The findings of the commission will be considered as reports upon the disputes which were the subjects of the investigation, but will not have the value or force of judicial decisions or arbitral awards.

ARTICLE VII.

Once the report is in possession of the Governments parties to the dispute, six months' time will be available for renewed negotiations in order to bring about a settlement of the difficulty, in view of the findings of said report; and if during this new term they should be unable to reach a friendly arrangement, the parties in dispute shall recover entire liberty of action to proceed as their interests may dictate in the question dealt with in the investigation.

ARTICLE VIII.

The present treaty does not abrogate analogous conventions which may exist or may in the future exist between two or more of the high contracting parties; neither does it partially abrogate any of their provisions, although they may provide special circumstances or conditions differing from those herein stipulated.

ARTICLE IX.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in conformity with their respective constitutional procedures, and the ratifications shall be deposited in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Chile, which will communicate them through diplomatic channels to the other signatory governments, and it shall enter into effect for the contracting parties in the order of ratification.

The treaty shall remain in force indefinitely; any of the high contracting parties may denounce it and the denunciation shall take effect as regards the party denouncing one year after notification thereof has been given.

Notice of the denunciation shall be sent to the Government of Chile, which will transmit it for appropriate action to the other signatory governments.

ARTICLE X.

The American States which have not been represented in the fifth conference may adhere to the present treaty, transmitting the official documents setting forth such adherence to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Chile, which will communicate it to the other contracting parties.

In witness whereof the plenipotentiaries and delegates sign this convention in Spanish, English, Portuguese, and French and affix the seal of the Fifth International Conference of American States, in the city of Santiago, Chile, on the 3d day of May in the year 1923.

This convention shall be filed in the ministry for foreign affairs of the Republic of Chile in order that certified copies thereof may be forwarded through diplomatic channels to each of the signatory States.

(Signed) For Venezuela: C. Zumeta, José Austria; for Panama: J. E. Lefevre; for the United States of America: Henry P. Fletcher, Frank B. Kellogg, Atlee Pomerene, Willard Saulsbury, George E. Vincent, Frank C. Partridge, William Eric Fowler, L. S. Rowe; for Uruguay: Eugenio Martínez Thedy, with reservations relative to the provisions of article 1 (first) in so far as they exclude from the investigation questions that affect constitutional provisions; for Ecuador: José Rafael Bustamante; for Chile: Manuel Rivas Vicuña, Carlos Aldunate S., L. Barros B., Emilio Bello C., Antonio Huneeus, Alcibiades Roldán, Guillermo Subercaseaux, Alejandro del Río; for Guatemala: Eduardo Poirer, Máximo Soto Hall; for Nicaragua: Carlos Cuadra Pasos, Arturo Elizondo; for the United States of Brazil: Afranio de Mello Franco, S. Gurgel do Amaral, Helió Lobo; for Colombia: Guillermo Valencia; for Cuba: J. C. Vidal Caro, Carlos García Velez, A. de Agüero, M. Márquez Sterling; for Paraguay: M. Gondra; for the Dominican Republic: Tulio M. Cestero; for Honduras: Benjamin Villaseca M.; for the Argentine Republic: Manuel E. Malbrán; for Haiti: Arthur Rameau.

APPENDIX.

ARTICLE I.

The signatory governments grant to all the commissions which may be constituted the power to summon witnesses, to administer oaths, and to receive evidence and testimony.

ARTICLE II.

During the investigation the parties shall be heard and may have the right to be represented by one or more agents and counsel.

ARTICLE III.

All members of the commission shall take oath duly and faithfully to discharge their duties before the highest judicial authority of the place where it may meet.

ARTICLE IV.

The inquiry shall be conducted so that both parties shall be heard. Consequently, the commission shall notify each party of the statements of facts submitted by the other, and shall fix periods of time in which to receive evidence.

Once the parties are notified, the commission shall proceed to the investigation, even though they fail to appear.

ARTICLE V.

As soon as the commission of inquiry is organized it shall, at the request of any of the parties to the dispute, have the right to fix the status in which the parties must remain, in order that the situation may not be aggravated and matters may remain in statu quo pending the rendering of the report by the commission.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William A. Lambeth offered the following prayer:

Our Father, at the mention of Thy holy name, our heads and our hearts are bowed in the stillness of reverent worship, and our inner ears become alert in the hope of hearing the sound of Thy voice within ourselves. We know that Thou art in heaven and on earth, but we need just now most a consciousness of Thy presence in our human hearts. We come also this day to dedicate whatever of power and whatever of influence which Thou hast intrusted to us to the higher interests of our beloved land. We believe that when we consecrate our power and our influence to the higher interests of our country, we are at the same time also serving the interests of the kingdom of God. These things we pray in the spirit of Him who believed that some day Thy kingdom shall prevail on this planet, Thy Son, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The order of business to-day is the Consent Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

ESTABLISHING LENGTH OF RURAL POSTAL ROUTES.

The first bill on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4448) authorizing establishment of rural routes of from 80 to 75 miles in length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to establish motor vehicle rural routes of not less than 80 miles nor of more than 75 miles in length, carriers serving such routes who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles to receive compensation of not less than $2,160 and not more than $2,600 per annum, to be based upon the length of the routes, in accordance with a schedule of compensation to be fixed by the Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I have a right, as I understand it, Mr. Speaker, to know what is going on in the House. I do not know what this bill is and I listened attentively and respectfully. I have no opportunity to know because of the confusion. I am not blaming the Speaker. He is always courteous and kind, but I am blaming the system under the terms of which we transact business here without giving the membership an opportunity to understand what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will wait until order is restored. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to cast a no vote there, if I had a chance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had that opportunity.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I did not know what it was, and when I do not know I am going to vote no.

The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 7059) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I.—DEFINITIONS.

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "World War Adjusted compensation act."

SEC. 2. As used in this act—

(a) The term "veteran" includes any individual, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States at any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918; but does not include (1) any individual at any time during such period or thereafter separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions, (2) any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform, or (3) any alien at any time during such period or thereafter discharged from the military or naval forces on account of his alienage;

(b) The term "oversea service" means service on shore in Europe or Asia, exclusive of China, Japan, and the Philippine Islands; and service afloat, not on receiving ships; including in either case the period from the date of embarkation for such service to the date of disembarkation on return from such service, both dates inclusive;

(c) The term "home service" means all service not oversea service;

(d) The term "adjusted service credit" means the amount of the credit computed under the provisions of Title II; and

(e) The term "person" includes a partnership, corporation, or association, as well as an individual.

TITLE II.—ADJUSTED SERVICE CREDIT.

SEC. 201. The amount of adjusted service credit shall be computed by allowing the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1918, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of oversea service, and $1 for each day of home service; but the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no oversea service shall not exceed $500, and the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed a. oversea service shall not exceed $625.

SEC. 202. In computing the adjusted service credit no allowance shall be made to—

(a) Any commissioned officer above the grade of captain in the Army or Marine Corps, lieutenant in the Navy, first lieutenant or first lieutenant of engineers in the Coast Guard, or passed assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service, or having the pay and allowances, if not the rank, of any officer superior in rank to any of such grades—in each case for the period of service as such;

(b) Any individual holding a permanent or provisional commission or permanent or acting warrant in any branch of the military or naval forces, or (while holding such commission or warrant) serving under a temporary commission in a higher grade—in each case for the period of service under such commission or warrant or in such higher grade after the accrual of the right to pay thereunder. This subdivision shall not apply to any noncommissioned officer;

(c) Any civilian officer or employee of any branch of the military or naval forces, contract surgeon, cadet of the United States Military Academy, midshipman, cadet of the Coast Guard, member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, member of the Students' Army Training Corps (except an enlisted man detailed thereto), Philippine Scout, member of the Philippine Guard, member of the Philippine Constabulary, member of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, member of the National Guard of Hawaii, member of the insular force of the Navy, member of the Samoan native guard and band of the Navy, Indian scout, female yeoman of the Navy, or female marine of the Marine Corps—in each case for the period of service as such;

(d) Any individual entering the military or naval forces after November 11, 1918—for any period after such entrance;

(e) Any commissioned or warrant officer performing home service not with troops and receiving commutation of quarters or of subsistence—for the period of such service;

(f) Any member of the Public Health Service—for any period during which he was not detailed for duty with the Army or the Navy;

(g) Any individual granted a farm, or industrial furlough—for the period of such furlough; or

(h) Any individual detailed for work on roads or other construction or repair work—for the period during which his pay was equalized to conform to the compensation paid to civilian employees in the same or like employment, pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919.

SEC. 203. (a) The periods referred to in subdivision (e) of section 202 may be included in the case of any individual if and to the extent that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy jointly find that such service subjected such individual to exceptional hazard. A full statement of all action under this subdivision shall be included in the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy required by section 307.

(b) In computing the credit to any veteran under this title effect shall be given to all subdivisions of section 202 which are applicable.

(c) If part of the service is oversea service and part is home service, the home service shall first be used in computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 201.

(d) For the purpose of computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 201, any period of service after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, in the military or naval forces in any capacity may be included, notwithstanding allowance of credit for such period, or a part thereof, is prohibited under the provisions of section 202, except that the periods referred to in subdivisions (b), (c), and (d) of that section shall not be included.

(e) For the purposes of section 201, in the case of members of the National Guard or of the National Guard Reserve called into service by the proclamation of the President dated July 3, 1917, the time of service between the date of call into the service as specified in such proclamation and August 5, 1917, both dates inclusive, shall be deemed to be active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

TITLE III.—GENERAL PROVISIONS.

BENEFITS GRANTED VETERANS.

SEC. 301. Each veteran shall be entitled:

(1) To receive "adjusted service pay" as provided in Title IV, if the amount of his adjusted service credit is $50 or less;

(2) To receive an "adjusted service certificate" as provided in Title V, if the amount of his adjusted service credit is more than $50.

APPLICATION BY VETERAN.

SEC. 302. (a) A veteran may receive the benefits to which he is entitled by filing an application claiming the benefits of this act with the Secretary of War, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; or with the Secretary of the Navy, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

(b) Such application shall be made on or before January 1, 1928, and if not made on or before such date shall be held void.

(c) An application shall be made (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe. An application made by a representative other than one authorized by any such regulation shall be held void.

(d) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly make any regulations necessary to the efficient administration of the provisions of this section.

PROOF OF RIGHT TO ADJUSTED SERVICE CERTIFICATE.

SEC. 303. (a) As soon as practicable after the receipt of a valid application the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, shall transmit to the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, if the veteran is entitled to an "adjusted service certificate," the application and a certificate setting forth—

- (1) That the applicant is a veteran;
 - (2) His name and address;
 - (3) The date and place of his birth;
 - (4) That he is entitled to an adjusted service certificate; and
 - (5) The amount of his adjusted service credit.
- (b) Upon receipt of such certificate the director shall proceed to extend to the veteran the benefits provided for in Title V.

PUBLICITY.

SEC. 304. (a) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall, as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act, jointly prepare and publish a pamphlet or pamphlets containing a digest and explanation of the provisions of this act; and shall from time to time thereafter jointly prepare and publish such additional or supplementary information as may be found necessary.

(b) The Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau shall transmit to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act full information and explanations as to the matters of which such officer has charge, which shall be considered by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in preparing the publications referred to in subdivision (a).

(c) The publications provided for in subdivision (a) shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may determine to be most effective to inform veterans of their rights under this act.

STATISTICS.

SEC. 305. Immediately upon the enactment of this act the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall ascertain the individuals who are veterans as defined in section 2, and, as to each veteran, the number of days of overseas service and of home service, as defined in section 2, for which he is entitled to receive adjusted service credit, and their findings shall not be subject to review by the General Accounting Office, and payments made by disbursing officers of the War and Navy Departments made in accordance with such findings shall be passed to their credit.

ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATIONS.

SEC. 306. Any officer charged with any function under this act shall make such regulations not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary to the efficient administration of such function.

REPORTS.

SEC. 307. Any officer charged with the administration of any part of this act shall make a full report to Congress on the first Monday of December of each year as to his administration thereof.

EXEMPTION FROM ATTACHMENT AND TAXATION.

SEC. 308. No sum payable under this act to a veteran or to his estate, or to any beneficiary named under Title V, no adjusted service certificate, and no proceeds of any loan made on such certificate, shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process or to National or State taxation.

UNLAWFUL FEES.

SEC. 309. Any person who charges or collects, or attempts to charge or collect, either directly or indirectly, any fee or other compensation for assisting in any manner a veteran in obtaining any of the benefits, privileges, or loans to which he is entitled under the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

TITLE IV.—ADJUSTED SERVICE PAY.

SEC. 401. There shall be paid to each veteran (as soon as practicable after receipt of an application in accordance with the provisions of section 302, but not before the expiration of nine months after the enactment of this act) and in addition to any other amounts due him in pursuance of law the amount of his adjusted service credit if, and only if, such credit is not more than $50.

SEC. 402. Payments shall be made by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, dependent upon whether the veteran's service for which he is entitled to receive adjusted service pay was with the military forces or with the naval forces. If such service of the veteran was in both forces, he shall be paid by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy according to the force in which he first served during the compensable period.

SEC. 403. No right to adjusted service pay under the provisions of this title shall be assignable or serve as security for any loan. Any assignment or loan made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be held void. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall not pay the amount of adjusted service pay to any person other than the veteran or such representative of the veteran as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe.

TITLE V.—ADJUSTED SERVICE CERTIFICATES.

SEC. 501. The Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Director"), upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 303, is hereby directed to issue without cost to the veteran designated therein a nonparticipating adjusted service certificate (hereinafter in this title referred to as a "certificate") of a face value equal to the amount of 20-year endowment insurance that the amount of his adjusted service credit increased by 25 per cent would purchase, at his age on his birthday nearest the date of the certificate, if applied as a net single premium, calculated in accordance with accepted actuarial principles and based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually. The certificate shall be dated, and all rights conferred under the provisions of this title shall take effect, as of the last day of the month in which the application is filed, but in no case before January 1, 1925. The veteran shall name the beneficiary of the certificate and may from time to time, with the approval of the Director, change such beneficiary. The amount of the face value of the certificate (except as provided in subdivisions (c), (d), (e), and (f) of section 502) shall be payable out of the fund created by section 503 (1) to the veteran 20 years after the date of the certificate, or (2) upon the death of the veteran prior to the expiration of such 20-year period, to the beneficiary named; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, the amount of the face value of the certificate shall be paid to the estate of the veteran. If the veteran dies after making application under section 302, but before January 1, 1925, then the amount of the face value of the certificate shall be paid in the same manner as if his death had occurred after January 1, 1925.

LOAN PRIVILEGES.

SEC. 502. (a) A loan may be made to a veteran upon his adjusted service certificate only in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(b) Any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia (hereinafter in this section called "bank"), is authorized, after the expiration of two years after the date of the certificate, to loan to any veteran upon his promissory note secured by his adjusted service certificate (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof) any amount not in excess of the loan basis (as defined in subdivision (g) of this section) of the certificate. The rate of interest charged upon the loan by the bank shall not exceed, by more than 2 per cent per annum, the rate charged at the date of the loan for the discount of commercial paper under section 13 of the Federal reserve act by the Federal reserve bank for the Federal reserve district in which the bank is located. Any bank holding a note for a loan under this section secured by a certificate (whether the bank originally making the loan or a bank to which the note and certificate have been transferred) may sell the note to, or discount or rediscount it with, any bank authorized to make a loan to a veteran under this section and transfer the certificate to such bank. Upon the indorsement of any bank and subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, any such note secured by a certificate and held by a bank shall be eligible for discount or rediscount by the Federal reserve bank for the Federal reserve district in which the bank is located. Such note shall be eligible for discount or rediscount whether or not the bank is a member of the Federal reserve system and whether or not it acquired the note in the first instance or acquired it by transfer upon the indorsement of any other bank. Such note shall not be eligible for discount or rediscount unless it has at the time of discount or rediscount a maturity not in excess of nine months exclusive of days of grace. The rate of interest charged by the Federal reserve bank shall be the same as that charged by it for the discount or rediscount of notes drawn for commercial purposes. Any such note secured by a certificate may be offered as collateral security for the issuance of Federal reserve notes under the provisions of section 16 of the Federal reserve act. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized to permit a Federal reserve bank to rediscount, for any other Federal reserve bank, notes secured by a certificate. The rate of interest for such rediscounts shall be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board. In case the note is sold the bank making the sale shall promptly notify the veteran by mail at his last known post-office address.

(c) If the veteran does not pay the principal and interest of the loan upon its maturity, the bank holding the note and certificate may, after the expiration of six months after the loan was made, present them to the director. The director may, in his discretion, accept the certificate and note, cancel the note (but not the certificate), and pay the bank, in full satisfaction of its claim, the amount of the unpaid principal due it, and the unpaid interest accrued, at the rate fixed in the note, up to the date of the check issued to the bank. The director shall restore to the veteran, at any time prior to its maturity, any certificate so accepted, upon receipt from him of an amount equal to the sum of (1) the amount paid by the United States to the bank in cancellation of his note, plus (2) interest on such amount from the time of such payment to the date of such receipt, at 6 per cent per annum, compounded annually.

(d) If the veteran fails to redeem his certificate from the director before its maturity, or before the death of the veteran, the director shall deduct from the face value of the certificate (as determined in section 501) an amount equal to the sum of (1) the amount paid by the United States to the bank on account of the note of the veteran, plus (2) interest on such amount from the time of such payment to the date of maturity of the certificate or of the death of the veteran, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, compounded annually, and shall pay the remainder in accordance with the provisions of section 501.

(e) If the veteran dies before the maturity of the loan, the amount of the unpaid principal and the unpaid interest accrued up to the date of his death shall be immediately due and payable. In such case, or if the veteran dies on the day the loan matures or within six months thereafter, the bank holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice of the death, present them to the director, who shall thereupon cancel the note (but not the certificate) and pay to the bank, in full satisfaction of its claim, the amount of the unpaid principal and unpaid interest, at the rate fixed in the note, accrued up to the date of the check issued to the bank; except that if, prior to the payment, the bank is notified of the death by the director and fails to present the certificate and note to the director within 15 days after the notice, such interest shall be only up to the 15th day after such notice. The director shall deduct the amount so paid from the face value (as determined under section 501) of the certificate and pay the remainder in accordance with the provisions of section 501.

(f) If the veteran has not died before the maturity of the certificate, and has failed to pay his note to the bank holding the note and certificate, such bank shall, at the maturity of the certificate, present the note and certificate to the director, who shall thereupon cancel the note (but not the certificate) and pay to the bank, in full satisfaction of its claim, the amount of the unpaid principal and unpaid interest, at the rate fixed in the note, accrued up to the date of the maturity of the certificate. The director shall deduct the amount so paid from the face value (as determined in section 501) of the certificate and pay the remainder in accordance with the provisions of section 501.

(g) The loan basis of any certificate at any time shall, for the purpose of this section, be an amount which is not in excess of either (1) 90 per cent of the reserve value of the certificate on the last day of the current certificate year, or (2) 60 per cent of the face value of the certificate. The reserve value of a certificate on the last day of any certificate year shall be the full reserve required on such certificate, based on an annual premium for 20 years and calculated in accordance with the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually.

(h) No payment upon any note shall be made under this section by the director to any bank unless the note when presented to him is accompanied by an affidavit made by an officer of the bank which made the loan, before a notary public or other officer designated for the purpose by regulation of the director, and stating that such bank has not charged or collected, or attempted to charge or collect, directly or indirectly, any fee or other compensation (except interest as authorized by this section) in respect of any loan made under this section by the bank to a veteran. Any bank which, or director, officer, or employee thereof who, does so charge, collect, or attempt to charge or collect any such fee or compensation, shall be liable to the veteran for a penalty of $100, to be recovered in a civil suit brought by the veteran. The director shall upon request of any bank or veteran furnish a blank form for such affidavit.

Sec. 503. No certificate issued or right conferred under the provisions of this title shall, except as provided in section 502, be negotiable or assignable or serve as security for a loan. Any negotiation, assignment, or loan made in violation of any provision of this section shall be held void.

Sec. 504. Any certificate issued under the provisions of this title shall have printed upon its face the conditions and terms upon which it is issued and to which it is subject, including loan values under section 502.

ADJUSTED SERVICE CERTIFICATE FUND.

Sec. 505. There is hereby created a fund in the Treasury of the United States to be known as "the adjusted service certificate fund," hereinafter in this title called "fund." There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each calendar year (beginning with the calendar year 1925 and ending with the calendar year 1946) an amount sufficient as an annual premium to provide for the payment of the face value of each adjusted service certificate in 20 years from its date or on the prior death of the veteran, such amount to be determined in accordance with accepted actuarial principles and based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually. The amounts so appropriated shall be set aside in the fund on the first day of the calendar year for which appropriated. The appropriation for the calendar year 1925 shall not be in excess of $100,000,000.

Sec. 506. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest and reinvest the moneys in the fund, or any part thereof, in interest-bearing obligations of the United States and to sell such obligations of the United States for the purposes of the fund. The interest on and the proceeds from the sale of any such obligations shall become a part of the fund.

Sec. 507. All amounts in the fund shall be available for payment, by the director, of adjusted service certificates upon their maturity or the prior death of the veteran, and for payments under section 502 to banks on account of notes of veterans.

TITLE VI.—PAYMENTS TO VETERAN'S DEPENDENTS.

Sec. 601. (a) If the veteran has died before making application under section 502, or, if entitled to receive adjusted service pay, has died after making application but before he has received payment under Title IV, and if the United States has not made, or is not obligated to make, any payments to any person on account of his death (either as compensation under the war risk insurance act or as insurance under such act), then the amount of his adjusted service credit shall be paid to his dependents, in the following order of preference:

- (1) To the widow or widower if unmarried;
- (2) If no unmarried widow or widower, then to the children, share and share alike;
- (3) If no unmarried widow or widower, or children, then to the mother;
- (4) If no unmarried widow or widower, children, or mother, then to the father.

(b) For the purposes of this section payments made under paragraph (2) of subdivision (g) of section 301 of the war risk insurance act shall not be considered payments made by the United States on account of the death of the veteran.

DEPENDENCY.

Sec. 602. (a) No payment shall be made to any individual under this title unless at the time of the death of the veteran such individual was dependent upon him for support.

(b) For the purposes of this section:

(1) A child of the veteran shall be presumed to have been dependent upon him at the time of his death if at such time such child was under 18 years of age;

(2) The widow, widower, father, or mother of the veteran shall be presumed to have been dependent upon him at the time of his death upon filing an affidavit to that effect with the application.

Sec. 603. (a) The payments authorized by section 601 shall be made in 10 equal quarterly installments, unless the total amount of the payment is less than $50, in which case it shall be paid on the first installment date. No payments under the provisions of this title shall be made to the heirs or legal representatives of any dependents entitled thereto who die before receiving all the installment payments, but the remainder of such payments shall be made to the dependent or dependents in the next order of preference under section 601.

(b) Payment shall be made by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, dependent upon whether the veteran's service for which he is entitled to receive adjusted-service credit was with the military forces or with the naval forces. If such service of the veteran was in both forces, he shall be paid by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, according to the force in which he first served during the compensable period.

APPLICATION BY DEPENDENT.

Sec. 604. (a) A dependent may receive the benefits to which he is entitled under this title by filing an application therefor with the Secretary of War, if the last service of the veteran was with the military forces, or with the Secretary of the Navy, if his last service was with the naval forces.

(b) Such application shall be made on or before January 1, 1928, and if not made on or before such date shall be held void.

(c) An application shall be made (1) personally by the dependent, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making of a personal application, then by such representative of the dependent and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe. An application made by a representative other than one authorized by any such regulation shall be held void.

(d) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly make any regulations necessary to the efficient administration of the provisions of this section.

UNLAWFUL FEES.

SEC. 605. Any person who charges or collects, or attempts to charge or collect, either directly or indirectly, any fee or other compensation for assisting in any manner a dependent in obtaining any of the payments to which he is entitled under the provisions of this title shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

ASSIGNMENTS.

SEC. 606. No right to payment under the provisions of this title shall be assignable or serve as security for any loan. Any assignment or loan made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be held void. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall not make any payments under this title to any person other than the dependent or such representative of the dependent as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe.

EXEMPTION FROM ATTACHMENT AND TAXATION.

SEC. 607. No sum payable under this title to a dependent shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process, or to National or State taxation.

DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 608. As used in this title—

(a) The term "dependent" means a widow, widower, child, father, or mother;

(b) The term "child" includes (1) a legitimate child; (2) a child legally adopted; (3) a stepchild, if a member of the veteran's household; (4) an illegitimate child, but, as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing signed by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support, or has been judicially decreed to be the putative father of such child;

(c) The terms "father" and "mother" include stepfathers and stepmothers, fathers and mothers through adoption, and persons who have, for a period of not less than one year, stood in loco parentis to the veteran at any time prior to the beginning of his service.

TITLE VII.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

SEC. 701. The officers having charge of the administration of any of the provisions of this act are authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and to make such expenditures for rent, furniture, office equipment, printing, binding, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, stationery, motor-propelled vehicles or trucks used for official purposes, traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4 for officers, agents, and other employees, for the purchase of reports and materials for publications, and for other contingent and miscellaneous expenses as may be necessary efficiently to execute the purposes of this act and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time. With the exception of such special experts as may be found necessary for the conduct of the work, all such appointments shall be made subject to the civil service laws; but for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of section 305 such appointments may be made without regard to such laws until the services of persons duly qualified under such laws are available. In all appointments under this section preference shall, so far as practicable, be given to veterans.

SEC. 702. Whoever knowingly makes any false or fraudulent statement of a material fact in any application, certificate, or document made under the provisions of Title III, IV, V, or VI, or of any regulation made under any such title, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 703. The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau shall severally submit, in the manner provided by law, estimates of the amounts necessary to be expended in carrying out such provisions of this act as each is charged with administering, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated amounts sufficient to defray such expenditures. The Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau shall also submit estimates for appropriations for the fund created by section 505.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill just reported. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] to 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to notify me when I have consumed five minutes. One of the greatest mistakes ever known was made when we did not dispose of the matter of the adjusted compensation to the soldiers of the late war shortly after its close. Every year, every month—I might even say at this time every day—of delay increases its difficulties and lessens the prospects of the soldiers getting anything whatever. In 1919 over a hundred bills dealing with the subject were introduced, and hundreds more have been introduced since; the Ways and Means Committee has devoted months of time to it, it has been argued and reargued, debated and discussed ad infinitum. Two bills have passed the House and one both House and Senate. Yet with all these labors and all the torrents of mingled talk, argument, and eloquence that have been poured forth in over five years we have accomplished nothing, for reasons that every Member of the House understands.

The time has now come for action, not mere words and gestures. [Applause.] Let us do something for the soldiers instead of talking about what we would like to have done. We have debated the subject over five years. Is not that enough? Why debate it longer? We want fewer words and more results. Here is a bill that can become a law. Let us pass it and get something done. [Applause.]

Now, what does this bill do? I know there are some that say it does nothing for the soldiers. I do not care to argue with those who consider the expenditure of over $2,000,000,000 nothing. The figures (about one-half the cost of the great Civil War) are sufficient to show the absurdity of the statement. Two billions is an enormous sum except to the reckless and the improvident, and I pass to the particular provisions of the bill. Eighty-two per cent of the soldiers now living will still survive at the end of the 20-year period, and will be paid over $1,600,000,000. The beneficiaries or the estates of those who die in the meantime will receive the full amount of their respective policies.

In order to present a bill that would become a law, the committee considered it of the utmost importance that the bill should be economically sound. For the first time we have a bill as to which no one has denied or can deny that it is economically sound. Next, the committee considered it necessary that its cost should be capable of accurate and definite determination. For the first time we have such a bill. The figures given in the report are not merely estimates in the sense that somebody believes them to be correct. They are computed according to settled actuarial principles, by an actuary of 20 years' experience, and there can be no reasonable doubt as to their correctness.

The basis of the bill is the same as in the bill which heretofore passed both Houses, $1 a day additional compensation for home service and $1.25 per day for "overseas" service, not to exceed in any event $625. This basis is called the adjusted service credit. As under the former bill, the first 60 days is not considered, for the reason that the Government paid for that period on discharge of the soldier, also those to whom $50 or less is due will be paid in cash the same as before.

The bill makes an important grant which was not conferred under the previous bill by providing for the payment of the adjusted-service credit to the dependents of those who have died before application is made, providing the Government has not paid insurance or compensation to them.

To the remaining soldiers there will be given the equivalent of a paid-up 20-year endowment insurance policy for the amount of the adjusted service credit plus 25 per cent, with interest of 4 per cent compounded annually. This certificate has a borrowing privilege after two years, which is so fully explained in the report that I do not need to go over it now.

The bill provides for the creation of a sinking fund sufficient to meet all claims arising upon the certificates. The amount required for the sinking fund will be $100,000,000 annually. On page 4 of the report is a full statement of the necessary appropriations. For the first three years an additional amount will be needed to pay the cash due the dependents of those who have died and those to whom $50 or less is due. These appropriations will be made upon estimates furnished by the proper officials. The maximum amount which could be required for the first year will be $135,000,000. It is certain to be considerably less.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has consumed five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days within which to extend their own remarks in the Record upon this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire whether this will be the only opportunity for those of us to speak in favor of a cash bonus?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It will not.

Mr. YATES. When will we get in? I want to vote for a cash bonus. [Applause.] I would like an answer to my question.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill evidently is not satisfactory to either those in favor of a cash bonus or those who opposed adjusted compensation. It seems to be supported here in the hope that changes will be made when it reaches the other branch of the Congress. I think that the class of people largely interested in this measure have not had their day in court, viz., the taxpayers of the country. If I sense their view at all, the great majority of the taxpayers of the country do not favor a bonus or adjusted compensation. Therefore, it appears to me that no one favors it except a few of the membership, perhaps a majority of the membership of the House, who hope for a complete change in it before it comes back to us for final action. I think we ought to consider the interests of the taxpayers before we do the political interests of Members of Congress.

Personally I prefer to take my chance in standing by the great majority of the taxpayers. Those people want lower taxes. They are entitled to them and I conceive I am doing my best duty by the service men themselves, many of whom will be called upon to pay the bill, to vote against this measure. The assumption of a new burden, aggregating over $2,000,000,000 is directly contrary to the expressed wish of the people for tax reduction.

I consider it is the best bill on this subject Congress has ever had before it, but being satisfactory neither to the taxpayer nor to the service man it ought not to receive the favorable consideration of the House.

I stand exactly where I always have stood in connection with this subject, for the very best of care of all those in need, the distressed, the wounded veterans, or the families and dependents of those who gave their lives in the service.

I shall be glad to see even greater efforts in their behalf made by this Congress than the present laws provide.

Further than this, I favor what I conceive to be the attitude of the vast majority of the people and of many of the ex-service men themselves, namely the lifting of the burden of taxation from the shoulders alike of the service men and the other taxpayers of the country.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, until this moment I had never fully realized the sad situation of the fellow who stood between the devil and the deep, blue sea. That is where I am standing now. To vote for this bill will be to give the recognition of legitimacy to a legislative bastard, conceived in the fertile brain of a professional profiteering patriot, and accouched on a damask divan in the gold room in the house of Morgan & Co., attended by a galaxy of accoucheurs appointed by Treasury Secretary Mellon and approved by the President of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

A vote for this bill will be to indorse the administration plan to dismiss the request of the ex-service men for adjusted compensation with a promise to guarantee funeral expenses to the boys as fast as they shall die. To vote against the bill will be to deny them even that small boon.

I have no proof regarding the direction in which Jim Glibberson jumped when he saw the devil on one side of him and the deep sea on the other side. But I must make a choice. I shall vote for the pending bill, bad as it is, hoping for and confident of the quick dawning of that new day in which this House shall be guided by sentiments of thankfulness toward the ex-service men rather than by fear of the lash of profiteering party patriots marshaled under leadership of a Secretary of the Treasury who wears the title of prince of profiteers. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, this bill may not satisfy the Democratic politicians, but it satisfies the ex-service men of the Nation. [Applause.] This morning I received the following telegram from Captain Streeter:

LINTON, N. DAK., March 18, 1924.

Congressman GEORGE M. YOUNG,

Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of service men of North Dakota, I approve of and request early passage of adjusted compensation measure reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

F. B. STREETER,

Department Commander American Legion.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. And here is one from the State commander of California to the same effect.

Mr. YOUNG. I also have similar telegram of indorsement from Jack Williams, State adjutant, Fargo.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE].

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I have obtained this time, regretting to do so because I know many desire to speak on this subject, but as a member of the Ways and Means Committee in preparing this bill, and one who has always favored the compensation bill for ex-service men, I have asked it simply to read into the Record a telegram just received from the American Legion in my own State of Colorado:

DENVER COLO., March 17, 1924.

HON. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,

Washington, D. C.:

Members of the American Legion, Department of Colorado, are depending on you to be present to-morrow, Tuesday, and vote for adjusted compensation bill. Know we can depend on you and assure you we appreciate your stand in this matter. Please do not fail us on this important occasion. Guarantee that 95 per cent Legion members of this department favor this bill.

MORTON M. DAVID,

Department Adjutant, Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that every Member may be allowed five legislative days in which to extend his remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all Members be allowed five legislative days to extend their remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE]. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was reported out of the Committee on Ways and Means there were some members of the committee who reserved the right either to vote against this bill or to amend it on the floor of this House, but under the gag rule we have no opportunity to amend the bill.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield? This is my only opportunity to get into this discussion. I have asked the Democratic leader to let me in. I knew my colleague would, and I desire to say I propose to vote against the bill. I introduced the first bonus bill in Congress; and I, like my colleague, do not stand for this bill.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, therefore to-day the Members of this House must do one of two things: We must go on record of either opposing a bonus bill or accept this gag rule. I want to congratulate the minority Members who signed the report, because they have the courage of their convictions, and I want to say without fear of contradiction that in my 10 years as a Member of this House this is the most cowardly piece of legislation that has ever been put to the country. [Applause.] The chairman says for five years we have been making a mistake. Yes; and we made a mistake to-day, for by a vote of 13 to 12 we have been deprived of the opportunity of voting that which the members of the American Legion and veterans of the foreign wars and all the other veterans of the country by a majority of 75 per cent of the members have asked for—a cash bonus.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TAGUE. I am not. I can not yield. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there has been no evidence presented to the committee or to this House as to why this bill should pass. There is not a reason advanced upon which any Member of this House can stand upon who believes in a cash bonus to the soldier. If you think that the ex-soldiers are deceived, you are mistaken. If you think they believe in this bill, you are mistaken. If you think they are going to accept it without some protest on their part, then you are seriously mistaken. [Applause.]

Their hope in asking for the passage of this bill is that it will be amended in the other branch of Congress, and with that in mind I am, like other Members, going to vote to pass this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, in view of the stand I have taken so far, I object, and I shall object to all extensions on this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to indorse this bill wholeheartedly and sincerely as being the best adjusted-compensation measure that has ever been presented to this House. [Applause.] And furthermore, to answer the gentleman who has just spoken, by stating that the American Legion at no time and at no place has ever indorsed a cash feature in any bill. [Applause.] I warn the service men of the country against the effort that is apparently being undertaken to make political capital on the question of inserting a cash feature. The attitude of the Legion might as well be known from the beginning, which is the attitude of an overwhelming majority of the service men, that they do not care to be branded as mercenaries and paid off in cash and be given a quitclaim from the Government. This bill providing 20-year endowment insurance is a proper and adequate recognition of the services of the World War veterans in time of war. It is not adjusted compensation in full.

Adjusted compensation in full would cost thirty or forty billion dollars on a basis of $10 a day, which were the average wages during the war, but this is simply a recognition of their services; it is a fulfillment of promises made by the people, by Congress, by President Harding, and by the Republican national platform, and, I imagine, by the Democratic national platform. It is the consummation of a debt of honor long overdue. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is well understood that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee stood and voted for an adjusted compensation bill with cash and insurance provisions, optional to the soldier. This I heartily favored, and I have not ceased to protest against this bill in its present form, which omits a cash option. The bill now comes without right or opportunity of amendment in this House, controlled by the majority party, that controls the machinery of the House and refuses to permit an opportunity for amendment, and those who favor adjusted compensation for ex-service men are compelled to vote for the bill in its objectionable shape, hoping that when it goes to the Senate, where they can amend it, that it will be amended and come back to the House with a cash option provided therein, so that the House can vote again and for a real adjusted compensation measure desired by 95 per cent of the ex-service men, who prefer cash to insurance. It will be cheaper by a half billion dollars, but those responsible for this measure in its present shape care neither for the increased expense nor the wishes of the ex-service men. Great Britain, France, New Zealand, Australia, and Canada quickly provided for adjusted compensation for their soldiers of the World War, and yet this country, the richest country on earth, refuses here and now to submit a proper measure for the soldier boys. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has given notice that he will object to all such requests.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, does not he have to give that notice every time a gentleman makes such a request?

The SPEAKER. Yes; he does.

Mr. RANKIN. I submit that the request should be submitted and let him make his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, if I correctly understand the motives which prompt me to action, it is my desire in this matter, as at all times, to vote in accord with my best judgment as to what is for the best interests of my country. I freely accord to those who entertain different opinions the same honesty of purpose that is claimed by myself. I do not claim to have a monopoly of wisdom or of patriotism; so when I find myself, as on this occasion, in a somewhat slender minority it causes me to more carefully survey the field to see whether or not I may be mistaken in my honest judgment. I have therefore again gone over every phase of this proposed bonus legislation from an economic standpoint and from every other standpoint, but am compelled in all honesty to say that I can not find sound reason why I should support this bill. I yield to no man in my admiration and esteem for the man who puts on the uniform of his country and goes forth to fight its battles. He is entitled to honor and every other recognition that a grateful country can afford. This bill, however, does not honor him or properly recognize him. Leaving aside the economic effects of such a measure upon the country as a whole, of which the ex-service men themselves are so important a part, this bill does not serve the purpose or one of the principal purposes claimed for it to give recognition to the soldier in the way which will please him. It does not seem to suit anyone, and yet it is one of the principal arguments in favor of the bill that, although unsound in economics, it is worth while as a matter of expediency in order that the ex-service men may be pleased instead of being disgruntled. I do not accept this as sound in theory or in fact, but there is at least something to be said in favor of it if it could be shown that it is really satisfactory to those whom it is intended to please; but evidence on this point is lacking, while there is much on the other side. Therefore, much as I regret to oppose what is claimed to be for the soldier, there seems to be no good reason why I should support a bill that will be entirely unsatisfactory to most of the soldiers and which at the same time will produce economic and other effects harmful and far-reaching in their consequences. [Applause.] Believing this to be true, I can not bring myself to support the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. It satisfies Mr. FISH, of New York.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those Members of the House who have constantly advocated the passage of an adjusted compensation bill since the proposition was first suggested. I still occupy that position, and I shall vote for this bill, but I shall do it under serious protest.

I do not believe that this bill registers the desire or the judgment of a majority of the Members of this House, and I do not believe that it registers the desire or the will of the ex-service men of this country. It is my opinion that upon a free expression of choice in this House to-day there would be an overwhelming vote in favor of a bill containing a cash-option provision. [Applause.] But we have been dragooned, so to speak, by this parliamentary maneuver, which is a species of umorality, into having no choice, those of us who differ with the provisions of this bill.

I do not blame members of the American Legion, some of them, for telegraphing messages of indorsement, because after five years of pitiful delay without relief they see no hope for anything else. And now I call on the gentleman from Iowa to answer this House, and categorically, whether he can give us any assurance that the President will approve this bill in its present form, if passed?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have had no conversation whatsoever with the President, so that I do not know.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that we may be, in this piece of legislation, riding toward another Executive veto. I protest against it in the name of the ex-service men of my district, because I know that this does not register their will on this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I believe the membership would be interested in knowing exactly what this adjusted compensation is going to cost the Government per year. The first year, taking care of all the provisions of the bill, it will cost $135,000,000. After the third year it will cost $107,000,000, and when it gets down to the twentieth year it will cost $90,000,000.

The statement has been reiterated here that the soldiers want a cash bonus. In 1922 the bill did not carry a cash bonus, and recently in our hearings, Mr. Taylor, representing the American Legion, came before us and stated that in a vote of over 11,000 ex-service men 68 per cent were in favor of an adjusted compensation certificate, and but 11 per cent had signified their intention to borrow on the same in case of need. Mr. Bettelheim, representing the Veterans of Foreign Wars, stated that 68 per cent were in favor of the adjusted compensation certificates and but 1 per cent of the members, he believed, would borrow on their certificates. In answer to a direct question by Mr. TILSON, when asked as to the views of his organization with respect to an insurance plan without the borrowing feature—he said:

The organization leaves that in the hands of Congress—and added:

My best judgment is the insurance certificate. * * * I believe we should have a borrowing feature the same as any other commercial insurance company.

I asked him if he meant they should be able to borrow on it the same as on any life insurance policy, and he said that was his idea.

This bill is framed along the lines of good common sense and good business judgment. It is fair to the soldier, and in the event of death it gives to his family the full value of the policy. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has stated, probably 83 per cent of the veterans covered in this bill will live to the maturity of the policies and they will get the cash at the time it will do them the most good.

As to the borrowing feature of the policies, they can borrow either through their home State bank or National bank. We have made provision so that sufficient money will be held in the Federal reserve banks, to take care of loans made by local banks, so that it will not be frozen credit.

The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] spoke about taking care of the dependents of those who died. The bill makes provisions to care for the dependents of every veteran who has died prior to the passage of the bill, and they will receive in cash the full amount due the soldier for his adjusted service, something that has never heretofore been provided for. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is not a party question, and I deplore any effort to make it so. In what I say I speak only for myself. Whatever may be one's opinion as to the question of adjusted compensation, the method by which this proposed measure is being considered can only be properly characterized by denouncing it as a parliamentary outrage.

Here you have a measure affecting more than 3,000,000 of the Nation's defenders on the one hand and every taxpayer of the United States, including the soldiers themselves, on the other hand. You propose in this tremendous legislation to devote only 20 minutes to discussion and permit no amendment whatever, and you do it in a form demanded neither by the soldier nor the taxpayer. For my part I shall not be a party to any such transaction. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] in one statement he made, that the time has come when the membership of this House must go on record for or against adjusted compensation for the soldiers. In its essential feature, a 20-year endowment policy, it is similar to the bill that passed the last Congress. The bill of the last Congress had no cash option, and this bill has no cash option. I am for adjusted compensation for the soldiers. And I want to say to my good friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], that I and many with me are for this bill, and we hope that it will come back from the Senate without any material amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BOYCE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Speaker, in so far as it may be possible for me to do, I intend to vote on the bill now before the House in the same spirit as the ex-service men entered the World War; that is, with a patriotic desire to serve the best interests of our country. And to this end I have determined to go over the top, although, speaking figuratively, I may be shot. A sense of duty, as I see it and not personal consequences, will control my vote against this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who have always believed and always contended that our Government treated very ungenerously the men whose youth and strength were drafted into the World War, but I want to say that, for my part, I believe the bill on which we are going to be called to vote in a few minutes is not only more beneficial to the majority of the veterans than many bills which have hitherto been proposed but that it is the only bill in behalf of adjusted compensation which stands any likelihood of adoption at this session of Congress. [Applause.]

Three of my colleagues from Massachusetts have voiced their disapproval of this bill. I want to read into the Record a telegram which I have to-day received from the department adjutant of the American Legion in Massachusetts, Leo A. Spillane:

Massachusetts legionnaires urge your support of adjusted compensation measure on Tuesday calendar.

My feeling has always been that the time when the ex-service men should have received some generous adjusted compensation in the form of cash was when the war ended.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Speaker, in the brief space allotted to me I want to register my humble protest against the limitation of debate to 40 minutes by those having control of legislation upon this floor and, further, to their refusal to permit of amendments or even of extension of remarks in the Record upon a matter involving the expenditure of billions of dollars that must sooner or later be paid by the people.

I shall vote against this bill, and if I had 1,000 votes I would cast them all against the bill if for no other reasons than those which I have mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman yield back?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yielded back quarter of a minute.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield quarter of a minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK].

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, I have just enough time, I presume, to say that I am opposed to this bill and to ask that I have leave to extend my remarks in the Record and have objection made by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how the time stands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has used 18 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] has used 16 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASBY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, what a farce this whole proceeding is. We propose to legislate on the bonus question by the passage of this bill which will cost the people of this country from two to three billion dollars under a gag rule. We are not permitted to amend the bill, we are not even permitted to discuss it, and a Member on the other side, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] will not even permit a Member of the House to extend his remarks in the Record. I want to say to you very frankly that in my opinion this is an outrage being perpetrated upon the American people when the merits of a bill of this magnitude can not even be discussed or amended. We will, of course, have to vote for it under the circumstances or be misunderstood.

If I had my way, I would write into this bill this afternoon a cash option which would give recognition to the confidence we have in these ex-service men and not blacken their reputations by saying we can not trust them to spend intelligently the paltry sum of $500 or $600. We were willing to permit them to take the responsibility and risks to defend the country but we will not trust them to handle the few paltry dollars which we propose to give them by the passage of this bill. It is the same old story over again. When we took these boys from civil life and put them in the fighting forces of the United States we promised them $30 a month; we promised to take care of those who were near and dear to them. Yes; we promised that if they would pay from this $30 an amount stipulated by the Government of the United States in the event of their death we would take care of their dependents. The soldier had to die for someone else to win. We now propose to say by the passage of this bill, "We are willing to again gamble with your life so that someone else may win in the event of your death." Do you not think it is about time we commenced to do something for the ex-service man himself? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, we are being forced to-day to vote on a "gold brick" under a "gag" rule, and I want to say that I am one who sincerely hopes, as I vote for this thing to-day, this subterfuge, that it will be changed beneficially by the time it gets back to this House.

It is an outrage to choke off debate this way on legislation of the character affecting our ex-service people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record so that the straw whip from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] may object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Is a Member who knowingly hands a gold brick to his constituents a confidence man? [Laughter.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for two minutes and a half.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic ex-service men of the House, and a vast majority of the other Democratic Members, are in favor of two options in this adjusted compensation bill—one providing for cash and the other providing for paid-up insurance. A cash option, if it were put into this bill—instead of the bill written by Mr. Mellon's adherents—would cost only $1,319,519,000 if every ex-service man affected should elect to take cash, while I understand this bill will cost more than $2,000,000,000 without giving the soldiers the proper relief.

We are going to support this bill, not because of the bill itself in its present form, but in order to get it out of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and get it over to the Senate, where it may be properly considered and amended. [Applause.]

This, Mr. Speaker, should be dubbed the Mellon bill, or the Mellon rule. This is a part of the Mellon plan, which was instituted primarily in order to defeat the adjusted compensation and prevent our doing justice to our soldiers of the recent war.

They brought the bill out under this rule, shutting off debate and amendments, in the hope that the Democratic Members would vote against it and throw it back into the Committee on Ways and Means, where they could hold it until the Senate got through with the tax bill; because they know that when this bill goes to the Senate they are going to take it up ahead of the tax bill—as the House should have done—and amend it to meet the wishes of the ex-service men of the country. I have a telegram this morning stating that out of 100 ex-service men questioned about this matter 99 of them are in favor of a cash feature. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this may be a good bill for the man who is wealthy and can carry his insurance, but for the poor fellow who needs the money I fear it is going to be a sore disappointment. At the end of three years he can borrow about $60 on a policy of a face value of $1,000; at the end of four years, about $90; at the end of five years, about $120; and at the end of six years, about $160.

When he defaults in his interest payments the Government charges him 6 per cent interest compounded annually from that time on, instead of letting him have the money at the same rate of interest it is allowing him on his policy.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, say what you please about this bill, this is the Mellon compensation bill. It is the product of the "hand of Esau and the voice of Jacob," and the ex-service men of this country are going to so regard it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GILBERT. Under the life tables what percentage of these men will live out the 20 years?

Mr. RANKIN. I am not sure how many, but from the health certificates given them by the gentleman on the majority side they are going to live a long time.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield for a second only? I am with the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. All right.

Mr. GALLIVAN. All I want to ask is whether the gentleman believes that instead of this bill coming from the Committee on Ways and Means it comes from Joe Miller's joke book.

Mr. RANKIN. No; it comes from the Treasury Department.

Mr. WEFALD. From J. P. Morgan.
